relating to the transaction. As we have already observed, the day before the notice of rescission was given the buyers were asking for an extension of time within which to pay the $1,100 remaining on the purchase price. The conduct of the buyers in connection with the attempt to rescind does not find a basis in equitable considerations.

We do not deem it necessary to consider other questions raised and discussed in the briefs of both parties.

For the reasons we have indicated, the judgment is reversed.

We concur: HOUSER, Acting P. J.; YORK, J.

GROVE et ux. v. MORRIS et al. (Civ. 6875.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 30, 1929.

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨214—Lease of ranch, requiring payment of first year's rent in advance, held properly construed as requiring payment of annual rent in advance.

Lease of ranch, requiring first year's rental to be paid in advance, and providing that large amount of live stock and personal property should be turned over to lessee at time lease was executed, held properly construed as requiring annual rental to be paid in advance.

2. Appeal and error ⇨882(3)—Lessees, denying lease was terminated, could not, on appeal, claim lease was terminated to defeat judgment for rent.

Where lessees, in answer to suit on lease by lessor, denied that lease was terminated, and court's finding that lease was not terminated was supported by evidence and law, lessees could not on appeal claim that lease was terminated, so as to defeat judgment for rent, which was properly rendered to date of commencement of action.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨136—Lessees, entitled to sell cattle, but required to use proceeds to buy sheep, held liable for conversion of cattle, where converting proceeds to own use.

Where lessees under lease of ranch had right to sell cattle, but were required to use proceeds of sale for purchase of sheep, which they failed to do, and court found that lessees sold cattle and converted proceeds to own use, and did not intend to use proceeds for purchase of sheep, such finding, supported by evidence, was sufficient to sustain judgment against lessees for conversion of cattle.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨161(3)—Allowance for lost articles, to be paid for at expiration of lease, held premature, where lease had not expired at commencement of suit.

Where lease of ranch provided that personally lost shall be paid for by lessee at expiration of lease, and court found that at time of commencement of suit and entry of judgment lease had not expired, but was in full force and effect, allowance to lessor for lost articles was premature.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by J. D. Grove and another against Edward Morris and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Frank W. Taft, of Willits, for appellants.
Charles Kasch, of Ukiah, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. The defendants appeal from an adverse judgment in an action to recover rentals claimed to be due under the terms of a written lease, and for damages on account of the alleged loss and conversion of personal property while defendants were in possession of the leased premises. The lease was entered into on December 7, 1925, between plaintiffs, J. D. Grove and wife, and the defendants Morris and Ingvason, doing business under the name of Certified Seed Farms Company, and the portions thereof necessary to be considered here read as follows:

"* * * The said lessor do lease and let unto the said lessee, all those lands situate in Little Lake Valley, Mendocino County, California, known as the Grove's Ranch, * * * containing approximately 1,080 acres, for a period of one calendar year from the date of this contract, together with an option for the continuance of the time of this lease, under the terms and conditions herein set forth, up to and including December 6, 1932, for a consideration of Two Thousand ($2,000.00) Dollars cash in hand paid, receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged under the following terms and conditions, to wit: * * * The lessee shall also have full possession of all live stock, farm equipment and small tools in accordance with list of same attached hereto, and made a part hereof, and shall use the same to its advantage. All tools and articles lost during the term of this lease shall be charged to the lessee at inventory prices and paid for at the expiration of the lease. The lessee shall not be held liable for losses or death of said live-stock, except as through deliberate act to destroy upon the part of the lessee. Lessee shall be empowered to sell all of the cattle of the original inventory, at any time during the term of this lease, at an average price of $50.00 per head, for the credit of the lessor; said proceeds from such sale to be used for the purchase of sheep at prices to be stipulated by the lessor. All household effects left by the lessor for the use of the lessee shall likewise be inventoried, and any losses which might occur by reason of negligence of the lessee shall be charged at lessee, but there shall be no charge for reasonable wear and tear thereof. * * * Should lessee relinquish leasehold rights under this agreement at the termination of any current year thereof, a written notice of such intent shall be delivered to lessor prior to October 1st, of any current year thereof, and shall permit the lessor to enter for purpose of plowing and cultivation of said land, on or after November 1st, of said current year. * * *

The personal property enumerated in the inventory attached to the lease consisted generally of live stock, including 47 head of cattle, ranch equipment and machinery, tools, harnesses, household furniture, etc. Morris and Ingvason paid the rent for the first year in advance, as provided in the lease, and went into the possession of the property. On July 13, 1926, they assigned the lease to the defendant Mrs. Long, but the assignment contained no covenants or other assumption of obligations on the part of the assignee. Upon leasing the ranch, Grove and his wife moved to Contra Costa county, but about the time the assignment was made, and being evidently unaware of the fact that the lease had been assigned, Grove returned to the ranch, presumably for the purpose of inspecting the live stock and of removing certain personal effects he had left there. More or less bitterness was engendered by his presence there, and on July 30, 1926, Mrs. Long sent him a telegram from Oakland, reading as follows: "From the date you quit premises I assume responsibility for personal property listed under lease and now on premises, except household furniture which is agreeable to Hesselwerdt you may store upstairs at your own risk. [Signed] A. R. Long"—Immediately upon receipt of which Grove quit the premises. Following the assignment, Mrs. Long placed a man named Hesselwerdt in charge of the ranch, and about December 1, 1926, at the request of Morris and Ingvason, Mrs. Long caused all of the cattle to be sold at $45 a head, and the proceeds from the sale to be deposited in her name in a bank in Willits. About two weeks later the ranch was entirely abandoned, and up to the time of the trial of this action remained wholly unoccupied; but no notice whatever of the abandonment was given to plaintiffs, nor was any re-assignment of the lease ever made.

The complaint was filed on March 2, 1927, and contained four causes of action. The first was for the recovery of the rental, and the second for the value of the personal property (other than cattle) claimed to have been lost or converted during defendants' occupation of the ranch; the third was for damages on account of the alleged conversion of the cattle, and the fourth for damages for alleged waste. The action came on for trial in October, 1927, and findings were made and judgment entered on March 2, 1928. No relief was granted under the fourth cause of action, but with respect to the other three judgment was entered in plaintiffs' favor as follows: For the rental of the premises from December 7, 1926, up to the date of the commencement of the action; $755.25 for loss or conversion of the personal property (other than the cattle); and $2,350 as damages for the conversion of the cattle. All of said amounts, except the rent, were apportioned in the findings and judgment between the original lessees, Morris and Ingvason, and their assignee, Mrs. Long, with the provision that if, within 15 days after notice of the entry of judgment, Mrs. Long returned any of the personal property with which she had been charged, the amount of the judgment would be reduced accordingly. Within the period allowed certain property was redelivered, and the total amount of the judgment was reduced $123.50. The judgment further provided that payment of any part thereof by one of the parties should operate as a pro tanto satisfaction in favor of the others.

[1] The trial court construed the terms of the lease as requiring the annual rental to be paid in advance, and accordingly gave judgment against the original lessees, Morris and Ingvason, for $2,000, which covered the period between December 7, 1926, and December 7, 1927; and appellants contend that such construction is erroneous. After examining the entire lease, it is apparent that the same is inartificially drawn; but when the surrounding circumstances, including the size and character of the ranch and the fact that a large amount of live stock and personal property was turned over to the lessees at the time the lease was executed, are taken into consideration in connection with the wording of the lease, which admittedly required the first year's rental to be paid in advance, we are of the opinion that the construction adopted by the court is not unreasonable.

It was alleged in the complaint and denied in the answer that the lease was terminated at the time of the abandonment of the ranch at the end of December, 1926, and upon that issue the trial court found that the lease had not been terminated; its finding being as follows:

"And the court further finds that said lease was not terminated on the 1st day of January, 1927, or at any other time. And the court further finds that plaintiffs did not enter or take possession of said premises at any time, or terminate said lease. And the court further finds that said lease is still in full force and effect. And the court further finds that the defendants Morris and Ingvason have violated the covenants of the lease and abandoned said property. And the court further finds that no notice has been served upon plaintiffs to terminate said lease as required by law. And the court further finds that the plaintiffs have not, nor have either of them, ejected the said defendants, or any of them, from the aforesaid premises, or any part thereof."

Appellants criticize the foregoing finding as being "paradoxical." In support of such criticism they argue that, while the judgment for rental must necessarily be founded upon the theory that the lease was not terminated, the judgment for the value of the lost personal property, and the judgment for damages for conversion of the cattle, must necessarily be founded upon the theory that the lease was terminated. And in this regard appellants say that, if the lease was not terminated, under its terms the lessees were not required to pay for the lost property until "the expiration of the lease," and that they had the right to hold the proceeds derived from the sale of the cattle for the purchase of sheep.

[2] As already stated, appellants in their answer denied that the lease was terminated, and the court so found, and the finding is supported by the evidence and the law. Consequently appellants are not in a position now to claim that the lease was terminated; and, since it was not terminated, the court was warranted in giving judgment for the rental from December 7, 1926, to the date of the commencement of this action.

[3] Nor do we find anything inconsistent in giving judgment for the conversion of the cattle upon the theory that the lease was not terminated. True, appellants had the right under the terms of the lease to sell the cattle, which they did in December, 1926; but they were required to use the proceeds from the sale for the purchase of sheep, which, up to the time of trial in October, 1927, they had not done, and in this respect the court found " * * * that defendant Long sold the cattle on said premises and converted the proceeds thereof to her own use," and "that said funds were not used for the purpose of purchasing sheep," and "that the defendants did not, nor did either of them ever desire or intend to use said funds for the purchase of sheep." The foregoing finding, being supported by the evidence, is legally sufficient to sustain the portion of the judgment to which it relates.

[4] We are of the opinion, however, that the judgment for the alleged value of the property claimed to have been lost by appellants cannot be sustained for two reasons: First, the lease provided that "all tools and articles lost during the term of this lease shall be charged to the lessee at inventory prices and paid for at the expiration of the lease" (italics ours), and the court found that at the time of the commencement of the suit and the entry of judgment the lease had not expired, but was in full force and effect. The allowance for lost articles was therefore premature. Secondly, and in any event, the evidence was wholly insufficient to warrant a judgment for the sum of $755.25 for the loss of said property. As already appears, the articles of personal property with which appellants were charged were enumerated in an inventory attached to the lease, although no prices were specified; but the judgment for $755.25 is based wholly upon another list of property, prepared by Grove from memory shortly prior to trial, which purports to set forth the value of each article there listed, and which included some 40 articles not enumerated in the inventory attached to the lease. The value of those extra articles totaled $444.83, leaving $310.42 as the value of the articles enumerated in the inventory attached to the lease; and the latter sum included an item of "motor saw and two blades," which the court found later was worth only $26.50, instead of $202.50, as set forth in Grove's separate list. When the difference of $176 is deducted from the sum of $310.42 representing the net value of said property, a balance of only $134.42 remains; and, according to Grove's testimony, the property remaining on the ranch at the time of trial was worth $100. Consequently, according to the evidence adduced, the maximum amount for which a judgment could have been allowed for the loss of the personal property, assuming plaintiffs were entitled to the same, was $34.42. The other points raised by appellants' brief are merely incidental to the main questions already decided, and therefore do not require discussion.

For the reasons stated, the judgment is modified by striking therefrom paragraphs (c) and (g), which relate to the allowances for lost property, and by correspondingly reducing the total amount set forth in paragraph (d) to $4,350, and the total amount set forth in paragraph (h) to $2,458.33, and, as thus modified, the judgment will stand affirmed; respondents to recover their costs.

KEELE v. CLOUSER et ux. (Civ. 7107.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 28, 1929.

1. Cancellation of instruments §37(5)—In suit to cancel deed, allegations of nondelivery and that deed was recorded without plaintiff's knowledge, held sufficient allegation of inadvertence and mistake (Civ. Code, § 3412).

In suit under Civ. Code, § 3412, to have deed which had been recorded through inadvertence and mistake delivered to plaintiff and canceled, allegations that deed was never delivered to defendants and that it had been recorded without knowledge or consent of plaintiff, held sufficient allegation of facts constituting inadvertence and mistake, since all that is required is to show facts constituting invalidity, whether they involve duress, accident, or mistake.

2. Cancellation of instruments §41—In suit to cancel deed, complaint pleading facts entitling plaintiff to some relief in equity is good against general demurrer (Civ. Code, § 3412).

In suit under Civ. Code, § 3412, to cancel deed which had been recorded through inad-vertence and mistake, complaint pleading facts entitling plaintiff to some relief in equity is good as against general demurrer, regardless of sufficiency to state cause of action under strict wording of statute.

3. Cancellation of instruments §47—In suit to cancel deed, evidence supported finding deed was recorded without plaintiff's knowledge and without delivery (Civ. Code, § 3412).

In suit under Civ. Code, § 3412, to cancel deed, evidence held sufficient to support findings that deed was never delivered to defendants and was recorded without knowledge or consent of plaintiff, that it was void for lack of delivery, and that there was reasonable apprehension that, if left outstanding, it would cause injury to plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Suit by Mary V. Keele, formerly Mary V. Haas, against Eugene Clouser and wife, to cancel a deed. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 268 P. 682.

Wm. A. Spill, of Pasadena, for appellants.
Simpson & Simpson and Leon U. Everhart, all of Pasadena, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued under section 3412 of the Civil Code to have a deed which had been recorded through inadvertence and mistake delivered to her and canceled. Plaintiff had judgment, and the defendants appeal upon typewritten transcripts.

The complaint alleged the execution of a written contract by plaintiff and defendants for the sale of certain real property which in express terms provided for the delivery of a deed and certificate of title when the terms of the contract were fully complied with by the defendants. It alleged that, at the time of entering into said contract and as a part of the same transaction, plaintiff executed a deed for the purpose of conveying to defendants a clear title to the property involved when the terms of the contract had been met, and that "by inadvertence and mistake, and without the knowledge or consent of this plaintiff, and without delivery thereof, said instrument * * * was placed on record * * * that said instrument was * * * and now is void and of no effect." A demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and the defendants answered, denying the execution of the contract and alleging that the deed was duly and regularly recorded.

[1, 2] The Code section under which the action was instituted reads: "A written instrument, in respect to which there is a reasonable apprehension that if left outstanding it may cause serious injury to a person against whom it is void or voidable, may, upon his application, be so adjudged, and ordered to be delivered up or canceled."

Appellants attack the judgment on the ground that the complaint fails to state a cause of action. The argument seems to be that the facts constituting the alleged "inadvertence and mistake" are not pleaded with sufficient particularity. The allegations that the deed was never delivered to appellants and that it had been recorded without knowledge or consent of respondent were sufficient. All that is required under section 3412, Civil Code, "either in pleading or proof is to show the facts constituting the invalidity of the instrument, whether they involve fraud, duress, accident, mistake." Hironymous v. Hiatt, 52 Cal. App. 727, 731, 199 P. 850, 851. But, if there be any doubt as to the sufficiency of the complaint to state a cause of action under the strict wording of the Code section, it nevertheless does plead facts entitling respondent to some relief in equity, and this is all that is necessary against a general demurrer. Brown v. Anderson-Cottonwood Irr. Dist., 183 Cal. 186, 188, 190 P. 797.

[3] Appellants also argue that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings of fact. The trial court found, as alleged in the complaint, that "by inadvertence and mistake and without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff and without a delivery thereof said instrument was filed for record * * * that said instrument was and now is void for lack of authorized delivery * * * (and that) there is reasonable apprehension that if left outstanding it may cause serious injury to the plaintiff against whom it is void."

Supporting this finding, the undisputed evidence is that, before any papers were executed in the transaction, the respondent agreed to sell the premises to the appellants at a fixed price of $3,000 on terms of $500 down and $35 a month, with interest. At the same time the respondent agreed to execute a deed "for the protection" of the appellants, to be delivered to them when the payments were completed. A written contract covering these terms was then signed; the respondent executed a deed and delivered it to her agent with instructions to place it in a designated bank along with the contract for delivery according to the terms of the contract. The respondent soon after left for the East, and the agent, without her knowledge or consent, placed the deed of record. The appellants moved into the premises and continued to make the monthly payments to the bank for a period of about 4½ years. They then became disturbed because undesirable residents were moving into the neighborhood, and, discovering that the deed had been recorded, consulted an attorney, who advised them to repudiate their written contract and to make the claim that they had clear title to the premises under the deed. This they did while about $800 was due under the contract. The appellants did not dispute any of this evidence, and both testified that they fully understood from the beginning of the transaction that the deed was not to be delivered until they had completed their payments. The evidence amply supports the finding that the recordation was made inadvertently.

We find no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

(Civ. 6733).

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California. Oct. 30, 1929.

Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 766—Appeal must be dismissed on timely notice of motion for failure to file points and authorities within 30 days after filing transcript (Supreme Court Rule 1, § 4, and Rule 5, § 1).

Where appellants' points and authorities were not filed within 30 days after filing of transcript, as required by Supreme Court Rule 1, § 4, and no application for extension of time was made, nor good cause shown for not making it, appeal must be dismissed on timely service and filing of notice of motion under Rule 5, § 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles R. Barnard, Judge.

Action by Bertrian Butler and another against J. W. Starkweather. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. On motion to dismiss the appeal. Appeal dismissed.

F. E. Davis, of Hollywood, for appellants.

Walters & Mauk, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J. The transcript on appeal herein was filed on June 14, 1929, and appellants' opening brief was not presented for filing until September 20, 1929. Theretofore, on the 5th day of September, 1929, a notice of motion to dismiss the appeal was filed herein, it having been served on said day on the attorney for appellants.

Section 4 of rule 1 of the Rules of the Supreme Court and of this court provides that: "Within thirty days after the filing of the transcript, the appellant shall file with the clerk his printed points and authorities. * * *"

Section 1 of rule 5 provides that: "If the transcript of the record or appellant's points and authorities be not filed within the time prescribed, the appeal may be dismissed, upon notice given, either on motion of the respondent or of the court in which the appeal is pending."

No extension of time was granted, and, so far as the record discloses, none was asked for. The points and authorities were not on file at the date the notice of motion was served and filed. If the argument used by appellants upon this motion to dismiss had been directed to the court by way of a request for a continuance of time within which to file appellants' opening brief or points and authorities, we might have something to pass upon, but it has always been held in cases where more than 30 days have thus elapsed, and where no application is made for an extension of time, and no good cause is shown for not making such application, and where the notice of motion to dismiss is served and filed before the memorandum of points and authorities is on file in this court, this court will have to dismiss the appeal. Berendsen v. Babdaty, 62 Cal. App. 185, 216 P. 385; Waugaman v. Richardson, 72 Cal. App. 10, 236 P. 207; Welch v. Stratton, 73 Cal. App. 765, 239 P. 380; Walker v. Mathews, 58 Cal. App. 255, 208 P. 140.

The appeal is therefore dismissed.

INGOLD v. DALY BANK & TRUST CO. OF ANACONDA et al. (Civ. 5551.)★

Rehearing Denied Nov. 27, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 26, 1929.

1. Bills and notes $\S$ 539—Findings held equivalent to finding that plaintiff was purchaser of draft given for valueless stock in good faith and for value (Civ. Code, $\S$ 3133).

In action on draft given for stock against purchaser, stopping payment of draft when finding stock had no value, trial court's findings held equivalent to finding that plaintiff was purchaser and holder of draft for value, under Civ. Code, $\S$ 3133.

2. Bills and notes $\S$ 370—Lack of consideration for draft, unaccompanied by other element, such as fraud, would not constitute defect in title of person negotiating it.

Lack of consideration for draft, unaccompanied by any other element, such as fraud, would not constitute an infirmity in instrument or defect in title of person negotiating it.

3. Bills and notes $\S$ 343—That purchaser of draft given for corporate stock knew of precarious condition of corporation would not prevent him from being bona fide purchaser for value (Civ. Code, $\S$ 3133).

That findings showed purchaser of draft given for stock knew of precarious condition of corporation at time, and that stock then had no value, but not showing draft was irregular, or that it was received by purchaser before overdue, that it had been previously dishonored, or that purchaser had notice of infirmity in draft or defect in seller's title thereto, would not affect purchaser's right to recover on draft as purchaser of draft in good faith and for value, under Civ. Code, $\S$ 3133.

4. Bills and notes $\S$ 370—As against bona fide purchaser of draft given for stock, it is no defense that stock had no value (Civ. Code, $\S$ 3133).

As against purchaser in good faith and for value, under Civ. Code, $\S$ 3133, of draft given for stock, who was found to have had no connection with fraud by which stock was sold, it is no defense that stock which was transferred was of no present or immediate value.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry R. Archbald, Judge.

Action by R. F. Ingold against the Daly Bank & Trust Company of Anaconda and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Page, Nolan, Rohe & Hurt and Henry Ramsey, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

James Donovan, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. On November 19, 1923, the respondent Daly Bank & Trust Company of Anaconda, Mont., transmitted to respondent Charles E. Sackett, at Los Angeles, Cal., its draft on the Wells Fargo Nevada National Bank of San Francisco, Cal., for $1,000. On November 23, 1923, the payee indorsed the same to respondent N. M. Hayter, who in turn indorsed it to R. F. Ingold, appellant herein, and, after deposit for collection by the latter, payment thereof was stopped. The appellant instituted this action against the respondents for the amount represented by said draft, and, judgment having been rendered in favor of the defendants, he appealed.

Much is said in the briefs on the subject of alleged participation by Ingold in deception and fraud practiced upon Sackett concerning the value, or lack of it, of the stock in question, and other matters whose consideration is made unnecessary by the findings upon the issues vital to a determination of this appeal. The judgment cannot be upheld, unless the findings of fact warrant it. We shall therefore quote all of the findings, which, of course, contain a story of the transaction in dispute as found by the trial court. They are as follows:

"I. The plaintiff, R. F. Ingold, and N. M. Hayter were, prior to November 19, 1923, directors of the Altruart Film Corporation. R. F. Ingold was also treasurer of said corporation from the time of its creation up to November 26, 1923. That N. M. Hayter was also fiscal agent of the Altruart Film Corporation up to November 26, 1923, and as such directors and officers of said corporation were familiar with the financial condition of said corporation.

"II. Robert W. Major was president of said corporation from the creation thereof up to December —, 1923.

"III. That on or about the 1st of November, 1923, Robert W. Major, as president of the Altruart Film Corporation, and N. W. Hayter, as fiscal agent and director of said corporation, represented to the defendant Charles E. Sackett that the Altruart Film Corporation was in a good financial condition, and that some directors of said corporation desired that said Charles E. Sackett should purchase an interest in said corporation and become a director of the same, and that by the 1st of January, 1924, the company would be manufacturing and selling moving pictures. It was further represented to said Sackett that N. M. Hayter was in charge of the sales of the stock of said corporation under a certain permit issued by the commissioner of corporations, and that he had a number of sales agents, and that the sales were going very well. That stock had been issued to 11 persons, who became incorporators and promoters of said corporation, and that each of said incorporators had paid in to said corporation $1,000 each for stock which was to be issued to each of said incorporators. That among the original incorporators was one John D. Elms, who had invested in said corporation the sum of $1,000, and that said Elms was about to retire from said corporation, and that said N. W. Hayter had purchased the interest of said Elms in said corporation, and would sell to the defendant Sackett for the sum of $1,000.

"IV. That, relying upon the statements so made by said Major and Hayter, and each of them, to the defendant Sackett, Sackett purchased what was known as the Elms stock from N. M. Hayter, and gave therefor a certain draft for $1,000, issued by the Daly Bank & Trust Company of Anaconda, Mont., drawn on Wells Fargo Nevada National Bank of San Francisco, payable to Charles E. Sackett, or order, and indorsed by said Sackett to Hayter.

"V. That immediately after the purchase of said Elms stock by Charles E. Sackett from N. M. Hayter, and after delivering said draft to said Hayter, Robert W. Major, president of said corporation, informed said Sackett that the representations so made by Major and Hayter to said Sackett were false and untrue, and said Major advised said Sackett that the corporation had no assets, that it was in debt and had no funds with which to pay its debts, and advised said Sackett to stop the payment of said draft.

"VI. Upon the advice so furnished to said Sackett by said Major, Sackett ordered the Daly Bank & Trust Company to notify the Wells Fargo Nevada National Bank of San Francisco to refuse payment of said draft, and upon such notice Wells Fargo Nevada National Bank of San Francisco refused to pay said draft.

"VII. That on the same day that said draft was received by N. M. Hayter from Sackett for the Elms stock it was delivered to the plaintiff, R. F. Ingold, who was then and had been since the creation of Altruart Film Corporation treasurer of said corporation and one of its directors, and knew at the time he received said draft from said Hayter that said draft was given by Sackett to Hayter for the Elms stock.

"VIII. That in the purchase of said Elms stock by N. M. Hayter from John D. Elms, Hayter gave his promissory note therefor, which note was indorsed by the plaintiff, R. F. Ingold.

"IX. That R. F. Ingold knew at the time that Sackett purchased the Elms stock from Hayter that the stock was of no value and of only prospective value, and also knew that the physical properties of the corporation were worthless, and that said corporation had no assets of any real value whatever at the time Sackett purchased the Elms stock from N. M. Hayter.

"X. That the plaintiff, R. F. Ingold, knew that the draft received from Sackett was given by Sackett to said Hayter in consideration of the transfer of the Elms stock from Hayter to Sackett.

"XI. That plaintiff knew and was charged with knowledge of the fact that consideration given for said draft by Hayter was worthless, and that Sackett received no consideration for said draft transferred by Sackett to Hayter.

"XII. That the plaintiff, Ingold, received said draft from Hayter, well knowing that the Elms stock, which was transferred by Hayter to Sackett, was worthless, and that Sackett received no consideration of value for the transfer of said draft.

"XIII. That the plaintiff was not a bona fide purchaser of said draft from Sackett under section 3133 of the Civil Code.

"XIV. That at the time when the stock of John D. Elms was purchased by Charles E. Sackett from N. M. Hayter the plaintiff herein was of the opinion and belief that with proper management said corporation might prove to be a profitable organization.

"XV. That the plaintiff and Sackett had never met prior to the sale by Hayter of the Elms stock to Sackett, and the plaintiff and Sackett did not meet until October, 1925, almost two years after the transaction which is the subject of this litigation. That the plaintiff did not at any time, or at all, directly or indirectly, make any representation, whatsoever, of any kind or character, to Sackett, and said Sackett was not induced to enter into the purchase of Elms' stock because of any actions, conduct, statement or representation of the plaintiff.

"XVI. That Robert W. Major was a creditor of the Altruart Company and demanded of Hayter that he be paid a portion of the money which was paid to Hayter by Sackett in purchase of the Elms stock, and that Hayter refused this demand, and it was then, and only then, that Major represented to Sackett that the Altruist Company was not in good financial condition and that he might lose his money unless he stopped payment on the draft.

"XVII. That the plaintiff was a stranger to the transaction between Sackett and Hayter whereby Sackett purchased the Elms stock, and was not charged with any fraud or knowledge of any fraud, if such there was, as between Hayter and Sackett or between Major and Sackett, and that the plaintiff herein paid Hayter the full sum of $1,000 for said draft."

It thus appears from the findings of the trial court that, although the appellant was an officer of the corporation and was fully advised of its doubtful financial condition, and knew that the Elms stock was then worthless, and that the respondent Sackett gave a draft for $1,000 therefor, he was not a party to any wrongdoing. It was found, in effect, that he knew that the Elms stock, acquired by Hayter and by him sold to Sackett, was of prospective value, and that he was of the opinion and belief that with proper management the corporation might prove to be a profitable organization. Ingold paid Hayter the full sum of $1,000 for said draft, and had therefore indorsed the note which Hayter had given for the stock which the latter sold. Appellant "did not at any time, or at all, directly or indirectly, make any representation whatsoever of any kind or character to Sackett, and said Sackett was not induced to enter into the purchase of Elms' stock because of any actions, conduct, statement, or representations of the plaintiff." He "was a stranger to the transaction between Sackett and Hayter whereby Sackett purchased the Elms stock, and was not charged with any fraud or knowledge of any fraud."

[1] The foregoing was equivalent to finding that Ingold was a purchaser and holder of the draft in good faith and for value. Section 3133 of the Civil Code reads as follows:

"A holder in due course is a holder who has taken the instrument under the following conditions:

"(1) That it is complete and regular on its face;

"(2) That he became the holder of it before it was overdue, and without notice that it had been previously dishonored, if such was the fact;

"(3) That he took it in good faith and for value;

"(4) That at the time it was negotiated to him he had no notice of any infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating it."

[2, 3] Notwithstanding an attempted finding, numbered XIII, which is but a conclusion, the most that can be said of these findings is that appellant knew of the precarious condition of the corporation at the time, and that the stock then had no value. They do not pretend to find that the draft was irregular, that it was received by Ingold before it was overdue, that it had been previously dishonored, was received without good faith or value, paid by Ingold, or that he had notice of any infirmity in the draft or defect in Hayter's title to it. A lack of consideration for a draft, unaccompanied by any other element, such as fraud, would not constitute an infirmity in the instrument or a defect in the title of the person negotiating it. Faris v. Beck, 74 Colo. 480, 222 P. 652; Otis v. Culum, 92 U. S. 447, 23 L. Ed. 496.

[4] In their briefs respondents repeatedly assert that they alleged fraudulent representations and bad faith on the part of Ingold. They did, but the court's findings are directly opposed to these allegations, and so such assertions are of no consequence upon this appeal. Sackett gave the draft in question for the Elms stock. He received that stock. Undoubtedly he might sue the parties ex delicto who made the false statements to him, but as against Ingold, who is found to have had no connection with such fraud as was practiced, we hold that it is no defense that the stock which Sackett received was of no present or immediate value.

The judgment is reversed.

RICHARDSON v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY
et al. (Civ. 6851.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 1, 1929.

1. Mortgages $\S$ 544(3) — Although not party to foreclosure proceeding, assignee of purchaser at judicial sale held entitled to writ of assistance to let him into property.

Assignee of purchaser at judicial sale held entitled to writ of assistance to let him into possession of property, although not party to foreclosure proceeding.

2. Joint tenancy $\S$ 8—Joint tenant held not to have purchased at judicial sale for benefit of other joint tenant, where judgment which included foreclosure decree operated to terminate joint tenancy.

Where wife filed action against husband for purpose of terminating joint tenancy, and judgment, while including decree of foreclosure of mortgages existing on property, operated to terminate joint tenancy, by directing distribution of joint tenancy funds remaining after payment of mortgage liens, rule that joint tenant, who bids in property owned in joint tenancy at judgment sale, takes title for benefit of all joint tenants, not being applicable under such circumstances, wife held not to have purchased property bid in at judicial sale for benefit of husband.

3. Husband and wife ⇨131(1)—Under statute, property bid in by wife at foreclosure sale was presumed to be wife's separate estate (Civ. Code, § 164).

Under express provisions of Civ. Code, § 164, property bid in by wife at foreclosure sale was presumed to be her separate estate.

4. Husband and wife ⇨122—Property bought in at foreclosure sale by wife, not living with husband, became her separate property; "accumulation" (Civ. Code, § 169).

Where wife and husband were living separate and apart at time wife bid in property at foreclosure sale, such property became separate property of wife, being an "accumulation," provided by Civ. Code, § 169.

5. Mandamus ⇨187(9)—Absent contrary evidence, presumption that judgment including foreclosure decree had become final obtained on application to District Court of Appeal for mandate requiring issuance of writ of assistance.

On application for writ of assistance to let assignee of purchaser at judicial sale into possession of property, District Court of Appeal presumed, in absence of evidence to contrary, that judgment which included foreclosure decree had become final, and that assignee was entitled to be put in possession of any rights he had under such judgment.

Application by R. W. Richardson for a writ of mandate, to be directed to the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Los Angeles, J. Walter Hanby, Judge, and L. E. Lampton, Clerk, to require issuance of writ of assistance. Writ granted.

James H. O'Neill, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

E. W. Mattoon, County Counsel, L. K. Vobayda, Deputy County Counsel, and J. Everett Brown, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. Petition for a writ of mandate to compel the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Los Angeles, and J. Walter Hanby, judge of said court, to order L. E. Lampton, county clerk of Los Angeles county, to issue a writ of assistance, directed to the sheriff of Los Angeles county, to let petitioner into the possession of certain real property sold under a foreclosure sale and conveyed to the petitioner by sheriff's deed, and to compel L. E. Lampton, clerk of said court, to issue such writ.

It appears from the amended petition that in June, 1925, Grace E. Jones, then being the wife of Frank Jones, brought action in the superior court, in and for the county of Los Angeles, seeking a partition of the real property, which is the subject of this proceeding, and which the said Grace E. Jones alleged was owned by herself and her husband, Frank Jones, as joint tenants. In addition, the plaintiff asked for an accounting of the rents collected by her husband, Frank Jones, from the joint property. Earl L. Jones, son of Frank Jones, was joined with his father as defendant, it being alleged that he was the holder of two mortgages which were liens upon the property.

Frank Jones filed an answer denying all of the material allegations of the complaint, except that he and plaintiff were husband and wife. Earl L. Jones, with his answer, also filed a cross-complaint, asking for a decree of foreclosure of the two mortgages. It also appears from the record that at the time of the filing of this action, and continuously during the proceeding, plaintiff, Grace E. Jones, and defendant Frank Jones, did not live together as husband and wife, but were living separate and apart; the plaintiff, Grace E. Jones, depending for her support upon her own efforts.

The court found that the plaintiff and defendant were joint owners of the property in question; that the plaintiff was entitled to an accounting from her husband, Frank Jones, on account of the rents collected by him from the property, and upon such accounting found that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment against her husband for the sum of $472.44. The court also found that the mortgages held by Earl L. Jones constituted a first lien upon the property. The judgment and decree of the court was that the property be sold by the sheriff, and that out of the proceeds derived from the sale the mortgage liens were first to be satisfied; that the surplus, if any, remaining in the hands of the sheriff, was to be divided equally between the plaintiff, Grace E. Jones, and her husband, Frank Jones: Provided, however, that Grace E. Jones was to have a lien on the share of Frank Jones in said surplus to the extent of the amount of her judgment against him for $472.44.

The record discloses that the property was sold in accordance with the decree of the court, that the mortgage liens were paid in full, and that there remained from the proceeds of the sale a surplus of $3,422.92, which sum was distributed in accordance with the decree and judgment of the court; Frank Jones receipting to the sheriff for the amount payable and paid to him. At the time of the foreclosure sale, plaintiff Grace E. Jones, bid in the property and received from the sheriff a certificate of sale therefor. This certificate was immediately thereafter assigned and transferred by Grace E. Jones to the petitioner herein, it being alleged in the petition that the funds used by the said Grace E. Jones in purchasing and paying for said property at said sale were furnished by the petitioner.

Upon the expiration of the period of redemption, the sheriff executed and delivered to petitioner a deed to the premises, the grantee in said deed being the petitioner, which deed was duly recorded in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county. Petitioner thereupon presented his sheriff's deed to and demanded of Frank Jones the possession of said premises, he having continued to occupy the said premises during the entire foreclosure proceedings and the period of redemption. This demand was refused by Jones, whereupon petitioner made demand of L. E. Lampton, county clerk of Los Angeles county, for a writ of assistance, directed to the sheriff of Los Angeles county, to let petitioner into possession of the property in question, which demand was refused. Upon the refusal of the county clerk to issue the writ, petitioner filed application with the superior court for a writ of mandate to compel the county clerk to issue such writ of assistance. The matter came on before the court upon notice, and after a hearing, at which Frank Jones and his counsel resisted the issuance of the writ, the court refused to issue the writ. Thereupon the petitioner applied to this court for a writ of mandate.

In response to the alternative writ issued, respondents filed a general demurrer to the petition and also an answer. The answer denies, upon information and belief, that any of the money paid by Grace E. Jones toward the purchase price of the property at the sheriff's sale was furnished or paid by R. W. Richardson, the petitioner, and also denies, upon information and belief, that the petitioner either presented to Frank Jones the sheriff's deed or demanded of Frank Jones the surrender of possession of the property in question. In addition, respondents in their answer assert four separate defenses, which may be stated briefly as follows:

(1) That, because the petitioner was not a party to the partition and foreclosure proceedings in the superior court, he is not entitled to apply for or receive the aid of this court in the form of a writ of mandate to put him in possession of the property.

(2) That, inasmuch as the property in question was at the time of the filing of the partition action the joint property of Grace E. Jones and her husband, Frank Jones, when Grace E. Jones became the purchaser of the property at the foreclosure sale she took title as trustee for the joint tenancy.

(3) That the purchase price paid by Grace E. Jones for the property at the sheriff's sale was the community property of Frank Jones and Grace E. Jones, and hence the property so acquired at the sale became the community property of Grace E. Jones and Frank Jones.

(4) That there is another action pending in the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles, wherein the property here involved is the subject of litigation.

Respondents present in their briefs no particular argument in support of their general demurrer, but content themselves with citing the same authorities that they cite in support of their four separate defenses. We therefore assume that a discussion of the points recited in the separate defenses will cover the points involved in their demurrer.

[1] There is no merit in the first point urged that the petitioner herein is not entitled to be heard upon an application for a writ of mandate because he was not a party to the partition and foreclosure suit in the superior court. The only case cited by respondents in support of this contention is that of Langley v. Voll, 54 Cal. 435, wherein the department opinion was modified by the court in bank by eliminating that portion which declared that a grantee of a purchaser of real property at a judgment sale was not entitled to a writ of assistance to let him into the property, on the ground that a determination of that question was not necessary to support the decision.

On the other hand, in the case of Sullivan v. Superior Court, 135 Cal. 133, 195 P. 1061, it was held that the purchaser at a sale, although not a party in the foreclosure proceeding, is entitled to a writ of assistance to obtain possession of the property purchased, and that a writ of mandate will issue directing the issuance of such writ of assistance. The court in the Sullivan Case points out a provision in the judgment and decree of foreclosure, which is similar to that contained in the degree of foreclosure under which the property here involved was sold, which reads as follows:

"It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the purchaser or purchasers of said mortgaged premises under said mortgages at such sale be let into possession thereof and that any of the parties to this action who may be in possession of said premises, or any part thereof, and any person who, since the commencement of said action has come into possession under them or either of them, deliver possession thereof to such purchaser or purchasers on the production of the sheriff's deed for such premises or any part thereof."

While it is true that the petitioner herein was not himself a purchaser of the property at the sale, there would seem to be neither reason nor rhyme in holding that a purchaser at a sale would be entitled to a writ of assistance to gain possession of the property, but that the assignee or grantee of the purchaser should not have the aid of the arm of the court to be placed into possession of property which has been duly deeded to him by the sheriff upon a proper transfer and assignment of the sheriff's certificate.

[2] Respondents' second defense is based upon the equitable proposition that a joint tenant, who bids in the property owned in joint tenancy at a judgment sale, takes title for the benefit of all of the joint tenants. But this rule is not applicable to the instant case, for the reason that the action filed by Grace E. Jones against her husband, Frank Jones, was for the very purpose of terminating the joint tenancy, and the judgment of the court, while including a decree of foreclosure of the mortgages, operated to terminate the joint tenancy by directing the distribution of the joint tenancy funds remaining after payment of the mortgage liens. The record shows that each of the joint tenants received his respective share as decreed by the court. The joint tenancy having been terminated by judicial decree, the case of Huntington v. Perrin, 65 Cal. App. 20, 223 P. 94, cited by respondents, is not in point.

[3] It is next urged that, when Grace E. Jones bid in the property, she then being the wife of Frank Jones, the money which she used to pay for the property is presumed to be community funds, and that hence the property she acquired became community property. Petitioner's answer to this contention is, first, that under section 164, Civil Code, "whenever any * * * property, * * * is acquired by a married woman by an instrument in writing, the presumption is that the same is her separate property." Heney v. Pesoli, 109 Cal. 53, 41 P. 819; Jordan v. Fay, 98 Cal. 264, 33 P. 95; Union Oil Co. v. Stewart, 158 Cal. 149, 110 P. 313, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 567.

[4] A second answer is that, it appearing from the record that Grace E. Jones and her husband, Frank Jones, were living separate and apart at the time Grace E. Jones bought in the property at the foreclosure sale, this property would become the separate property of Grace E. Jones, in that it would be an "accumulation," as provided by section 169, Civil Code. The Supreme Court of this state, in the case of Union Oil Co. v. Stewart, 158 Cal. 149, 110 P. 313, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 567, interprets the term "accumulation" as applying to the acquisition of property by grant deed during the time a wife lives separate and apart from her husband.

The respondents state their fourth and last defense to the issuance of the writ as follows: "That there is another action pending between the parties hereto, to wit, Frank Jones v.

Grace E. Jones and R. W. Richardson, being action No. 76227, and that the subject-matter of this writ is being litigated in said action."

[5] Respondents do not elaborate this statement by suggesting that either by practice or authority this court is precluded from granting the relief prayed for by petitioner, because of the other pending action. Nor are we aware of any rule or authority that would preclude granting the relief prayed for, if upon the facts of the case the petitioner is entitled to relief. There is nothing in the brief statement presented in respondents' answer which would enable this court to conclude that the relief here prayed for would or could be granted in the action now pending in the superior court. Whether the action pending is one for divorce, with the determination of the property rights of the parties as a collateral issue, or whether it is one in which some other question affecting the title to the property is involved, we are unable to determine. In any event, so far as the case of Grace E. Jones, as plaintiff, against Frank Jones and Earl L. Jones, as defendants, is concerned, we must presume, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that the judgment has become final, and that petitioner is entitled to be put in possession of any rights he may have which flow from the judgment.

We therefore conclude that the demurrer of respondents to the petition is without merit and should be overruled, that the petitioner is entitled to the relief prayed for, and that a peremptory writ of mandate should issue to L. E. Lampton, county clerk of Los Angeles county, and clerk of the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Los Angeles, requiring him to issue to petitioner a writ of assistance in accordance with the terms of the decree of foreclosure and sale in the case of Grace E. Jones v. Frank Jones and Earl L. Jones, being case No. 171492 in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Los Angeles, directed to the sheriff of Los Angeles county, directing him to let petitioner into the possession of the property described in said decree of foreclosure.

Let the peremptory writ issue.

RATH v. BANKSTON et al. (Civ. 6238.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 17, 1929.

1. Automobiles ⇨244(14)—Where automobile collided with stalled truck, findings that truck driver was present and tail-light on trailer was lit held supported by evidence.

In action for injuries received when automobile in which plaintiff was riding collided with stalled truck which had run out of gasoline, findings that driver of truck was present at scene of accident, and that tail-light on rear of trailer was lit, held supported by evidence that when truck stopped driver walked back to make sure lantern was lit and that globe was clean, and that he remained there up to moment of accident flagging approaching cars with his arms.

2. Automobiles ⇨148—Automobile driver must have car equipped with adequate brakes and maintained in such condition that it may not become menace to other traffic, but is not necessarily negligent where unforeseen failure of equipment occurs.

Automobile driver is not necessarily negligent as matter of law if unforeseen failure of part of equipment occurs, although, generally speaking, it is duty of automobile driver on public highway to see that car is properly equipped with brakes and maintained in such condition as to mechanical efficiency and fuel supply that it may not become menace to or obstruction of other traffic.

3. Automobiles ⇨152—Truck driver's failure to maintain sufficient fuel in gasoline tank held excusable, where same procedure as to refilling tank was sufficient on previous trips.

In action for injuries resulting when automobile collided with stalled truck, failure of truck driver to maintain sufficient fuel in truck's gasoline tank held excusable, where same procedure as to refilling tank had been found sufficient on previous trips of same and similar trucks over same route, since law does not require driver who has put in sufficient fuel to alight at intervals to examine gasoline supply at risk of being held guilty of negligence as matter of law if he fails to discover it is nearly exhausted.

4. Negligence ⇨65—Unless defendant is negligent there can be no "contributory negligence" by plaintiff.

Where there is no negligence on part of defendant there can be no such thing as contributory negligence on part of plaintiff, since "contributory negligence" is such act or omission of plaintiff, amounting to want of ordinary care, as concurring or co-operating with negligent act of defendant, is proximate cause of injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Contributory Negligence.]

5. Automobiles ⇨244(56)—Evidence held insufficient to show negligence of guest in car colliding with stalled truck.

In action for injury arising from collision of automobile with stalled truck, evidence held insufficient to show any negligence on part of plaintiff who was guest in car which collided with truck, but had no control or direction over its route or manner of driving it.

6. Negligence ⇨93(1)—Negligence of automobile driver held not imputable to guest.

Negligence of automobile driver in driving his car into stalled truck equipped with red lantern visible for ordinary city block is not imputable to guest riding with him.

7. Appeal and error ⇨1071(1)—Erroneous finding of contributory negligence is immaterial, where finding that defendant was not negligent was proper.

In action for injuries in automobile collision, error in finding plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence held immaterial, where finding that defendant was not negligent was proper.

8. Appeal and error ⇨690(2)—Court cannot be said to have abused discretion in refusing certain evidence, where record does not show such testimony was offered.

On appeal, trial court cannot be said to have abused discretion in refusing to allow plaintiff to introduce certain evidence after reopening of case to take additional testimony, where record does not show that such testimony was offered or excluded.

9. New trial ⇨105—Refusal of new trial for newly discovered evidence contradicting testimony of witness relative to maneuvering of stalled truck held proper.

In action for injuries in automobile collision in which car in which plaintiff rode collided with stalled truck, new trial for newly discovered evidence showing truck could have been backed to curb, and that testimony as to impossibility of such maneuver was therefore false, held properly refused, since evidence designed merely to impeach or contradict adverse witnesses is not proper basis for new trial, especially where affidavits showed test was made before case was reopened.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Action by May Rath against George M. Bankston and another, doing business as Bankston Bros. Truck Company. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

MacDonald & Thompson and Frankley & Spray, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

David D. Stuart and Hubert Starr, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

BURNELL, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff herein appeals from a judgment for the defendants in an action for damages for personal injuries sustained by reason of a collision between the automobile in which she was riding as a guest and a truck and trailer owned and operated by defendants.

The accident occurred at about 4:30 a. m. of March 7, 1925. Appellant, a young woman, had gone out for a drive with one Clarence Habecker. Starting from Los Angeles at about 8 o'clock in the evening of the preceding day they had driven to Santa Monica in Habecker's touring car and to a point somewhere on the highway running northwest of Santa Monica and along the ocean shore. Here the car was parked for several hours while the two young people "watched the waves." Whether or not the waves were wild, and what, if anything, they were saying does not appear in the record before us nor is it pertinent to the issues in the case. They started on their homeward journey shortly after midnight, but were compelled to stop en route to Los Angeles for repairs to a broken gas line, so that it was about half past 4 in the morning when they reached the vicinity of the intersection of Coronado street with Sunset boulevard in that city, along which latter thoroughfare Habecker was driving in an easterly direction. Appellant was seated in the front seat of the automobile beside Habecker, in a reclining position, when the crash occurred. The three-ton truck of respondents, with a five-ton trailer attached to it, had run out of gasoline and had been left where it stopped when that occurred, on the south side of Sunset boulevard, between Coronado and Waterloo streets, "at a point about five feet south of the southerly car track on said Sunset boulevard"—to quote from the findings. The court found that at the time of the collision a red tail-light was burning at the rear of the trailer. There was also testimony that the truck driver was standing at the rear of the trailer, waving his arms to signal approaching traffic. Into the rear end of the trailer the car driven by Habecker crashed, with the result that appellant received severe and, in all probability, permanent injuries. The court found, also, that at the time and place of the accident "the sun had not risen and was not shining, the street lamps were not lighted; the weather was clear and it was sufficiently light so that said truck and trailer were visible for a distance of one hundred and twenty feet or more away, and the tail-light on said trailer was visible for at least one ordinary city block toward the rear."

Appellant insists as grounds for a reversal that certain of the findings are unsupported by, and, indeed, are contrary to, the evidence. The findings thus attacked may be briefly summarized as follows: First, that the truck became disabled and stopped without any negligence on the part of defendants; second, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence; and, third, that the leaving of the truck in the street was not the proximate cause of the collision. Appellant further urges that the court abused its discretion in refusing to allow her to introduce certain testimony as to the feasibility of moving the truck and trailer after the reopening of the case for the purpose of taking some additional evidence, and that a new trial should have been granted on the ground of newly discovered evidence.

The testimony as to the stopping of the truck and its presence in the street is uncontradicted and is substantially as follows: The truck and trailer, driven by one Case, who was in the employ of respondents, left Santa Barbara for Los Angeles about 10 o'clock of the day preceding the accident. It was returning empty, after delivering a load of water pipe. When the truck left Los Angeles on its northerly trip the gasoline tank was filled to its capacity of 30 gallons, and at Ventura, which is approximately 65 miles from Los Angeles, 15 gallons more were added. On the return trip the fuel supply was again replenished at Ventura, and the tank contained 25 gallons when the truck left that city. This was the method ordinarily followed by Case and defendants' other driver engaged in heavy hauling between Los Angeles and Santa Barbara, and on no previous occasion had a truck run out of gasoline. In fact, between 5 and 10 gallons usually remained in the tanks on arrival back in Los Angeles. On this particular trip, however, the truck ran out of gasoline while proceeding along Sunset boulevard, stopping quite suddenly at the point where, about 5 minutes later, the automobile in which appellant was riding crashed into it. There was no evidence as to any leakage from the gasoline tank, breakage of the gas line, or other mechanical defect in or about the truck. It was equipped with a forced feed system, with an air gauge to indicate the pressure of gasoline flowing into the carbureter, and just prior to its stopping this gauge had registered a pressure of three pounds. The driver of the truck had no warning that it was about to run out of gasoline until it "just stopped all of a sudden * * * just like turning the switch off," and the air gauge "just went down in a second." The driver immediately set his brakes, the truck and trailer then being at the point hereinabove described. Here there is a slight grade down hill from east to west. The driver testified that it would have been impossible to have released the brake and allowed the truck to coast down and to the right-hand or southerly curb, because "you can't steer your trailer," and that in order to bring the two vehicles to the curb the trailer would have had to be disengaged from the truck and manipulated by one man while another would have been required at the brakes "to keep the trailer from getting away."

[1] While there is some conflict in the evidence as to the presence of the driver at the scene of the accident and as to the tail-light on the rear of the trailer, the findings of the court as to these matters are amply supported by testimony that when the truck stopped the driver at once walked back "to make sure my lantern was lit," and that he found that it was, and that the globe (it was a kerosene lantern with a red globe) was clean, and that he remained there up to the moment of the accident, flagging approaching cars with his arms. He further testified that he saw the car driven by appellant's friend when it was about two blocks away and "waved at him when he was half a block away," and that he was then going "faster than the other machines that came along there," and between 35 and 40 miles per hour; also that the impact pushed the truck and trailer "ahead about three or four feet and jack-knifed" them. The truck driver also testified that he was expecting another truck and trailer, which was making the same trip with him, to come along and assist him, but that the driver of the other truck had taken a different route after arriving at Hollywood boulevard and had gotten ahead of him, so that while this route also led by the scene of the collision his companion driver had passed it a few minutes prior to the arrival of the truck involved in the accident, which, as we have said, occurred about 5 minutes after the truck had stopped.

It is in evidence that at the time of the accident there was in effect an ordinance of the city of Los Angeles making it unlawful "for the operator of a vehicle to stand said vehicle * * * at any place in the roadway where the two right wheels of the vehicle are more than one foot distant from the regularly established curb line. * * *" If, in view of the testimony above summarized, we are to hold that the court was in error in its findings of lack of negligence on the part of respondents, we must do so on the theory that it is negligence as a matter of law for the operator of a motor vehicle to allow it to run out of fuel under any and all circumstances. This we are not prepared to do.

[2] Generally speaking, it is the duty of one driving a motor vehicle along a public highway to see that it is properly equipped so that it may be at all times controlled to the end that it be not a menace to the safety of others or of their property. The law requires that such a vehicle be equipped with brakes adequate to its quick stopping when necessary for the safety of its occupants or of others, and it is equally essential that it be maintained in such a condition as to mechanical efficiency and fuel supply that it may not become a menace to, or an obstruction of, other traffic by stopping on the road. But if the person in charge of such vehicle has done all that can be reasonably expected of a person of ordinary prudence to see that his vehicle is in proper condition, and an unforeseen failure of a part of his equipment occurs, it does not necessarily follow that he must be deemed guilty of negligence as a matter of law. This view is well illustrated by the case of Giorgetti v. Wollaston, 83 Cal. App. 358, 257 P. 109, 110. There one of the plaintiffs had been riding in a Ford truck driven by her husband. The front lamps commenced to grow dim, whereupon the husband stopped the truck "on the right-hand side and off the paved portion of the highway, with the exception that the left wheels rested thereon 6 or 7 inches from the edge." He alighted, adjusted the lamps, consuming from 7 to 10 minutes in so doing, and then passed around the vehicle, on the side resting on the pavement, to the rear. While so doing he was struck by the defendant's machine, which also collided with the truck, and as a result both the plaintiffs received physical injuries. The Motor Vehicle Act in force at the time of the accident contained a section reading as follows: "No person shall leave standing, or cause or permit to be left standing upon the main traveled portion of any public highway, a vehicle undergoing repair, or which has been stopped for the purpose of having repairs made thereon, or for the purpose of camping; provided, however, that this provision shall not apply to a vehicle which shall be disabled, while on such main traveled portion of the highway, in such manner and to such extent that it shall be impossible to avoid stopping such vehicle on said main traveled portion of the highway, and impracticable to remove the same therefrom until repairs shall have been made." Section 20(w), as added by St. 1919, p. 219. The testimony was conflicting as to whether it would have been practicable, on the night of the accident, to have moved the truck entirely off the pavement. The appellant, contending that respondents were guilty of contributory negligence, relied on the facts that (a) there was no tail-light on the truck; (b) that the car had been stopped and left on the paved portion of the highway because of the failure of the headlights, and that to so leave it was negligence. Answering the contention the court said: "The defect in the headlights of the truck, which led respondents to stop, was, as fairly appears from their testimony, due to a condition which developed a few minutes before the car was stopped and was not caused by a lack of due care on their part; but the absence of lights either in front or in the rear rendered the operation of the truck at the hour mentioned unlawful, and it was the duty of respondents to remove the same from the main traveled portion of the highway. Motor Vehicle Act, §§ 13 and 20 (w). The failure of any person to perform a duty imposed upon him by law raises a presumption of negligence, and if such negligence proximately contributes to his injury, he cannot recover. McKune v. Santa Clara, etc., Co., supra [110 Cal.] p. 486 (42 P. 980); Berkovitz v. American River Gravel Co., 191 Cal. 195, 215 P. 675; Shimoda v. Bundy, 24 Cal. App. 675, 142 P. 109. This presumption, however, is not conclusive, but may be overcome by evidence that the failure was excusable or justifiable under the circumstances and not inconsistent with the exercise of due care.

Berkovitz v. Am. River Gravel Co., supra; Cragg v. Los Angeles Trust Co., 154 Cal. 663, 667, 98 P. 1063, 16 Ann. Cas. 1061; Harris v. Johnson, 174 Cal. 55, 161 P. 1155, L. R. A. 1917C, 477, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 560; Dewhurst v. Leopold, 194 Cal. 424, 229 P. 30; Western Indemnity Co. v. Wasco Land & Stock Co., 51 Cal. App. 672, 197 P. 390; Graybiel v. Auger, 64 Cal. App. 679, 222 P. 635; Mitsuda v. Isbell, 71 Cal. App. 221, 234 P. 928. In the instant case it does not appear that the time consumed in adjusting the lamps was unreasonable, and, as stated, there was testimony which, if believed by the jury, tended to show that the condition of the highway east of the pavement was such at the time of the accident as to render it impracticable to remove the truck farther in that direction." The judgment for plaintiff was affirmed, and a hearing in the Supreme Court was denied.

[3] So in the present case we cannot say that the learned trial judge was unjustified in regarding the failure of respondents to maintain sufficient fuel in the truck's gasoline tank as excusable under the circumstances, bearing in mind that exactly the same procedure as to refilling the tank was followed as had been found sufficient on previous trips of the same and similar trucks over the same route. Whether gasoline had been syphoned from the tank by some thief while the driver was at dinner after taking on gas at Ventura, as suggested by respondents, is but a matter of speculation with no foundation in any of the evidence in the record. The fact remains that the truck had reached its destination in Los Angeles on previous trips with several gallons unexpended. We do not think the law requires that the driver of a motor vehicle, who has seen to it that his car contains the amount of fuel which his past experience has found over-sufficient for the journey in hand, should alight at intervals to examine his gasoline supply at the risk of being held guilty of negligence as a matter of law if he fails to discover that it is nearly exhausted. We are fortified in this line of reasoning by that of the opinion of the Supreme Court in Berkovitz v. American River Gravel Co., 191 Cal. 195, 215 P. 675, 677, which case, like that of Giorgetti v. Wollaston, supra, is also authority for the statement that violation of an ordinance is not conclusive proof of negligence, but may be excused where it appears that such violation was unintentional and justifiable under the circumstances. We quote from the opinion: "Defendant's proposed instruction No. 14, which was refused by the court, among other things, stated: 'Unless you believe from the evidence that defendant failed to use reasonable or ordinary care to keep said lamp [the tail light] lighted, and that said failure, if such you believe there was, directly and proximately caused or contributed to the collision,' the plaintiff cannot recover. The court gave instruction No. 5, proposed by plaintiff, as follows: 'You are instructed that the law of this state required at the time of the collision every motor truck while on the public highway during the period from one-half hour after sunset of one day to one-half hour before sunrise of the next day to carry at the rear a lighted lamp exhibiting a red light. If you believe from all the evidence in this case that the motor truck belonging to the defendant was being driven by the agent of the defendant in the course of his employment during this period of time without such a lighted lamp, then the defendant was guilty of negligence, and if you believe that the plaintiff, Virginia Berkovitz, was, without fault on her part, injured by reason thereof, your verdict should be in favor of the plaintiff.' Instruction No. 5 is a correct statement of the law in most cases where the violation of a statute is charged. By the exercise of ordinary care, the driver of a motor vehicle at night would always know whether the headlights were burning and in such a case instruction No. 5 would be strictly accurate. The tail light, however, is not in the immediate view of the driver, whose attention is ordinarily directed ahead, and it cannot be the intention of the law that a watchman must be maintained over the rear light to observe whether it is constantly burning. It is well known that with the best of care coal oil lights, as well as electric lights, sometimes go out. If one drives a motor vehicle in the night time when he knows, or in the exercise of ordinary care ought to know, that the tail light is not burning, he is guilty of negligence. While ignorance of the law is no excuse, ignorance of the fact, where ordinary care has been exercised, is a sufficient excuse. Violation of an ordinance 'is presumptively an act of negligence and conclusively so until rebutted by evidence that it was justifiable or excusable under the circumstances.' Mora v. Favilla, 186 Cal. 199, 199 Pac. 17; [Harris v. Johnson, 174 Cal. 55, 58, 61 P. 1155, L. R. A. 1917C, 477, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 560]; Gooding v. Chutes Co., 155 Cal. [620] 622, 102 Pac. 819, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1071, 18 Ann. Cas. 671; Cragg v. Los Angeles Trust Co., 154 Cal. [663] 667, 98 Pac. 1063, 16 Ann. Cas. 1061; Baddeley v. Shea, 114 Cal. 6, 45 Pac. 990, 33 L. R. A. 747, 55 Am. St. Rep. 56. 'The only question remaining open on this point is whether conclusive proof of the violation of such a statute or ordinance is also conclusive proof of negligence. Some courts have held that it is, and some that it is not. But the true rule is perfectly plain. The violation of such a law, left without explanation or excuse, is conclusive of negligence, but it may be excused. * * * If some good excuse appears which would be a sufficient defense to an action for the penalty imposed by the law * * * then the law is not really violated. * * * We find but few cases in which this is clearly stated; but they deserve to take precedence of all the others, as they reconcile the principle upon which the others were actually decided.' Shearman & Redfield on Neg. § 467. The defendant was entitled to an instruction embodying, as did this one, the substance of the rule as herein stated. If the jury believed the testimony of the driver to the effect that the tail light was burning three or four blocks east of the place of the accident, they might have concluded, under proper instructions, that he was not guilty of negligence even though the light was out when the collision occurred."

This case is not parallel with Keiper v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 36 Cal. App. 362, 172 P. 180; Flynn v. Bledsoe Co. (Cal. App.) 267 P. 887, or Winsky v. De Mandel (Cal. Sup.) 266 P. 534, in all of which the collision producing the injury was with a vehicle left standing in the street. In the first of these cases the defendant, "without any cause or reason for so doing, other than his desire to step across the street into a garage," had left his automobile "standing unoccupied and unattended upon and across" a street car track in the middle of a city street, without even setting its brakes. In the second case a truck over 18 feet in length had been parked at an angle of almost 90 degrees with the curb on a heavily traveled street 52 feet wide, the portion of which available for traffic at the time being reduced to about 40 feet by a pile of building material in front of a building being erected on the opposite side of the street. This was in violation of an ordinance requiring parking at an angle of approximately 45 degrees. In the third case above referred to a laundry truck had been left by its driver standing in a street intersection in an angular position and directly in the path of pedestrian travel, and the plaintiff, forced to go around it to cross the street, had been struck by another automobile. In none of these cases was there the slightest justification or excuse shown for a willful and deliberate violation of the law.

We are satisfied that the court below committed no error in finding that respondents were not guilty of contributory negligence.

[4-6] While our determination of the matter above considered must of necessity decide this appeal, we do not desire it to be understood that we approve of the trial court's finding on the subject of appellant's alleged contributory negligence. It is erroneous for two reasons: First, because there can properly be no finding that a plaintiff is guilty of contributory negligence where the defendant has been found guilty of no primary negligence. The two are utterly inconsistent. Second, because in our opinion there is no evidence to support such a finding in this case.

Taking up the first of these reasons, we find that "contributory negligence" is defined as "such an act or omission on the part of the plaintiff, amounting to a want of ordinary care, as concurring or cooperating with the negligent act of the defendant, is a proximate cause or occasion of the injury complained of." Beach on Contributory Negligence, p. 7; Wardlaw v. California Ry. Co., 5 Cal. Unrep. 225, 42 P. 1075; Gaster v. Hinkley, 85 Cal. App. 55, 258 P. 988. (Italics ours.) When, therefore, there is, as found by the court below, no negligence on the part of the defendant, there can be no such thing as contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. Murray v. Southern Pacific Co. (C. C. A.) 236 F. 704; Gatliff Coal Co. v. Sumner, 196 Ky. 592, 245 S. W. 144; Ballew v. Asheville, etc., Ry. Co., 186 N. C. 704, 120 S. E. 334; Ross v. St. Louis & S. F. Ry. Co., 93 Kan. 517, 144 P. 844.

Furthermore, we find no evidence to support the finding. The plaintiff was a guest in Habecker's car, having no control or direction over its route or the manner of driving it. The manifest negligence of Habecker in driving his car into the trailer equipped with a red lantern visible for an ordinary city block is not imputable to her. The facts disclosed by the record in this case are closely akin to those in the very recent case of Marchetti v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. Sup.) 269 P. 529, 530, where the deceased, for whose death damages were sought to be recovered, had been riding as a guest in his employer's foreman's automobile when the latter collided with a train of defendant company. A nonsuit had been granted in the trial court "solely upon the ground that the evidence showed that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence which proximately caused his death." Reversing the order granting the nonsuit the court said: "The evidence bearing upon this point was undisputed. The deceased was riding with Connors under the latter's direction, and had no control whatever over the operation of the automobile in which they were riding. There can be no question of Connors' negligence in driving the machine on to the railroad crossing without taking the proper precautions to observe whether a train was or was not approaching. The negligence of the driver of a machine, however, cannot be imputed to a passenger therein, in the absence of any evidence showing that the latter exercised some control over the driver or that he possessed the power to supervise or direct the manner in which the automobile should be operated. Bryant v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 737, 164 P. 385; Irwin v. Golden State Auto Tour Corp., 178 Cal. 10, 171 P. 1059; Nichols v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 178 Cal. 630, 174 P. 319. In this case there was no such evidence. The deceased, as we have before stated, was simply going with Connors, in the latter's machine, for the purpose of attending to some matter of business regarding their employer's property. Connors was the foreman of his employer, and the deceased was subject to his orders. Connors had entire control of the machine, and was operating the same without any assistance or direction on the part of the deceased. If the deceased, therefore, was guilty of contributory negligence, it must have been by some act either of commission or omission on his part which of itself constituted contributory negligence. There was no evidence in the case tending to show any such act of negligence on the part of the deceased. All the witnesses agree that the deceased was simply sitting in the machine at the side of Connors, and that he was looking straight ahead of him while they were traveling along A street and just before their machine collided with the defendants' train. No witness testified, nor is there any evidence from which it may be inferred, that the deceased exercised or attempted to exercise any control or direction over the operation of the automobile by Connors. Respondents argue, however, that the evidence shows that, as the deceased was looking straight ahead, he could not have been looking to his left and along the railroad track on which the train was approaching, and that this failure of the deceased to look for the approaching train constituted contributory negligence on his part, which would defeat a recovery in this action. This argument, we think, is satisfactorily and completely answered by the following statement of the law on this subject, found in 3 Cal. Jur., pp. 853 and 854: 'A passenger in a motor vehicle approaching a railway crossing is under no legal obligation to warn the driver, either of the presence of the tracks or of an approaching train; the view being unobstructed and the driver reasonably competent and vigilant. And, while it is the passenger's duty to look and listen, it is not his duty to stop for a successful observation, since he has no authority over the driver, but is wholly subject to the latter's action. The passenger has a right to suppose that the driver, on approaching a railway crossing with which he is familiar, will exercise due care for the protection and safety of his passengers, and that, even when so near the crossing as to be in apparent danger of collision with an on-coming train, he will or may take some action which will avert an accident. Nor is the passenger obliged, even when the danger of collision becomes suddenly imminent, to displace the driver, seize the operating levers, and endeavor to avoid the impending catastrophe. Nevertheless, it has been said that the passenger must look out for himself, and may not, in a place of danger, as on approaching a railway crossing, rely blindly on the driver. But a passenger in a machine operated by another cannot be said as a matter of law to have been negligent in not calling the chauffeur's attention to the danger of a collision.' Respondents contend that under the authority of Thompson v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 P. 709, and Parmenter v. McDougall, 172 Cal. 306, 156 P. 460, that a passenger in a vehicle operated by another is bound to exercise ordinary care for his own safety, and that, if such passenger is aware that the operator is carelessly rushing into danger, it may be incumbent upon him to take steps for his safety. These cases undoubtedly contain a correct statement of the law upon the subject of a passenger's duty in case of known danger. They have little or no application to the present case, for the reason that it does not appear that there was anything that could have been done by the deceased which would have averted the collision."

[7] We deem the decision from which we have just quoted decisive on this point. The error in finding appellant guilty of contributory negligence is, however, immaterial in view of our conclusion that the finding as to nonnegligence of the respondent is proper and controls the case on this appeal.

[8] Appellant urges that the court below abused its discretion "in refusing to allow plaintiff to show the truck and trailer could readily have been moved, after a reopening of the case to take certain additional testimony." It appears from the reporter's transcript that after the case was submitted it was upon motion of plaintiff reopened and the testimony of an alleged eyewitness to the accident was taken. No questions were propounded to this witness as to the feasibility of moving the truck and trailer, and the record does not show that any testimony whatever relating to this subject was offered by appellant or excluded by the court. This completely disposes of this point.

[9] Appellant next urges that a new trial should have been granted on the ground of newly discovered evidence. The affidavits in support of this motion are to the effect that appellant's counsel hired a truck and trailer similar to those involved in the accident, and by experimenting with them at the scene thereof determined that they could readily be backed to the curb, and hence that the testimony of the witness Case as to the impossibility of this maneuver was false. Apart from the fact that the affidavits failed to disclose facts showing that the evidence referred to therein could not have been discovered in time for presentation at the trial, had appellant's counsel used due diligence in preparing the case, we are of the opinion that the court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion for a new trial on the grounds stated. Newly discovered evidence, designed merely to impeach or contradict the testimony of adverse witnesses, is not a proper basis upon which to grant a new trial. Waer v. Waer, 189 Cal. 178, 207 P. 891; Hanton v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 178 Cal. 616, 174 P. 61; Chalmers v. Sheehy, 132 Cal. 459, 64 P. 709, 84 Am. St. Rep. 62; Wood v. Moulton, 146 Cal. 317, 80 P. 92; People v. Anthony, 56 Cal. 397. The fact that Case swore falsely (assuming such to be the fact merely for argument's sake) would not justify the contention that appellant was taken by surprise by his testimony. There is nothing to show that she was led to believe that his testimony would be other than it was, or that she did not have ample time to prepare to meet every issue of fact relevant to the cause. As said in Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 25 P. 970, 971, 13 L. R. A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159, a litigant at the trial "must be prepared to meet and expose perjury then and there." The testimony of Case was given on May 21, 1926, and it would seem that appellant had ample time to make any inquiries as to its probable truth or falsity, as well as any actual test on the ground between that time and May 24 when she rested her case. Moreover, the affidavits on motion for new trial show that the "test" was actually made on May 25, 1926, and as we have noted, when the case was reopened on May 27, the record shows no offer of this testimony by appellant.

We deem it unnecessary to further prolong this opinion by discussion of the other points urged by appellant, as our views above expressed are determinative of this appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Action by Olga Waizman against Marie Black and others. From the judgment rendered, defendant Hazel Reding appeals. Reversed.

J. Hampton Hoge, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Vincent W. Hallinan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued for injuries received in an automobile collision. The cause was tried before a jury, and resulted in a verdict for plaintiff and against the defendants Black and Hazel Reding in the sum of $10,000. The defendant Reding alone appeals from the judgment following the verdict, upon typewritten transcripts. Two grounds of appeal are advanced—that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict against this appellant, and that the verdict is excessive.

On September 1, 1927, the plaintiff was returning from Yosemite Valley, riding as the guest of the defendant Black in the latter's Ford coupé. At about 1:30 p. m. of that day, as they approached from the south the intersection of the Yosemite Highway with G street in the city of Merced, the car driven by the appellant approached the same intersection traveling east on G street. As the appellant's car had about crossed the intersection of the two streets, the Black car crashed into it, striking the right rear wheel and fender of appellant's car with the front right wheel and fender of the Black car. As a result of the collision the Black car went up in the air, landed on its radiator, and then on its top with the wheels in the air, and finally came to a stop resting on its left side in the furthestmost (or northeast) corner of the intersection, close to the northerly curb of G street. The appellant's car was turned completely around "in its tracks," and came to a stop close to the southerly line of G street, with the front end "just about in line with the sidewalk."

Passing for the moment the controversy between the parties as to the relative rates of speed of the two vehicles, the undisputed evidence is that appellant's car was proceeding well over toward the right-hand curb of G street; that it had passed into the intersection of the two streets, and "had just about cleared the [Twenty-First] street," when it was struck in the rear by the Black car. Thus the collision occurred in the southeast corner of the intersection, after the appellant had entered and almost cleared the intersection, and at a time when the Black car had scarcely more than nosed into the intersection. The evidence does not clearly show the exact width of either street in the intersection, but all the evidence, when viewed in the light most favorable to respondent, shows that appellant's car traveled at least four times the distance in the intersection before the impact that was traveled by the Black car.

Upon the issue of appellant's negligence there is some testimony in the record which at first glance would seem to create a conflict. Both the plaintiff and Miss Black testified that their car approached and proceeded into the intersection at an unlawful rate of speed—about 25 miles an hour. The only disinterested witness to the collision testified that the Black car was going near 40. The plaintiff and Miss Black both estimated the speed of appellant's car at 35 or 40 miles an hour, and then the plaintiff admitted that she was wholly unqualified to give an opinion on the question. Miss Black's testimony was that, after she had reached the intersection, she saw the appellant's car speed up, but on another occasion she admitted that the appellant had reached the intersection before she (Miss Black) had, was proceeding across at a moderate rate of speed, and that she thought appellant would be clear from her path as she went through the intersection. The testimony of the appellant and of those riding with her all showed that appellant was the first to reach the intersection; that she was proceeding at a lawful rate of speed, and had no reason to anticipate that Miss Black would continue on into her path at an unlawful rate of speed.

This testimony carries the usual discrepancies, where inexperienced and prejudiced witnesses are asked to give their opinions on matters of which they know nothing. Thus, as to the question of speed of appellant's car, the plaintiff frankly admitted she was unable to testify, and then guessed that it was about 30 or 35, while Miss Black, when asked how fast appellant was going at the intersection, answered: "Maybe 35 or 40." If we were to consider such testimony as evidence, it is certainly evidence of the weakest character, which must give way to the physical facts, when such facts clearly demonstrate that the estimates of the witnesses were poor guesswork.

Here the undisputed physical facts are that the Black car made a complete somersault and landed on its side on the other side of the street, some 40 or 50 feet from the point of impact, while appellant's car was turned completely around and stopped in its tracks. Can there be any doubt as to the relative rate of speed of the two cars at that time? The same undisputed evidence is that the appellant had entered the intersection and had almost passed completely through it before struck in the rear by the Black car at the furthestmost southeast corner of the intersection. Can there be any doubt as to which car first entered the intersection? If the testimony of plaintiff and of Miss Black as to the speed of the Black car and as to the time both cars entered the intersection were true, then the appellant must have driven at a rate of about 100 miles an hour, to have been in the position where the impact occurred. Aside from the fact that such speed was highly improbable, the fact that she came to a complete stop when hit demonstrates the impossibility of plaintiff's theory.

[1-4] We have read the record with care, including the entire typewritten transcript of the testimony, and fail to find any evidence of any character showing negligence on the part of the appellant. The only competent evidence in the record is that she approached the intersection at a lawful rate of speed at a time when the Black car was about 100 feet away; that she proceeded across the intersection at a lawful rate of speed and in a prudent and careful manner. She had just about cleared the intersection when the Black car, proceeding at an excessive and unlawful rate of speed crashed into her. If appellant's car had struck the Black car, or if the Black car had struck appellant's car amidship, or near the front portion, there would have been some doubt as to these disputed questions of fact; but, when the car approaching the intersection from the south strikes another car on the very tail end of the latter as the latter car is leaving the intersection, the conjectures of witnesses as to relative speed and time of entering the intersection must fall before the undisputed physical facts.

We are not unmindful of the accepted rule that the weight of expert or opinion evidence is ordinarily a question for the jury. We merely hold that the opinion of a nonexpert witness upon a subject about which he is admittedly unqualified to testify does not create a conflict with the undisputed physical facts, which demonstrate beyond all reasonable doubt that the expressed opinion was merely an erroneous guess. A similar situation arose in Newell-Murdock R. Co. v. Wickham, 183 Cal. 39, 43, 190 P. 359, where the Supreme Court said: "These statements of the witness, which are but statements, of conclusions and probabilities, following his emphatic statement that the subject was not touched upon, cannot be considered as a substantial contradiction of the positive testimony of the defendants that nothing of the kind was said." So, too, the "mere opinion or conclusion of a witness in his direct examination could have no weight as against facts stated by him in his cross-examination which are necessarily opposed to such opinion." (Italics ours.) Burns

v. Jackson, 53 Cal. App. 345, 347, 200 P. 80. In Keyes v. Hawley (Cal. App.) 279 P. 674, we held that the physical facts showing want of negligence on the defendant's part, and which were almost identical with the facts found in the case at bar, were not controverted by the mere guess or conjecture of a witness.

As the judgment must be reversed for the reasons given, it is unnecessary to consider the other point raised.

Judgment reversed.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 28, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 26, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 26, 1929.

1. Deeds ⇨196(2, 3)—Mere relation of parent and child is insufficient to raise presumption of fraud or undue influence respecting deeds from parent to child.

Mere relation of parent and child is not sufficient to raise presumption of fraud or undue influence respecting deeds from one to the other.

2. Deeds ⇨196(2, 3)—Advanced age of grantor is insufficient to raise presumption deed to grantee was procured by fraud or undue influence.

Advanced age of the grantor is not alone sufficient to raise presumption that deed to grantee child was procured by fraud or undue influence.

3. Deeds ⇨196(2, 3)—That grantor did not seek independent advice in making deeds does not create presumption of fraud or undue influence by grantee daughter, where evidence showed grantor acted voluntarily with knowledge.

That grantor did not seek independent advice in making transfers of property to daughter does not create presumption of fraud or undue influence regarding deeds, in face of evidence that grantor acted freely and voluntarily, with full knowledge and understanding of transaction.

4. Deeds ⇨211(3)—Daughter, deeded property, need not show by preponderance of evidence, in action to set aside deeds, that she did not commit fraud upon mother.

Daughter, to whom mother had deeded property, held not required by preponderance of evidence to satisfy court or jury that she did not commit fraud on her mother in action by another to set aside deeds.

5. Deeds ⇨196(2, 3)—Presumption against fraud is evidence supporting finding that conveyances from mother to daughter were not procured through fraud or influence.

Presumption against fraud approximates in strength presumption of innocence of crime, and is evidence supporting finding that conveyances by mother to daughter were free and voluntary acts of grantor, and that they were not procured through fraud or influence.

6. Deeds ⇨208(4)—Evidence that grantor recorded deeds for benefit and with consent of grantee daughter is prima facie evidence of delivery.

Evidence that deeds were recorded by grantor for benefit and with consent of grantee daughter is prima facie evidence of delivery to grantee, and is sufficient to support finding of delivery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Action by Lucille K. Best, as administratrix of the estate of Martha J. Kuznik, sometimes known as Dr. Martha Kuznik, deceased, against Angelika K. Paul, sometimes known as Mrs. Angelika Paul. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Judgment affirmed.

Bauer, Wright & Macdonald and Alexander MacDonald, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Edward Winterer, Albert J. Sherer, and Earl E. Howard, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued to set aside certain deeds conveying real property to defendant. The cause was tried before the court sitting without a jury. Findings and judgment favored the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed on a bill of exceptions.

Dr. Kuznik was the mother of the plaintiff, the defendant, and of two other children. She died April 19, 1925, at the age of 73 years. About 2 months before her death she executed the conveyances to the defendant, covering practically all the real property owned by her. When the deeds were executed, the defendant, at the request of the grantor, was living in the home of her mother in the capacity of housekeeper, and was the only one of the four children who gave her any care or affection in her last illness. The mother was a practicing physician, who continued actively in her practice until her death. She assumed full charge and control over her properties at all times until the deeds were executed, and at that time executed the deeds freely and voluntarily, and with a full knowledge of the facts and of the effect of the transfers. She personally caused the deeds to be recorded, and notified those with whom she had business transactions that she had voluntarily conveyed the properties to the defendant.

The conveyances were attacked upon four grounds: That the grantor was of unsound mind, undue influence by defendant, fraud by defendant, and nondelivery. The trial court found adversely to plaintiff on each issue, and the burden of her appeal is that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings. We have examined the evidence. There is not so much as a substantial conflict. All the evidence shows unmistakably that the grantor was of sound mind, that she was unusually alert for a person of her age, that she was of strong and dominating mind, and that until a few days before her death, which came suddenly from heart failure, she was capable mentally and physically to carry on her medical practice and to transact her business affairs, and that she did both.

There is no competent evidence tending to prove undue or any influence or fraud on the part of the respondent. This the appellant concedes, but she argues that the burden of proof was on the respondent to show that the transaction was fair, and that respondent failed to sustain that burden. The argument is, not that the evidence admitted was insufficient to prove the fairness of the transaction, but that the portions of the evidence relating to conversations with the deceased should not be considered for that purpose. If appellant were right, it would not help her on this appeal, because all the declarations of the deceased could be disregarded without affecting the judgment.

[1-3] The mere relation of parent and child is not sufficient to raise a presumption of fraud or undue influence. Broaddus v. James, 13 Cal. App. 464, 472, 110 P. 158; Wilbur v. Wilbur, 197 Cal. 1, 14, 239 P. 332; Longmire v. Kruger, 80 Cal. App. 230, 237, 251 P. 692. The advanced age of the grantor is not alone sufficient to raise such presumption. Soberanes v. Soberanes, 97 Cal. 140, 146, 31 P. 910; Johnson v. Studley, 80 Cal. App. 538, 559, 252 P. 638. The fact that the grantor did not seek independent advice in making the transfers does not create the presumption, in face of the evidence that she acted freely and voluntarily and with full knowledge and understanding of the transactions. Soberanes v. Soberanes, 97 Cal. 140, 146, 31 P. 910; Wilbur v. Wilbur, 197 Cal. 1, 16, 239 P. 332.

[4, 5] Here is a case where the grantor was of sound mind and body, voluntarily deeding her property to the only one of her four children who had given her any affection or care during the later years of her life, and the only one who had aided her with money and labor when she was in financial difficulties. It cannot be the law that a grantee under such circumstances must by a preponderance of evidence satisfy a court or jury that she did not commit a fraud upon her mother. The presumption against fraud approximates in strength the presumption of innocence of crime (27 Cor. Jur. 44, § 170; Truett v. Onderdonk, 120 Cal. 581, 588, 53 P. 26), and this presumption is evidence supporting the finding that the conveyances were the free and voluntary acts of the grantor, and that they were not procured through the fraud or influence of respondent.

the evidence is that the deeds were recorded by the grantor for the benefit, and with the consent of the grantee. This is prima facie evidence of delivery to the grantee (8 R. C. L. 1006, 1009), and is sufficient to support the finding.

There is no error in the record. Judgment affirmed.

UNITED STATES GUARDIAN CORPORATION v. FOREMAN et al. (Civ. 7106.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 5, 1929.

1. Appeal and error ↔ 1071(5)—Plaintiff's contention on appeal that finding of alteration in note was not sustained held without merit, where no finding of material alteration was made.

Where trial court, in action on note, found that alteration was made, but did not make finding that alteration was in a material respect, contention of plaintiff on appeal, defendant not having appealed, that finding as made was not sustained by evidence, held without merit, since, even though finding was not sustained by evidence, finding as made did not constitute a defense, and was therefore immaterial.

2. Bills and notes ↔ 526—Evidence held to support finding nothing was paid on note after commencement of action, constituting waiver of notice of dishonor or protest.

In action against indorser on note, in which indorser contended he had never been served with notice of dishonor or protest, evidence failing to show that firm of attorneys making payment on note after commencement of action were indorser's general agents, nor attorneys for defendant, nor that they had any authority from him, except in regard to various other transactions, held to sustain finding that indorser did not, after commencement of action, pay any amount on principal of note.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stephen G. Long, Judge.

Action by the United States Guardian Corporation against L. O. Foreman and others. Judgment for defendant Foreman, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Howard F. Shepherd, B. L. Hoyt, and Hernando J. Norris, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Stick, Moerdyke & Gibson and John C. Stick, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action on a promissory note. It made a corporation, the maker, and two individuals, as indorsers, parties defendant. L. O. Foreman, one of the indorsers, was served, and appeared and answered, and a trial was had in the trial court before the court sitting without a jury. The trial court made findings in favor of the defendant, and from a judgment entered thereon the plaintiff has appealed, and has brought up a bill of exceptions.

[1] The plaintiff contends that the trial court erred in making a finding that an alteration appearing on the face of the note was not authorized or assented to by the defendant. That the alteration was made is not disputed. The trial court made a finding that the alteration was made, but did not make a finding that the alteration was in a material respect. The defendant has not appealed. The plaintiff contends that the finding as made is not sustained by the evidence. Even though it is not sustained by the evidence, the finding as made does not constitute a defense, and therefore it is immaterial.

[2] The trial court found that "it is not true that on September 25, 1925, or at any other time, defendant L. O. Foreman paid upon the principal of said note the sum of $5,000, or any other sum, or paid any sum whatsoever upon principal, interest, or any other account with respect to said note." The plaintiff contends the finding is not supported by the evidence. The note was made by the Cox-Klemin Aircraft Corporation to raise money to finance its business. The note was written payable to the maker. Later it was indorsed by the maker, and also by L. Charles Cox and by the defendant L. O. Foreman. It was indorsed by the individuals for the accommodation of the maker. The defendant alleged that he had never been served with notice of dishonor or protest. The plaintiff admits the defendant was not served, but claims that said notice was waived, and in this behalf it asserts that, after the action was commenced, the defendant Foreman paid $5,000 on the amount alleged to be due on the note, and that such act constituted a waiver. The defendant replies that he did not make nor authorize the making of the payment.

From the record before us it is an undisputed fact that the payment was made by C. G. Bond. He made the payment by delivering to the plaintiff the check of Lee, Smyth & Wise, a firm of attorneys of whom he was the representative. The evidence does not show that said firm were the attorneys of the defendant, nor that they were his general agents, nor that they held any authority from him, except as stated below. The principal debtor, as we have stated, was Cox-Klemin Aircraft Corporation. There was evidence that Mr. Cox, an officer of that corporation, caused the payment to be made, and, furthermore, that he promised to pay the balance of the note. There was evidence that Lee, Smyth & Wise were the attorneys of the Cox-

Klemin Aircraft Corporation. Under these circumstances, we cannot say that the plaintiff has sustained the burden of proof resting on it. The trial court did not err in making the finding complained of.

At about the time the note was dated, the defendant was in New York. He was a stockholder in the Cox-Klemin Aircraft Corporation. That corporation was in need of financial assistance. The defendant had theretofore indorsed notes to accommodate the corporation. Some of those notes were falling due, therefore some new notes were written and signed, and were delivered into the hands of Lee, Smyth & Wise, to be by that firm delivered in accordance with instructions thereafter to be issued by the defendant Foreman. Thereafter Mr. Foreman wired Lee, Smyth & Wise "to turn over to Captain Cox $45,000 worth of notes which you now have bearing my indorsement for the express purpose of being discounted at the Bank of the United States. Proceeds to be used to take up notes as follows: 30,000 United States Guardian Company and American Trust Company and Seventh Avenue National. All notes taken up must bear my personal indorsement to be forwarded to me here together with certificate of deposit for $15,000 to be held by me which is to cover cash balance left there per Cox wire. Wire me when Guardian is paid also any other information." Except as stated in this paragraph, there is no evidence that Lee, Smyth & Wise in any way had authority to represent the defendant. Neither is there any evidence that the money received from discounting the notes was subject to the order of any person, except Cox-Klemin Aircraft Corporation.

The judgment is affirmed.

ANDREW v. BANKERS' & SHIPPERS'
INS. CO. OF NEW YORK et al. ★
(Civ. 6946.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 29, 1929.

Rehearing denied Nov. 26, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 26, 1929.

1. Fraud ~~39~~—To warrant recovery for fraud, plaintiff must show representation of material fact, knowingly false, or recklessly made, with intent to deceive, and that such other relied thereon, was deceived, and suffered damages (Civ. Code, §§ 1709, 1710).

To warrant recovery in action based on fraud and deceit, Civ. Code, §§ 1709, 1710, plaintiff must ordinarily show that representation was as to a material fact, that such fact was false, and known to be false by party making it, or else recklessly made, or without reasonable grounds for believing its truth, with intent to induce other party to do or refrain from doing some act, which representation was relied on by other party, and that such other party, in acting on representation, was ignorant of falsity thereof, and reasonably believed it to be true, and that he thereby suffered damage.

2. Trial ⇨165—Motion for nonsuit at close of plaintiff's case operates as demurrer, and plaintiff's evidence must be taken as true.

Motion for nonsuit at close of plaintiff's case operates as demurrer to evidence, and plaintiff's evidence must therefore be taken as true.

3. Trial ⇨165—On motion for nonsuit at close of plaintiff's case, evidence must be construed most strongly against defendant.

On motion for nonsuit at close of plaintiff's case, evidence must be construed most strongly against defendant, and every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from evidence must be considered as facts in plaintiff's favor.

4. Fraud ⇨30—For false representations contained in riders attached to insurance policies, both insurance company and agent attaching riders should be held liable.

Where insurance agent was acting for company in attaching riders to insurance policies covering automobiles, which riders contained false representations, both agent and company should be held responsible for fraud.

5. Fraud ⇨58(2)—Evidence held to show fraudulent misrepresentations of insurance company and agent in policy rider, inducing plaintiff to purchase automobile sale contracts (Civ. Code, § 1568).

In action based on alleged fraud and deceit resulting from fraudulent misrepresentations contained in riders attached to insurance policies covering automobiles, on which plaintiff relied in purchasing automobile sale contracts, evidence held to show fraud of insurance company and its agent in attaching rider to policy containing representations that agent had inspected automobile insured and found make and number of car to be correctly stated, in view of Civ. Code, § 1568, providing that consent is deemed to have been obtained through fraud only when it would not have been given had such cause not existed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John J. Allen, Judge.

Action by Archibald Andrew against the Bankers' & Shippers' Insurance Company of New York and another. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. S. Andrews and Edwin T. Cooper, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Miller & Thornton, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LUCAS, Justice pro tem. This is an action based upon alleged fraud and deceit. Archibald Andrew, plaintiff in the court below, sought therein to recover the sum of $14,594 paid by him to one E. A. Shouse for eleven automobile sale contracts which plaintiff claims he was induced to purchase by reason of the fraudulent statements, misrepresentations and deceit of the defendants. The contracts were later found to be fictitious and of no value.

At the trial of the cause, after plaintiff had rested, the defendant company moved for a nonsuit; the motion was granted and judgment entered accordingly, while, as to defendant Earsman, the case was continued for further hearing. When the trial was resumed, however, plaintiff rested without introducing any further evidence, and the said Earsman thereupon likewise moved for a nonsuit; his motion was granted and judgment was entered. From these orders and judgments plaintiff appeals.

The complaint contains eleven separate but similar counts. The allegations contained in the first count may be briefly summarized as follows: That the defendant company was and is a New York corporation, doing business in the state of California; that J. Murray Earsman was the agent of said company, authorized to execute and deliver policies of insurance and indorsements thereon, to make inspection of automobiles insured under said policies, and to represent in riders attached to the policies the fact of such inspection and the result thereof; that on or about February 18, 1920, one E. A. Shouse offered to sell and transfer to plaintiff a certain written conditional contract of sale covering a certain purported automobile therein described, together with promissory notes evidencing the balance due thereunder, said contracts and notes purporting to be executed by one R. H. Peppin as buyer while the said Shouse was named therein as seller; that at the same time, and as a part of the same transaction, the said Shouse offered to deliver and tendered to plaintiff an insurance policy issued by the defendant company, through its agent Earsman, insuring Shouse, Peppin, the Bank of Italy and the plaintiff Andrew as their interests might appear against loss from fire and theft of the said purported automobile described in said contract; that the description of the said automobile set forth in said policy of insurance was the same as that contained in the aforesaid contract of sale between Shouse and Peppin; that at the same time, and as a part of the same transaction and for the purpose of inducing plaintiff to purchase said documents and automobile and the alleged title and interest of Shouse therein, said Shouse tendered and delivered to plaintiff a written rider or representation signed by Earsman, while acting within the scope of his authority as agent for such company and on behalf of said company. This rider was attached to said policy and was in words and figures as follows:

"7. Endorsement.

"Effective date Feb. 14, 1920, assured R. H. Peppin, E. A. Shouse, Arch. Andrew and Bank of Italy, as int. may appear.

"Attaching to policy No. B 2727 of the Bankers and Shippers Insurance Company of New York.

"I have inspected automobile insured hereunder and find make and number of car to be correctly stated. Date—February 14, 1920. J. Murray Earsman Agent. 12 19 3000 B."

It is further alleged that plaintiff, relying upon said written representation of defendants as to the inspection of said automobile and upon the said findings as to the correctness of the make and number thereof, purchased said above-mentioned contract and notes, and paid Shouse therefor $359, no part of which sum has been repaid to plaintiff, except the sum of $352; that said written representations in said rider contained were made, executed, and issued by the defendant company by and through its agent Earsman, for the purpose of inducing plaintiff to purchase said contract, notes, and purported automobile, and with the knowledge that plaintiff would rely thereon in making such purchase; that said contract and notes were wholly fictitious and forged; that the alleged purchaser and automobile therein described were nonexistent; that no such automobile had ever been in the possession or under the control of said Shouse nor sold by him to any one; that plaintiff obtained no title or interest in any automobile, nor secured any claim against any purchaser; that said Shouse is insolvent, and unable and refuses to repay plaintiff any of the money so paid by plaintiff as aforesaid; that defendants never inspected, or attempted to inspect, said automobile, and never found the make or number thereof to be correctly stated; that said representations thereto were wholly false and untrue; that the defendants made the same without any reasonable grounds for believing them to be true, and at said time knew them to be wholly false and untrue; and that they were made by defendants with the intent to induce plaintiff to purchase said documents, and that plaintiff relied and acted thereon to his damage in the sum of $7, no part of which has been paid.

The other ten counts of the complaint are the same as the first, except as to dates, purchasers, automobiles, prices, and amounts due.

The answers of the defendants are not set out in full in the record, but in the reporter's transcript appears a stipulation to the effect that both defendants had filed verified answers specifically denying all of the allegations contained in each and every count of the complaint, except the one as to the incorporation of the defendant company, which allegation is admitted. In addition thereto, the defendant company filed certain amendments to its answer, in which it set up six separate affirmative defenses to eight causes of action, and five separate defenses to the remaining three causes of action. These special defenses briefly allege that each policy of insurance referred to in the complaint, under its terms, became void, if the interest of the assured in the property covered thereby was other than sole and unconditional ownership; that at all times the automobiles referred to in said complaint were in existence; that Shouse, believed by Earsman to be a reliable man, misled and deceived Earsman as to the number and make of the automobiles; that the loss complained of by plaintiff, if any, was not caused by his reliance upon the insurance policies and the riders, but by his own negligence in failing to make investigation as to the truth of the statements contained therein before purchasing the contracts and notes, and by allowing monthly payments on the contracts to remain due and unpaid for over a year after Shouse had become insolvent and the policies of insurance had expired; and, lastly, that certain of the policies of insurance were canceled for non-payment of premiums more than a year prior to the commencement of the action.

The defendant Earsman set up no special defense, but relied solely upon his specific denials of the allegations of the complaint.

Upon the issues thus formed, the case went to trial.

The only evidence received was that offered on behalf of the plaintiff, which consisted of the eleven automobile sales contracts and the accompanying notes, the eleven insurance policies, each having attached thereto the so-called rider No. 7, notices sent out to the purported purchasers of the automobiles that the contracts had been assigned to the Bank of Italy, an agreed statement of facts, certain stipulations as to what one witness would testify to, and the oral testimony of plaintiff and one S. E. Biddle.

It appears therefrom that the plaintiff Andrew was and had been engaged in the business of lending money and discounting automobile paper; that he was and had been a client of the Bank of Italy, Oakland Branch, for many years; that said bank had frequently taken up automobile contracts on his order, making the payments therefor, and thereafter collecting from plaintiff; that plaintiff was in good financial condition, and that his credit was good at the bank for substantial sums of money upon his unsecured promissory notes. It also appears that Andrew and Earsman were and had been friends for a number of years preceding the date of the transactions under consideration herein, and that for two or three years prior thereto they had been associated in business together; also that prior to the purchase of the contracts in question the said Andrew had purchased several automobile contracts from Shouse, which were accompanied by insurance policies to which no rider similar to rider No. 7 was attached; furthermore that on one occasion Andrew had made to Shouse a secured loan of about $5,000.

Earsman, it appears, was an insurance agent with an established business in Oakland, and was the duly accredited agent of the defendant company. Shouse was an automobile dealer, handling principally used cars, which he sold on contract. These contracts he had been in the habit of discounting to various parties, including plaintiff and the said Bank of Italy, delivering with each contract a policy of insurance. None of said policies had, prior to February, 1920, carried the rider above mentioned. It also appears from the evidence that this rider was originally drafted at the instance of the said Oakland Branch of the Bank of Italy, which institution had, some time prior to 1920, sustained a loss of about $4,000 by reason of having discounted certain spurious automobile contracts. To prevent a repetition of such loss, and to devise a means of protection against the recurrence thereof, several conferences were had between the said defendant J. Murray Earsman and S. E. Biddle, the then manager of said Oakland Branch of the Bank of Italy. At these conferences Biddle insisted, and it was agreed, that in the case of policies covering automobiles of Shouse, and wherein plaintiff Andrew and the bank were named as the insured, an inspection of such automobiles should in each instance be made by Earsman, as the agent of the defendant company, that the make and the number of the automobiles should be checked, and that a certificate executed by Earsman as agent should be attached to each policy, certifying to such inspection and the result thereof. The form of the indorsement or rider was agreed upon and assented to by the defendant insurance company only after the bank had stated it would accept no more policies from said company unless they contained such riders. When this was agreed to, as aforesaid, the plaintiff Andrew was then notified by the bank that in all cases where it was going to loan him money and accept as collateral the contracts of Shouse the above-mentioned rider must be attached to each policy of insurance accompanying such contracts. Thereupon Andrew decided that he wanted such riders attached to all of the policies received by him, whether he borrowed money from the bank on the accompanying contracts or not, and he and Biddle informed Earsman of this fact. Earsman thereupon agreed to make the inspection and to attach such certificates or riders to all of the Andrew policies. Shouse was notified of this action and condition.

Between the middle of February, 1920, and the first of February, 1921, plaintiff discounted and purchased from Shouse at various times, and principally through the Bank of Italy, the eleven automobile contracts mentioned in the complaint, together with the notes evidencing the balance due thereunder. In each case, prior to the discounting of these contracts, Shouse applied to Earsman for an insurance policy upon the purported automobiles mentioned therein. Earsman, as the agent of the defendant company, issued the eleven policies above mentioned, to each of which there was attached rider No. 7, and he thereafter forwarded true and correct copies of said policies and riders to the general agency of the company in San Francisco.

Just what inspection was made by Earsman prior to issuing said policies and riders is a little uncertain. According to the evidence of Andrew and Biddle, Earsman admitted to them after the discovery of the fraud that he thought he had in some instances made the inspection, but that in most instances he had taken the word of Shouse that the car was there as represented, and that he did not personally examine any of said automobiles for the purpose of determining the numbers before he issued the policies and riders.

It is claimed, however, by the respondents that Earsman went to the place of business of Shouse, and there saw automobiles of the same make and kind described in the policy, but that he did not in all cases look at the numbers. All parties admit that no inspection of any kind was ever made at any place other than the place of business of Shouse, and that none of the purported automobiles described in the eleven contracts of sale was ever registered with the motor vehicle department of the state of California. The eleven policies of insurance so issued, each with the said rider attached thereto, were delivered or transferred to Andrew or to the bank for him, along with the contracts for the sale of the purported automobiles covered by said policies. Upon receipt of said contracts, the Bank of Italy mailed to each of the purchasers therein named a notice stating that his contract had been assigned to the bank. In each instance Andrew repaid to the bank all of the money advanced by it in the purchase of these contracts. Payments were in some way made at various times upon six of the contracts—by whom it does not appear, while nothing was ever paid upon the other five.

Some time in February or March, 1921, it was discovered by all of the parties hereto, after investigation, that all of the eleven automobile contracts and notes which are the subject of this action were fictitious, spurious, and forged, that none of said contracts or notes was signed by the persons named therein as vendees and makers, and that none of the automobiles referred to in said contracts was ever owned or possessed by Shouse. It was also discovered that the premiums on eight of the policies had never been paid, and that the defendant company had never been informed or learned prior to March, 1921, that, in making the inspections certified to in said riders, Earsman had relied upon Shouse for the numbers of the automobiles, and had not made a personal examination thereof. After the discovery of the fraud, plaintiff instituted neither a civil nor criminal action against Shouse, but, instead, accorded him an opportunity to work out of the difficulty and to repay the moneys of which plaintiff had been defrauded. Nothing came of this arrangement, and early in 1922 plaintiff began the present action.

The motions for nonsuits upon which the judgments appealed from were based were made upon the following grounds: That no fraud had been shown; that the rights of plaintiff, if any, were based upon insurance policies; that said policies would have been enforceable only if the riders attached thereto were guarantees of ownership; that the policies were void; that the loss suffered was not covered by the policies; that there was no consideration for said policies, and that plaintiff's loss, if any, was caused by his own carelessness.

[1-5] No consideration need be given to any of the foregoing grounds other than the ground that no fraud had been shown, as this is clearly an action-sounding in fraud and deceit and not on contract. It is based upon the provisions of sections 1709 and 1710 of the Civil Code. These sections provide:

"Sec. 1709. One who willfully deceives another with intent to induce him to alter his position to his injury or risk, is liable for any damage which he thereby suffers."

"Sec. 1710. A deceit, within the meaning of the last section, is either:

"1. The suggestion, as a fact, of that which is not true, by one who does not believe it to be true;

"2. The assertion, as a fact, of that which is not true, by one who has no reasonable ground for believing it to be true. * * *

Several elements must be proven before a recovery may be had for fraud:

"Fraud may be the basis of an action for damages and deceit. When a cause arises out of an alleged false representation, the plaintiff, in order to prevail, must ordinarily show that the representation was as to a material fact; that such fact was false and known to be false by the party making it, or else recklessly made, or without reasonable grounds for believing its truth; that the representation was made with intent to induce the other party to do or refrain from doing some act; that it was relied upon by the other party—in other words, that such other party was actually misled and deceived and induced by it to act or refrain from acting; that in so acting or refraining from acting he was ignorant of the falsity of the representation and reasonably believed it to be true; and that he thereby suffered damage or injury. The absence of any one of these elements is generally fatal to a recovery." 12 Cal. Jur. 724.

From the foregoing it is seen that, to enable a plaintiff to recover in an action based upon fraud and deceit, it must first be made to appear that a false representation was made as to a material fact. The six elements necessary to a recovery in such an action, as set forth in the rule above announced, will be considered briefly herein in connection with the facts above stated.

First, as to the representation being of a material fact:

"To constitute fraud in any case the misrepresentation or concealment complained of must be of a material fact, for a representation, even though untrue, does not affect the validity of a transaction unless it is material. To be material, a representation must be of such a character that, if it had not been made, the contract or transaction would not have been entered into." 12 Cal. Jur. 740.

The original fraud in this case was clearly the fraud of Shouse in forging the conditional automobile sales contracts. By this act he created, for the purpose of sale and with the intent to defraud, contracts and promissory notes having absolutely no value. Before he could dispose of these contracts and promissory notes and perpetrate a fraud upon his friend Andrew or upon the Bank of Italy, however, it was necessary for him to secure policies insuring Andrew and the Bank of Italy against loss by fire or theft, and certifying that the agent for the company had personally inspected the automobiles insured thereunder, and had found the make and number of the cars to be correctly stated. Both the Bank of Italy and plaintiff had served notice that they would accept no more automobile paper from Shouse, unless such policies and certificates were furnished. In his testimony at the trial of the cause the plaintiff in this regard testified positively that:

"Q. State what would have been your action with reference to the purchase of each of these documents in the eleven cases if that certificate had not been on there. A. I would have refused to buy the contract.

"Q. I will ask you if subsequently to the placing of this endorsement upon the insurance policies in the summer or fall of 1919 you ever purchased from Mr. Shouse any automobile paper without receiving the certificate of inspection mentioned in these policies? A. No.

"Q. State your belief, if any you had, in the truth of the representations made by that certificate of inspection in each case. A. I believed the inspection had been made as stated."

From this it appears that without the representation of a personal inspection having been made by Earsman plaintiff would not have purchased the contracts.

"Consent is deemed to have been obtained through one of the causes mentioned in the last section (fraud) only when it would not have been given had such cause not existed." Section 1568, Civ. Code.

In answer to the contention that the false representation was of a material fact, respondents make the point that the certificates or riders were of absolutely no value as a source of protection to purchasers of the contracts and notes, for the reason that they contained no guarantee of ownership. The testimony adduced from plaintiff on cross-examination in this regard follows:

"Q. Let us see what it says: Here is the certificate. 'I have inspected automobile insured hereunder, and find make and number of car to be correctly stated.' A. Yes.

"Q. There is nothing there to the effect that Shouse was the owner of any car, is there? A. No.

"Q. There is nothing there guaranteeing that Shouse is the owner of any car? A. No.

"Q. As a matter of fact those automobiles might have been changed and might have the same number and Shouse still not own them? A. They might.

"Q. Where were you then protected by the certificate? A. In this way, that if he had gone to the place of business and failed to find a car of that make and number and had told me he could not put the endorsement on because he could not find it I certainly would not have paid the money on that contract.

"Q. But if there was any car there that was of the make covered by the policy and did have the number covered by the policy you would have then gone ahead irrespective of whether or not you knew Shouse was the owner of that car? A. Yes."

It is undeniably true that plaintiff, as the purchaser of forged automobile paper, would in no wise be protected against loss thereunder merely because an insurance agent certified that he had seen an automobile of the make and number mentioned in said paper in the possession of the seller thereof. If title were not in the seller, or if the contract to purchase were a forgery, the certificate would avail nothing, and the purchaser of such paper would sustain a loss because of the forgery and fraud of the seller; but it is also true, as shown by the evidence, that the plaintiff would not have become a purchaser, and would therefore not have suffered loss had it not been for the representation of the insurance company and its agent. In other words, whether the riders on the insurance policies were any protection to Andrew after he purchased the contracts and notes is of no moment. The important part, and that which makes the representation material, is that he would not have "altered his position to his injury or risk" by buying the contracts were it not for such representations. As a matter of fact, the so-called riders on the policies and the truth of the representations contained therein were material to plaintiff for two reasons: They at least assured him that automobiles of the make and number mentioned actually existed, and they enabled him to borrow money from his bank on the automobile contracts which said policies accompanied.

Second, as to the representation being false and made knowingly or without reasonable grounds for belief in its truth: It may be conceded that defendant Earsman did not know that the automobiles were nonexistent, but it is also a conceded fact in the case that Earsman, in such inspection of the automobiles as he may have made, relied upon Shouse for the numbers thereof, and that he knowingly misrepresented that he had made a personal inspection of the cars and found their makes and numbers to be as represented.

Third, as to the representations being made with intent to induce a party to act: It is the law that, "where one knows that he is stating an untruth in order to induce another to act to his injury, the intent to deceive is necessarily involved. Upon the principle that one is liable for the natural and necessary consequences of his acts, a party, knowing the circumstances, is guilty of fraud when he negligently, carelessly, or with lack of foresight makes representations or commits acts, the natural and necessary consequence of which will be such as to cause deception, even though such party acts under the honest impression that he is violating no obligation or invading no right. In fact, gross negligence alone may furnish conclusive evidence of fraudulent intent, even where there is no actual intention to deceive." 12 Cal. Jur. 745, and cases cited.

Furthermore, the evidence shows that Andrew had notified Earsman, the agent of the defendant company, that he wanted riders attached to all of his policies, whether he borrowed money thereon from the bank or not, and Earsman knew he would not accept the Shouse contracts without them. With this knowledge he agreed to make an inspection and to attach certificates to all of Andrew's policies.

Fourth, as to the representations being relied upon by plaintiff, and, fifth, that plaintiff believed them to be true: It has already been shown by plaintiff's testimony above quoted that he relied upon the representations and believed them to be true. The motions for nonsuits, having been made at the close of plaintiff's case, operated as demurrers to the evidence, and the evidence of plaintiff must therefore be taken as true. It is well settled in such circumstances that the evidence must be construed most strongly against the defendant, and that every favorable inference, fairly deducible, and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence, must be considered as facts in favor of the plaintiff. 9 Cal. Jur. 551.

Sixth, as to damages: These follow as a natural consequence of plaintiff purchasing fictitious and valueless automobile paper which he would not have purchased but for the false representations of the defendant Earsman. Since Earsman was acting for the company, both should be held responsible.

The judgments appealed from are therefore reversed.

KATZ v. PEOPLE'S FINANCE & THRIFT CO. (Civ. 15.)

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California. Oct. 29, 1929.

1. Sales $\S$ 454—Provisions in contract stating that one agrees to sell and another promises to pay, and requiring insurance on personalty by company acceptable to seller, held merely to raise inference that sale contract was conditional.

Provision in contract reciting that party of first part agrees to sell and party of second part promises to pay, and requiring purchaser to keep personal property insured at all times against fire in company acceptable to seller, held not conclusive of reservation of title in seller, but merely to raise inference of intention that sale contract should be considered conditional and not absolute.

2. Sales $\S$ 454—Contract for purchase of packinghouse equipment for citrus fruits held ambiguous, permitting consideration of extraneous circumstances to determine whether contract was absolute or conditional.

Contract denominated in its caption a contract of sale, and providing that party of the first part agrees to sell and party of second part promises to pay for complete packinghouse equipment for citrus fruits, and containing provision requiring purchaser to keep property insured at all times against fire in company acceptable to seller, held sufficiently ambiguous and uncertain to permit consideration of extraneous circumstances in determining whether contract was one of absolute or conditional sale.

3. Contracts $\S$ 170(1)—Interpretation placed upon ambiguous contract by parties thereto may be considered.

Where contract was ambiguous, interpretation parties themselves have accepted and acted upon may be considered.

4. Contracts $\S$ 143—Questions concerning rights, duties, and obligations arising under written ambiguous contract may be determined by rules of interpretation.

Where contract has been reduced to writing, instrument itself measures rights, duties, and obligations of parties, but, when doubt arises as to what rights, duties, and obligations are conferred, such questions may be determined by application of rules of interpretation.

5. Evidence $\S$ 424—More liberal rule applies to admission of extrinsic evidence for interpretation of contract, where controversy arises between party thereto and third party.

Where controversy under written contract arises between one of parties thereto and third party, a more liberal rule applies in admitting extrinsic evidence when interpreting it.

6. Sales $\S$ 454—Contract for sale of packinghouse equipment for citrus fruits, when considered with extraneous circumstances, held contract of conditional sale (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1647).

Contract denominated in caption "Contract of Sale," and providing that party of first part agrees to sell and party of second part agrees to purchase complete packinghouse equipment for citrus fruits, and party of second part agrees to pay purchase price in specified installments, and that purchaser will keep property insured at all times against fire in company acceptable to seller, when interpreted by references to circumstances under which it was made and matters to which it relates, as permitted by Civ. Code, $\S$ 1647, held contract of conditional sale.

7. Appeal and error $\S$ 1011(1)—Rule that finding based on conflicting evidence will be sustained on appeal, if substantially supported, applies to interpretation of written, ambiguous contract of sale.

Rule that, where there is merely conflict in evidence, finding of trial court will be sustained on appeal if substantially supported, applies to ambiguous, written contract of sale as well as to other contracts.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

Action by Edmund E. Katz against the People's Finance & Thrift Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Raymond E. Hodge and John A. Hadaller, both of San Bernardino, for appellant.

Walter E. Byrne, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

SLOANE, P. J. Marcus Lathrop, as executor, substituted as party plaintiff in place of Edmund E. Katz, deceased, August 1, 1928.

This appeal was taken to the District Court of Appeal for the Second Appellate District and transferred to this court for decision.

Judgment was for plaintiff in the trial court in the sum of $537.50 and costs amounting to $17.10, on suit for the use and occupation of plaintiff's warehouse in the city of San Bernardino. Plaintiff at all times mentioned in the complaint was the owner of the warehouse in question. Respondent concedes that the facts of the case are fairly stated in appellant's opening brief and are, as slightly abbreviated, as follows:

The uncontradicted evidence showed: That appellant, defendant below, for a period of five weeks immediately prior to the 15th day of October, 1925, had occupied plaintiff's building under a lease. That on said date said tenancy was terminated; the rental thereunder being fully paid. That during said period appellant, the then owner thereof, kept and maintained in said building certain personal property consisting of a complete packinghouse equipment for the packing and handling of fruit. That upon the termination of appellant's tenancy on October 15, 1925, respondent, plaintiff below, by a written agreement, leased the said building to one Chuzaburo Yamada, this last tenancy being terminated on April 27, 1926, by notice and entry. On October 15, 1925, when appellant yielded and Yamada took possession of the building, appellant, as seller, and Yamada, as buyer, entered into a contract of sale of the packinghouse equipment, which equipment remained on the premises during Yamada's occupation thereof, and until December 14, 1926.

On April 27, 1926, respondent served on both Yamada and appellant a notice of termination of Yamada's tenancy, which notice also required the removal, within five days thereafter, of all property of Yamada and appellant, or either of them, then on the premises.

The property, consisting of the packinghouse fixtures and equipment, was not removed at the termination of the Yamada lease, but remained in plaintiff's warehouse until December 14, 1926, when it was removed by appellant. Respondent from month to month rendered to appellant bills for such use and occupancy of the warehouse, and demanded payment thereof.

The trial court found the appellant liable for the value of the use and occupation of the premises, in the sum of $537.50, and gave judgment for respondent and against appellant accordingly. The case was tried by counsel on both sides in a manner deserving of commendation and of the emulation of trial lawyers generally. The facts on which the parties are not in dispute were stipulated to, and the controversy limited to the bare issue upon which the liability of appellant turns, namely, the ownership and control of the fixtures and equipment with which the building was occupied during the period covered by the action. The evidence disclosed, and the trial court found that the retention of this property in the warehouse rendered the premises unavailable for any profitable use by the owner. The only disclaimer of liability by appellant is the contention that it was not the owner of or in the control of the fixtures and equipment during the period sued for.

The stipulated facts show that the respondent leased the real property to one Chuzaburo Yamada on October 15, 1925, and that on the same date the appellant, the then owner of said personal property, entered into a contract of purchase and sale with said Yamada of the trade fixtures and equipment in the building.

The lease of the real property to Yamada was soon after terminated, and notice was given by the respondent to Yamada and to appellant to remove the packinghouse equipment, and demand upon defendant to pay for the occupancy of the premises soon after followed.

The case turns upon the question as to whether the purchase and sale contract between appellant and Yamada was merely an agreement to sell or a consummated sale and transfer of title of the fixtures and equipment. This agreement was in writing, and in words and figures as follows:

"Contract of Sale.

"This contract of sale entered into between the Peoples Finance and Thrift Company, a corporation, hereinafter called the party of the first part, and Chuzaburo Yamada, herein-after called the party of the second part, this fifteenth day of October, 1925

"Whereas

"The party of the first part agrees to sell to the party of the second part, and the party of the second part agrees to purchase from the party of the first part, all that certain personal property situate and described as follows, to-wit: Complete packing house equipment for citrus fruits, apples, etc."

(Here follows itemized description of property.)

"The party of the first part agrees to sell all said personal property at said described location for the sum of fifteen hundred dollars ($1,500.00), and the party of the second part promises to pay to the party of the first part as follows: One Hundred Dollars ($100.00) upon the signing of this contract, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and the balance in monthly installments of $50.00 or more, with interest thereon from date until paid, at eight per cent. per annum, payable monthly, said installments of $50.00 or more, due on the first day of each month, beginning January first, 1926, and thereafter on the first day of each month, until the full amount of Fifteen Hundred Dollars ($1,500.00) and interest, is paid.

"The party of the second part agrees, in addition to the monthly installments, to pay for all materials used, such as boxes and wrapping paper, said additional payments to be credited on the purchase price above mentioned.

"The party of the second part agrees to keep the said personal property insured at all times against fire, in a company acceptable to the party of the first part.

"Witnesseth our hands this fifteenth day of October, 1925.

"The People's Finance & Thrift Company,
"Edna M. James, Asst. Secy.

"Party of the first part.

"Chuzaburo Yamada,

"Party of the second part."

If the execution of this agreement constituted a sale and transfer of the title, accompanied as it was by delivery of possession to Yamada, appellant obviously was no longer responsible, without an express agreement, for its retention in respondent's building.

If, on the other hand, the agreement was only a conditional contract, under which appellant retained title, with the right to resume possession and control on the failure of Yamada to comply with the terms of the contract, appellant should have removed these fixtures and equipment on notice of termination of Yamada's lease, and on respondent's demand, as it finally did on or about December 14, 1926.

It is not always an easy matter to determine whether an agreement of this general character is an absolute or a conditional sale, an executed or an executory contract.

The contract in question does not by its terms reserve title in the vendor, until stipulated payments of the purchase price are made, and it is denominated in its caption a contract of sale. Possession was given to the purchaser, and nothing further remained to be done by the vendor to pass the title.

[1] On the other hand, the body of the instrument recites that the party of the first part "agrees to sell" and the party of the second part "promises to pay." These are not apt words for an instrument intended to pass title, and to serve as a bill of sale. The contract also requires the purchaser "to keep the said personal property insured at all times against fire, in a company acceptable to the seller." Neither of these recitals, however, is at all conclusive of a reservation of title in the appellant.

Ruling Case Law, vol. 23, p. 1348, § 171, lays down the following rule of interpretation of contracts: "The question whether the contract is executory or executed depends primarily on the intention of the parties to be gathered from the terms of the contract and such surrounding circumstances as may be legitimately considered by the court as evidences of intention. Effect will be given to words of present transfer when not inconsistent with other circumstances or provisions evidencing a contrary intention. Still the fact that the bargain is in words of either past or present time, does not conclusively evidence a perfected sale, as distinguished from an executory contract of sale, and when such is apparently the intention of the parties the contract will be deemed executory though the instrument states that the property is 'sold' to the buyer, such word being construed as meaning 'contracted to be sold.' On the other hand, though the contract is in terms of future time, or where it recites that the seller has agreed 'to sell,' it may constitute an executed contract of sale, if such was the intention of the parties."

Likewise, the requirement that the property be kept insured in some company acceptable to the vendor does not in itself establish the inference that the vendor is reserving title which he desires to preserve against the risks of fire. He may merely intend to preserve his right to resort to an attachment lien against the insurance money in case of the destruction of the property and the default of the purchaser in meeting the unpaid purchase price.

[2] However, both recitals referred to raise an inference of an intention that the sale contract shall be considered conditional and not absolute. At any rate, we deem the writing sufficiently ambiguous and uncertain to permit the court to consider extraneous circumstances in determining the intention of the parties.

[3] One of the most common applications of the rules for explaining ambiguities of a written instrument is the interpretation the parties themselves have accepted and acted upon.

[4] The general rule as to supplementing a text of a written instrument by reference to circumstances surrounding its execution is correctly stated in 6 California Jurisprudence, as follows: "When a contract has been reduced to writing, the instrument of course, measures the rights, duties and obligations of the parties. But not infrequently doubt arises as to what rights, duties and obligations are conferred, and such questions are to be settled by application of the rules of interpretation." Supra, p. 247.

These rules are quite fully set out in title 3 of the Civil Code, sections 1635-1661. Section 1647 provides: "A contract may be explained by reference to the circumstances under which it was made and the matters to which it relates."

[5] A somewhat different and a more liberal rule applies to the admission of extrinsic evidence for the interpretation of a contract when the controversy is between one of the parties to the instrument and a third party.

"Strangers are at liberty to show that the written instrument does not disclose the full or true character of the relation between the contracting parties." 6 Cal. Jur. 252, § 162; Luckie v. Diamond Coal Co., 41 Cal. App. 468, 183 P. 178.

In the Luckie Case, supra, which arose on a controversy as to which of the contracting parties was in control of an automobile at the time of an accident, the suit being by a third party injured in the accident, the opinion declares (page 479 of 41 Cal. App., 183 P. 183):

"It is competent for the plaintiff in such an action to show that, as a matter of fact, the parties to a written contract creating the relation of contractee and independent contractor" at that time, "put a different construction upon it by their conduct, and that the defendant has in fact exercised a supervision and control over the work in its details inconsistent with the presumed character of the other party to the contract as an independent contractor. * * *

"For these reasons we hold that the nature of the relation between defendant and Foulks at the time of the accident was not determinable solely from the written contract of employment, but from all the evidence in the case, particularly that which bore upon the question as to whether, at that time, defendant was assuming the right to control and direct Foulks respecting the manner in which the work should be executed by him."

Again, in 6 California Jurisprudence, 254, 258, we find this text, supported by the authorities there cited:

"Intention is to be ascertained from a consideration of the language employed in the subject matter of the contract. Resort is first had to contract itself; and if the intention is doubtful under the terms of the instrument, the surrounding circumstances may be considered, to determine its meaning. The court will ascertain the relation of the parties to each other, and to the subject matter, and if possible to construe the instrument, however inartificially drawn, as to give effect to the intention of the parties, if it can be done without disregarding the language of the instrument. * * *

"The understanding of the parties as to the rights of each under the contract, must be ascertained and enforced so as to protect the rights of all of them."

The application of the rules for resorting to the construction placed upon the terms of a contract in case of ambiguities is thus stated in 6 California Jurisprudence, p. 304:

"The intention of the parties is to be ascertained from the writing alone, if possible, and not from the subsequent actions of one of them. However, it is well recognized that the terms of a contract may be manifested by conduct when not stated in words. And where the meaning is doubtful the acts of the parties done under a contract afford one of the most reliable means of arriving at their intention."

[6] We find in the instant case the following circumstances which throw light on the interpretation placed upon this contract between the parties themselves as to the ownership and right of possession of the personal property in question.

It appears from the record that Yamada, at the time of the cancellation of his lease on the warehouse, vacated the premises without removing the packinghouse equipment, and that he thereafter abandoned this property without making any claim of ownership or right to its possession. On November 10, 1926, while this personal property was still in the warehouse, the appellant company served the following notice on Yamada:

"To Chuzaburo Yamada, 1542 7th St. Santa Monica, California.

"Please take notice that you are delinquent in your payments to the Peoples Finance and Thrift Company of San Bernardino, California, in the sum of $434.80 & int., for and on account of your contract with that corporation dated October 15th, 1925, in which contract you agreed to purchase and pay for certain Fruit Packing House equipment according to the terms in said contract specified, to which you are directed for particulars.

"You have been verbally notified several times by our Mr. Ball, Assistant Secretary of the above named corporation, and you are hereby formally notified that unless the delinquent sums are paid not later than November 13th, 1926, at the office of the said Peoples Finance and Thrift Company, at 431 Court Street, San Bernardino, California, the said corporation will declare the said contract forfeited and your rights in and to the said property forfeited and will take possession of the said property, and attempt to dispose of it.

"Peoples Finance & Thrift Company, a Corporation,

"By _____, Secretary."

This notice clearly indicates a claim of title on the part of appellant and the right to cancel the agreement of sale and resume possession of the property, by reason of Yamada's default in payment of the stipulated installments; and a few days later, on or about December 14th, appellant actually took possession of and removed this property from the warehouse, in compliance with the demand of respondent.

These declarations and acts of ownership and possessory rights of the property on the part of appellant, without any legal proceedings to divest Yamada's title or right to possession, if he had such under the contract, are inconsistent with the contention that appellant had parted with its rights of property under the sales agreement.

There was sufficient uncertainty in the terms of the written contract to justify the court in considering the extraneous evidence; and the evidence taken as a whole strongly tends to sustain the finding of the court that this agreement was one of conditional sale.

[7] The rule that where there is merely a conflict in the evidence, the finding of the trial court will be sustained on appeal if substantially supported, applies to the interpretation of a contract of this character as well as any other.

In Pratt v. Welcome, 6 Cal. App. 475, 92 P. 500, 501, it is said: "The principal question involved in the trial of this case was whether a sale made by the plaintiff to the defendant of the animal in dispute was absolute or conditional, and the findings claimed to be inadequately sustained by the evidence are of probate facts which tended to support one of these contentions. There is evidence to sustain either theory, and the findings so made upon conflicting evidence will not be disturbed by an appellate court."

The judgment is affirmed.

HAMMOND LUMBER CO. v. BLOODGOOD et al. (Civ. 19.)District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California. Oct. 29, 1929.

- 1. Appeal and error ⇨935(2)—Appellate court assumes motion to set aside default judgment covered all relief granted, where form of motion did not appear in record.

Where form of motion made by defendant to set aside default judgment did not appear in record, Court of Appeals was justified in assuming that motion covered all relief granted by court.

- 2. Appearance ⇨20, 24(1)—Appearance by both parties contesting motion without objection waives written notice or defect in notice not specifying all relief given.

Where both parties appear and contest a motion, without objection in trial court, such appearance is waiver of written notice, if none were given, or of defect in notice to specify all relief asked and given, if motion and order went beyond terms of notice.

- 3. Judgment ⇨162(4)—Grant of motion to vacate default judgment, in action to foreclose materialman's lien, held not abuse of discretion under affidavits containing verified answer and showing excusable neglect.

In action to foreclose materialman's lien in which court rendered default judgment for plaintiff, grant of motion to set aside default was not abuse of discretion, where affidavits contained verified answer controverting all material allegations of complaint, and alleged as excusable neglect that plaintiff's manager stated action was instituted for sole purpose of foreclosing mechanic's lien, and not to obtain personal judgment against defendants, inducing defendants not to contest action.

- 4. Judgment ⇨135—Courts will more readily listen to motion to vacate judgment to give litigant day in court than to motion depriving litigant of defense.

Courts are more quick to listen to motion to vacate and set aside default judgment that will give litigant his day in court than to motion that will deprive litigant of defense.

- 5. Appeal and error ⇨957(1)—Judgment ⇨139—Motion to vacate default is addressed to trial court's discretion, exercise of which will not be set aside, unless abused.

Motion to vacate default is addressed to sound discretion of trial court, and exercise thereof will not be set aside, except in clear case of abuse of such discretion.

- 6. Appeal and error ⇨935(2)—All presumptions are resolved in favor of order setting aside default judgment on appeal from order.

On appeal from order granting motion to vacate default judgment, all presumptions must be resolved in favor of court's action in setting aside default.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by the Hammond Lumber Company against Leon E. Bloodgood and others. Judgment by default for plaintiff, and, from an order vacating default judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Le Roy B. Lorenz, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. W. Benshoof, of Riverside, for respondent.

MARKS, J. On April 16, 1927, appellant filed its action against defendants, seeking to foreclose a materialman's lien. Respondent was named as contractor, and personal judgment was sought against him. The summons is not in the record, but respondent admits personal service in the county of Riverside. On October 21, 1927, the default of respondent was entered, and on December 3, 1927, a default judgment was rendered and entered against him. No judgment was taken foreclosing the lien. On December 8, 1927, respondent served and filed his notice of motion to set aside the judgment, on the grounds of mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect. Attached to the notice of motion were respondent's affidavit and his verified answer. At the time the motion was argued, counsel for both appellant and respondent were present and submitted additional affidavits to the trial court. On January 19, 1928, the court below granted respondent's motion, using the following language in so doing: "It is ordered that the motion of defendant, D. W. Lewis, and the proceedings subsequent be and the same is hereby granted and such default is hereby set aside and all proceedings subsequent thereto."

The notice of motion specified a motion to set aside "the judgment by default against said defendant and all subsequent proceedings thereof." Nothing therein contained informed appellant of a motion to vacate the default of respondent. In the affidavit attached to the notice of motion there is the following: "This defendant asks that his default be set aside and that he be permitted to answer and have said action tried upon its merits."

[1] Appellant complains of the order made because it went beyond the terms of the notice of motion and vacated the default of the respondent in addition to granting the relief specified. The form of the motion made by respondent does not appear in the record. We are therefore justified in assuming that it covered all of the relief granted by the court. The record does not show any objection by appellant in the trial court to the form of the motion or to the extent of the relief granted. He makes his objection for the first time here.

[2] It is the well-settled law of this state that, where both parties appear and contest a motion, without objection in the trial court, such appearance is a waiver of a written notice, if none were given, or of the defect in the notice to specify all of the relief asked and given, if the motion and order went beyond the terms of the notice. Acock v. Halsey et al., 90 Cal. 215, 27 P. 193; Curtin v. Dunne, 10 Cal. App. 586, 102 P. 825; Walberg v. Underwood, 39 Cal. App. 748, 180 P. 55; Brown v. Superior Court, 65 Cal. App. 147, 223 P. 426.

[3] Appellant further contends that the granting of respondent's motion to vacate and set aside his default and the judgment against him was an abuse of discretion on the part of the court below.

Attached to respondent's notice of motion was a verified answer and his affidavit. The answer controverted all of the material allegations of the complaint, and, if true, would constitute a complete defense to the action. The affidavit set forth what respondent claimed to be excusable neglect on his part, based on the following facts: That appellant maintained a branch in the city of Riverside, managed by C. A. Pontius, who sold the materials described in the complaint to Leon E. Bloodgood and Gertrude L. Bloodgood, owners of the property described in the lien and complaint; that, shortly after the summons was served on respondent, he talked with Pontius, and denied all liability to appellant; that Pontius then told respondent that the sole purpose of the action was to foreclose a mechanic's lien on the property described in the complaint; that respondent relied upon such statement, and concluded and believed that no personal judgment would be asked or rendered against him; that, relying upon such statement, he did not appear in the action; that he first learned of the judgment against him on December 7, 1927; that he immediately consulted an attorney, and instituted the proceedings to vacate the judgment on December 8, 1927. Counteraffidavits were filed on behalf of appellant and an additional affidavit by the respondent which were before the court at the time of the hearing of respondent's motion. Among the affidavits filed by appellant was one by C. A. Pontius, in which he denied having the alleged conversation with respondent set forth in his affidavit. This, at best, created a conflict of evidence which was decided in respondent's favor by the trial judge. The averments in the other affidavits were too general to be material to the issue.

The question to be answered on this appeal is whether or not the affidavit of respondent contained the statement of any material facts which would justify the order of the court below. It is possible, and perhaps probable, that the statement credited by respondent to Pontius to the effect that the action was instituted for the sole purpose of foreclosing a mechanic's lien upon the property described in the complaint might, and probably did, lull respondent into a sense of false security under the belief that the property would be sold to satisfy the judgment foreclosing the lien. The prompt action taken by him upon learning of the judgment, together with the specific denials and allegations of his answer, would lend color to this belief.

[4] In cases of this kind the courts are more quick to listen to a motion that will give a litigant his day in court than to one that will deprive him of his defense. In this case the only injury that could result to appellant from the granting of the motion would be the delay incident to a trial, assuming that it had a good cause of action; a delay that in all probability would have been less than the time consumed in this appeal.

[5, 6] The courts have repeatedly held that a motion to vacate a default and a default judgment is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and will not be set aside, except in a clear case of the abuse of such discretion. All presumptions must be resolved in favor of the court's action in setting aside such default and default judgment. Fink & Schindler Co. v. Gavros, 72 Cal. App. 688, 237 P. 1083; Moore v. Thompson, 138 Cal. 23, 70 P. 930; Craig v. San Bernardino Investment Co., 101 Cal. 124, 35 P. 558; Brasher v. White, 53 Cal. App. 545, 200 P. 657. We cannot say that there was an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court in granting respondent's motion.

Order appealed from is affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 31, 1929.

1. Attorney and client §167(4)—Findings and judgment in action for legal services held conclusive of principal amount plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Though plaintiff, in action for reasonable value of legal services, demanded $1,100, and trial court, at conclusion of trial, in discussing evidence, remarked that there was no evidence showing plaintiff was entitled to retainer fee of $500, and that judgment would be for sum of $650, for which judgment was entered, finding that services were of reasonable value of $650 and judgment for that amount held conclusive as to principal amount plaintiff was entitled to recover.

2. Interest §18(1)—Plaintiff, suing for reasonable value of legal services, held not entitled to interest from date of termination thereof.

Plaintiff, suing for reasonable value of legal services, held not entitled to interest from date of termination of services.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

Action by George H. Shellenberger against L. L. Baker and others. From the judgment rendered, defendant named appeals. Modified, and as modified affirmed.

Fickeisen & Richardson and J. E. Haley, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

McAdoo, Neblett, O'Connor & Clagett and B. H. Neblett, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. Defendant L. L. Baker appeals from a judgment rendered against him and Charles L. Hoffman in an action for the reasonable value of legal services.

The first point presented by appellant is that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the finding of fact made by the trial court to the effect that, at the special instance and request of appellant and his codefendant, plaintiff performed the services which are the basis of the action. It would serve no useful purpose to set forth the evidence adduced on the trial relative to the finding in question. Suffice it to say that, in the judgment of this court, the evidence was ample to sustain the finding to which objection is made.

In his complaint plaintiff demanded judgment against the defendants for the sum of $1,100. Prior to the trial, and in accordance with a demand made upon him by the defendants, plaintiff furnished to the defendants a bill of particulars of his claim, wherein, as a part thereof, was recited the item: "To 5 conferences, trip to Long Beach with Barton and English, counsel and retainer, $500.00." The total of plaintiff's claim against the defendants, as shown by the bill of particulars, amounted to $1,150.25. At the conclusion of the trial, in discussing the evidence, the trial judge made the following comment: " * * * However, there is nothing here, to my mind, that would warrant the assumption and there is no proof, whatever that Mr. Shellenberger was retained by any retainer fee. There was nothing of that kind at all. That item of $500, therefore, will be taken out. There is nothing to sustain that, but there is as to the remainder. After taking that item out, my judgment will be for the sum of $650. Let the judgment be entered."

[1] Appellant contends that, in view of the fact that the action was brought for the sum of $1,100, which, according to the bill of particulars (showing a total of $1,150.25), included the item of retainer fee, $500, and since in orally discussing the evidence that item was disallowed by the trial court, the judgment should have been for $600, instead of $650 as rendered. However, on examination of the record herein it is noted that, in regard to the value of the services performed by plaintiff "at the special instance and request of the defendants," the findings of the court are that "said services were and are of the reasonable value of $650," for which amount, together with interest and costs, judgment was rendered.

In the case of Montecito Valley Water Co. v. City of Santa Barbara, 144 Cal. 578, 595, 77 P. 1113, 1119, a question somewhat similar to that here involved was presented to the court. Therein it was said:

"The trial court filed a paper, which it entitled its 'Opinion,' the views expressed in which were somewhat modified when the formal findings of the court were subsequently prepared, signed, and filed. At the time that the opinion was presented, the court entertained the view that an amount of water in excess of 4.16 inches, namely, 6 inches of water, were abstracted by the city tunnel, and plaintiff insists that the amount so declared should control, and that this opinion should be treated as the findings of the court. The position, however, is untenable. The opinion was no more than its name imports—the informal views of the court, subject to future modification after argument, which was actually had—the legal expression of those views being found, as only properly they could be found, in the formal findings of fact and conclusions of law. Byrne v. Hoag, 116 Cal. 1, 47 P. 775; O'Brien v. O'Brien, 124 Cal. 422, 57 P. 225."

To the same effect see Estate of Yorba, 176 Cal. 166, 170, 167 P. 854; Estate of Spreckels, 165 Cal. 597, 606, 133 P. 289.

Under the foregoing authorities, the ruling here must follow that as to the principal amount the findings and the judgment are conclusive.

[2] Appellant also contends that the trial court erred in awarding interest to plaintiff at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum on the sum of $650 from the date of the termination of the services rendered by plaintiff to defendants.

Perhaps the leading case in this state on the question thus presented is that of Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 18 P. 100, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164. It is there held that: "In an action to recover the reasonable value of services performed by the plaintiff, the amount, character, and value of which can only be established by evidence in court, or by an accord between the parties, and which are not susceptible of ascertainment either by computation or by reference to market rates, the plaintiff is not entitled to interest prior to verdict or judgment."

To the same effect see Swinnerton v. Argonaut L. & D. Co., 112 Cal. 375, 44 P. 719; Macomber v. Bigelow, 123 Cal. 532, 56 P. 449.

In the case of Erickson v. Stockton & Tuolumne County R. R. Co., 148 Cal. 206, 82 P. 961, it is held that interest is not recoverable on an unliquidated claim for the value of services rendered even from the time of the commencement of the action. See, also, Gray v. Bekins, 186 Cal. 389, 199 P. 767; Tryon v. Clinch, 44 Cal. App. 629, 186 P. 1042; Hind v.

Uchida Trading Co., 55 Cal. App. 260, 203 P. 1028; Arocena v. Sawyer, 60 Cal. App. 581, 213 P. 523; Diamond Match Co. v. Aetna Casualty, etc., Co., 60 Cal. App. 425, 213 P. 56; 8 Cal. Jur., 789, 790, 796, and cases there cited.

Since the decision was rendered in the case of Erickson v. Stockton & Tuolumne County R. R. Co., 148 Cal. 206, 82 P. 961, section 1917 of the Civil Code has been repealed. Respondent has directed the attention of this court to no authority which would authorize the trial court in an action of this kind and in the circumstances here present to award interest from the date of the termination of the services of the plaintiff. The judgment should be, and hereby is, modified by striking therefrom the item by which interest was allowed on the principal sum of $650 "from the 19th day of January, 1925, at the rate of 7% per annum, or $92.00."

As thus modified, the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; YORK, J.

PETERSON v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF BAY POINT et al. (Civ. 6863.) ★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 29, 1929.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing,

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 26, 1929.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1)—Sufficiency of evidence to establish fact is primarily for trial court, whose finding, supported by substantial evidence, is conclusive on appeal.

Sufficiency of evidence to establish a given fact is primarily a question for trial court, whose finding is conclusive on appeal, if supported by substantial evidence, according it all favorable inferences.

2. Evidence ⇨389—Oral testimony as to what occurred at bank directors' meeting, minutes of which were admittedly incomplete and incorrect, was admissible.

Where both parties to action against bank for recovery of bonds and note and mortgage securing them admitted that minutes of directors' meeting, treating transaction whereby directors and cashier executed notes to bank as one in which bank loaned each maker face amount of his note, were neither complete nor correct, oral testimony as to what actually occurred was properly admitted.

3. Evidence ⇨441(11)—Oral testimony as to bank director's agreement to indorse, put up security for, and pay, other directors' notes, held not inadmissible as varying makers' absolute obligation to pay.

Oral testimony that bank directors, to make up deficiency in assets, agreed that each should sign his note, and that one of them should indorse each note, put up security, and pay notes, held not inadmissible as attempt to vary absolute obligation to pay, contained in terms of each note; it being permissible to show that delivery was conditional.

4. Replevin ⇨72—Evidence held to support finding that plaintiff's assignor agreed to loan credit, evidenced by note sued for, to establish defendant bank's credit.

In action to recover bonds and note and mortgage securing them from bank, evidence held sufficient to support court's finding that plaintiff's assignor agreed to loan his credit, as evidenced by his note, for purpose of establishing bank's credit while its capital was impaired because of national bank examiner's action in charging off certain assets as losses.

5. Replevin ⇨72—Evidence held to support finding that bank director delivered collateral to trustee for satisfaction of unpaid directors' notes.

In action by bank directors' assignee to recover bonds and note and mortgage securing them from bank, agreement of bank, another director, and trustee held to support court's finding that latter director, for purpose of securing payment of directors' notes to bank, delivered collateral to trustee, with instructions to apply it to satisfaction of such notes, if not paid.

6. Evidence ⇨424—Oral testimony as to obligations secured by agreement, to which neither plaintiff nor her assignor were parties, held admissible in action to recover note from bank.

Neither plaintiff nor her assignor being parties to agreement under which bank director delivered collateral to trustee for application to satisfaction of directors' notes, including that sued for, if not paid, oral testimony as to obligations secured thereby was properly admitted, though not entitled to as much weight as recitals of agreement.

7. Pledges ⇨19—Only pledgor of collateral for satisfaction of notes could substitute new obligations to be secured by pledge (Civ. Code, § 1479).

Under Civ. Code, § 1479, bank director delivering collateral to trustee for application to satisfaction of his and other directors' notes to bank, if not paid, was only party who could substitute new obligations to be secured by such pledge.

8. Pledges ⇨19—Bank held required to apply receipts from trustee on unpaid directors' note pursuant to original trust agreement; director pledging collateral for such purpose not being bound by bank's subsequent agreement and correspondence with others or its resolution consenting to substitution of new obligations.

Pledgor's consent to substitution of new obligations, to be secured by pledge of collateral with trustee for satisfaction of his and other directors' notes to bank, not being evidenced by agreement or correspondence to which he was not party, nor by bank's resolution consenting thereto, though he voted therefor as director, court properly held that bank was required to apply receipts from trustee to satisfaction of unpaid note in accordance with terms of original trust agreement.

9. Appeal and error ⇨931(1)—Appellate court will construe trial court's findings liberally in support of judgment.

All presumptions being in favor of trial court's findings, appellate court will give them a liberal construction in support of judgment, and any uncertainties therein must receive such construction as will uphold, rather than defeat, judgment.

10. Appeal and error ⇨931(4)—Finding that bank had no lien on bonds, note and mortgage because of nonexecution of pledge held inferentially included in express finding of delivery thereof under unfulfilled promise to execute pledge.

Court's finding that plaintiff's assignor delivered bonds, note, and mortgage sued for to bank, with representation that he would pledge them as security for his note, but subsequently refused to do so, and demanded their return, held not ambiguous, uncertain, and indecisive of issues because of failure to find positively whether assignor delivered them as security for note; finding that bank had no lien because of nonexecution of pledge being inferentially included in express finding.

11. Husband and wife ⇨45—Bank which was not husband's creditor could not question validity of his transfers of bonds, note, and mortgage to wife.

Trial court having held under its findings on uncontradicted testimony of plaintiff's husband that bank, to which he delivered bonds, note, and mortgage sued for, was not his creditor, it was in no position to question validity of his transfers thereof to plaintiff as made without valuable consideration and change of possession.

12. Replevin ⇨107—Judgment for value of bonds sold by defendant bank held not void for failure to provide in alternative for return thereof (Code Civ. Proc. § 667).

Judgment awarding plaintiff value of bonds sought to be recovered from bank, which admitted that it had previously sold them, held not void because of failure to provide in alternative for return of property or its value under Code Civ. Proc. § 667, since such provision would be unavailing.

13. Replevin ⇨107—Bank could not complain of failure of judgment against it for possession of note and mortgage to fix value of note (Code Civ. Proc. § 667).

Bank against which judgment for possession of note and mortgage was awarded could not complain of failure thereof to fix value of such instruments; provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 667, being solely for plaintiff's benefit.

14. Replevin ⇨107—Failure of judgment for recovery of note and mortgage in bank's possession to provide in alternative for recovery of their value held not erroneous.

Failure of judgment awarding plaintiff possession of note and mortgage, which were in defendant bank's possession, to provide in alternative for return of property or its value, held not erroneous, in view of bank's ability to deliver them to plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by Johanna Peterson against the First National Bank of Bay Point and others. From a judgment for plaintiff against named defendant, it appeals. Affirmed.

A. Walter Allen and Raymond T. McGlynn, both of San Francisco, and Wade W. Moore and Hugh H. Donovan, both of Pittsburg, for appellants.

Resleure & Hill, of San Francisco, for respondent.

GRAY, Justice pro tem. In this action for the recovery of Liberty and Victory bonds and a note and mortgage securing the same from the defendant bank, the action having been dismissed as to the other defendants, the pleadings framed for decision the following issues: (1) The character, conditional or absolute, of the delivery to the bank by plaintiff's assignor, her husband, of his promissory note; (2) the conditions under which the bank obtained possession of the bonds, note, and mortgage; (3) the extent of the obligations secured by Carlo Lepori's pledge, and satisfied by its performance; and (4) the validity of plaintiff's title to those bonds and the note and mortgage. Defendant bank appeals from an adverse judgment, based upon findings favorable to plaintiff upon those issues, claiming such findings are unsupported by, and contrary to, the evidence, and also that the judgment is not in alternative form required in an action of claim and delivery.

[1] Before considering the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, it is well to state the law, fixing the boundaries of our task in that regard. "The sufficiency of evidence to establish a given fact is primarily a question for the trial court, and if there is substantial evidence to support the conclusion reached below, the finding is not open to review upon appeal. Steinberger v. Young, 175 Cal. 81, 165 P. 432. And so, the finding in question is conclusive on appeal unless this court is convinced that the conclusion reached is without substantial support in the record, bearing in mind that all inferences favorable to its support are to be accorded to it. Hassell v. Bunge, 167 Cal. 365, 139 P. 800; Hind v. Oriental Products Co. (Cal. Sup.) [195 Cal. 655] 235 P. 438. Hence, here, where a clear conflict of evidence exists, this court is not justified in disturbing the finding below." Allen's Collection Agency v. Lee, 73 Cal. App. 68, 72, 238 P. 169, 171. Therefore, in this opinion, no attempt will be made to fully review all of the voluminous testimony offered at the trial, but the investigation will be limited to ascertain whether there is substantial evidence to support the disputed findings.

[2-4] On September 15, 1921, after repeated criticisms of certain assets of the bank as uncollectible and futile recommendations for their voluntary elimination, a national bank examiner charged off as losses a portion of those assets, with a result that the bank's capital was impaired to the extent of $16,174.84. Under date of October 6, 1921, the acting comptroller of the currency, in the manner and form provided by federal statute, notified the bank of such impairment, and that, if either such deficiency were not paid or the bank refused to liquidate, a receiver would be appointed. To consider the problem thus presented, a directors' meeting was held on December 6, 1921, there being present four directors, including the cashier and plaintiff's husband, the owner of 5 shares of stock, and Carlo Lepori, the owner of 170 shares, out of a total of 250 shares; also one Irwin, who was neither a stockholder nor director. At the meeting each director, including the cashier and Irwin, executed and delivered his several note, payable to the bank on demand, indorsed by Carlo Lepori. Each note was for the principal sum of $2,750, except that of Irwin, which was for $2,450, making a total of $13,450. The foregoing facts are undisputed. The only difference between the parties is as to the nature of the delivery of each note, the defendant claiming it was an absolute delivery in partial satisfaction of the impairment of $16,174.84, and the plaintiff claiming a conditional delivery, as a loan of credit until the impairment could otherwise be made up. Voluminous testimony of federal banking authorities as to the government's efforts to rehabilitate the bank, its demands in that regard, and its understanding of the transaction, creates no conflict with the testimony of the actual participants in that meeting. Both parties admit that the minutes of the meeting which treat the transaction as one in which the bank loaned each maker the face of his respective note are incorrect. It being conceded that the minutes were neither complete nor correct, oral testimony as to what actually occurred was properly admitted. Lawrence v. Premier Indem. Assur. Co., 180 Cal. 688, 182 P. 431.

Plaintiff's assignor testified that, at the meeting, Lepori was unwilling to levy a stockholder's assessment to make up the deficiency because of fear that the attendant publicity would be injurious to the bank's credit, and that the directors agreed that each should sign his note, that Lepori should indorse each note, and put up security and pay them. The other two directors, Lepori having died prior to trial, and the cashier, each testified to the same effect. Defendant's objection that such oral testimony was inadmissible because it was an attempt to vary the absolute obligation to pay, contained in the terms of each note, is clearly untenable, because it is permissible to show that the delivery was conditional. Silva v. Gordo, 65 Cal. App. 486, 224 P. 757; Allen's Collection Agency v. Lee, supra. Corroborative of the testimony are the terms of the trust agreement between the bank, Lepori and a trustee, dated January 14, 1921, of which more hereafter, and missing minutes, orally shown to have referred to the notes as "Lepori accommodation notes." This evidence, with the inferences to be drawn therefrom, amply support the court's finding that plaintiff's assignor and the bank made an agreement whereby the former, for the purpose of establishing the latter's credit during the impairment of its capital, for its accommodation, agreed to loan his credit, as evidenced by his note.

[5, 6] Defendant, because of alleged insufficiency of evidence, challenges the court's finding that Carlo Lepori, for the purpose of securing the payment of the notes, including that of plaintiff's assignor, delivered collateral to a trustee with instructions that, if the notes were not paid, the collateral should be applied to their satisfaction. Obviously, this finding is predicated upon the agreement of January 14, 1921, whose terms not only support the finding, but also compel it. This agreement first recites that the bank is desirous of removing estimated losses of $16,574.81 (obviously a clerical error for the amount of the impairment) from its current assets; that the directors made their notes and placed same in the current assets of the bank; that to remove losses by putting in such unsecured notes did not meet the law's requirements; and that Lepori, as a large stockholder and as indorser, is desirous of satisfying the government's requirement, and is willing to assist in the restoration of all estimated losses up to the date of agreement. It then provides that Lepori has placed in the trustee's possession secured collateral of a face value of $21,340; that the trustee is to hold such collateral until the bank furnishes proof that the directors' note, together with estimated losses of $3,034, have been paid; that the trustee shall credit collections in a trust account for the use of the bank; and that, if the directors' notes and the losses of $3,034 were not paid within 90 days, the trustee may, upon 30 days' notice to Lepori, sell the collateral for their face value and deliver the proceeds to the bank to pay directors' notes and the sum of $3,034. The last item does not, as contended by defendant, extend the security to other obligations, but merely provides that, if a percentage of those other obligations are paid, the time of the agreement may be extended 6 months after the expiration of the 90 days. Since neither plaintiff nor her assignor were parties to this agreement, oral testimony as to the obligations secured by it was properly admitted, but the court correctly did not give as much weight to such oral testimony as it did to the solemn recitals of this agreement. Smith v. Goethe, 159 Cal. 628, 115 P. 223, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1205.

[7, 8] The court further found that, prior to the commencement of this action, the bank received from Carlo Lepori, from another named director, and from money and property set over to it, by the trustee in accordance with the trust agreement, an amount sufficient to pay all the directors' notes, including that of plaintiff's assignor, and that all such notes have been fully paid. There can be no dispute as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the first half of this finding, for without contradiction it appears that two directors other than plaintiff's assignor paid their respective notes, that Carlo Lepori as indorser paid the cashier's note, and that the trustee delivered to the bank all the collateral and proceeds therefrom pledged under the trust agreement sufficient in amount to pay the two remaining directors' notes. But the bank claims that, as there was a substitution of obligations secured by the pledge, it was authorized to, and did, apply the receipts from the trustee to the satisfaction of the substituted obligations, leaving nothing to apply to the original obligations, to wit, the notes of the directors, including plaintiff's assignor. Ignoring plaintiff's right to object to such substitution (Civ. Code, § 2994), Carlo Lepori, as debtor under his pledge and indorsement, would be the only party who could substitute new obligations to be secured by this pledge (Civ. Code, § 1479). The agreement of June 26, 1924, between the trustee, the bank, and C. Lepori, admitted by defendant to be some person other than Carlo Lepori, while purporting to make such substitution, does not evidence Carlo Lepori's consent to such substitution, because he was not a party to such agreement. Likewise, the resolution of the bank, consenting to such substitution, fails to show the pledgor's consent to such substitution, because, although Carlo Lepori, as a director, voted for such resolution, the resolution showed the consent solely of the bank and not that of Carlo Lepori. Neither is his consent shown by the correspondence between the bank and trustee and the national banking examiner, for the obvious reason that he was not a party to any of such correspondence. The court, therefore, correctly held that, as the original trust agreement was never amended, nullified, or superseded, the bank was required to apply the receipts from the trustee to a satisfaction of the unpaid directors' note, in accordance with the plain terms of that agreement.

[9, 10] Defendant criticizes the court's finding that plaintiff's assignor delivered to the bank the bonds, note, and mortgage with the representation he would execute an agreement pledging them as security for his note, and that he subsequently refused so to do, and demanded their return, as ambiguous, uncertain, and indecisive of the issues because of its failure to positively find that the assignor either did or did not deliver them as security for his note. "Since all presumptions are in favor of the findings of the trial court, an appellate court in reviewing the findings will give them a liberal construction in support of the judgment. Any uncertainties in the findings are to receive such construction as will uphold rather than defeat the judgment, as will give them effect rather than destroy them." 2 Cal. Jur. 871. Reasonably construed, the court expressly found a delivery under a promise to execute a pledge, and a refusal so to do, and inferentially and necessarily included in the express finding a finding that the bank had no lien because of the nonexecution of the pledge. There was no necessity to find, as suggested by defendant, whether or not it had a general lien under section 3054 of the Civil Code, because no such issue was tendered either by the pleadings or the evidence.

[11] The uncontradicted testimony of plaintiff's assignor shows that he gave the bonds to his wife, as purchased, and prior to their delivery to the bank, and also that he, in writing, assigned the note and mortgage to her, after such delivery. The court so found. Defendant now urges that each transfer, having been made without valuable consideration and change of possession, was invalid as a fraud upon the bank as creditor of the assignor. But as the court under those findings above mentioned clearly held that the bank was not a creditor, it is in no position to question the validity to these transfers. Ackerman v. Schultz, 178 Cal. 190, 172 P. 609.

[12-14] The judgment awarded to plaintiff possession of the note and mortgage, together with collections thereon and the value of the bonds. Defendant urges that its failure to provide, in alternative, for the return of the property or its value (Code Civ. Proc. § 667), renders it void. Since defendant admitted at the trial that it had previously sold the bonds, any provision for their return would necessarily be unavailing, and the judgment was properly for their value. Erreca v. Meyer, 142 Cal. 308, 75 P. 826; Skaggs v. Taylor, 77 Cal. App. 519, 247 P. 218. As to the failure to fix the value of the note and mortgage, the Code provision is solely for the benefit of the plaintiff, and she is the only one who can complain as to such omission. Griffith v. Reddick, 41 Cal. App. 458, 182 P. 984; Waldman v. Broder, 10 Cal. 379; Whetmore v. Rupe, 65 Cal. 237, 3 P. 851. Furthermore, since the evidence discloses that the bank has possession of the note and mortgage, and can deliver them to the plaintiff, the failure to make the judgment alternative in form is not erroneous. Beggs v. Smith, 26 Cal. App. 532, 147 P. 585.

The judgment is affirmed.

101 Cal. App. 652

MAHONEY et al. v. ATCHISON, T. & S. F. RY. CO. et al. (Civ. 3899.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 1, 1929.

1. Pleading ⇨121(1)—Answer alleging defendant has no information or belief may deny allegations of particular paragraph without specifically setting them forth.

Where answer alleges that defendant has no information or belief sufficient to enable him to answer allegations of particular paragraph of complaint, he may deny said paragraph by denying all allegations thereof without specifically setting forth such allegations.

2. Pleading ⇨121(3)—Defendant's denials of matters alleged in verified complaint presumably within defendant's knowledge must be specific (Code Civ. Proc. § 437).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 437, as it existed at time of trial, providing that denial of each allegation of verified complaint controverted must be specific and be made positively or according to defendant's information and belief, where matters alleged in verified complaint are presumably within defendant's knowledge, his denials thereof must be specific.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1170(3)—Ruling that defective denials of verified complaint allegations were good did not require reversal unless miscarriage of justice resulted (Code Civ. Proc. § 437; Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Where plaintiffs' verified complaint alleged specific acts of negligence by defendants and trial court held that denials in defendants' answer of allegations contained in certain paragraph of complaint were good, and thereafter plaintiffs without objection introduced evidence to prove allegations defectively denied under Code Civ. Proc. § 437, which at that time provided that if complaint be verified denial of each allegation controverted must be specific and positively made, or according to information and belief of defendant, and defendants without objection introduced evidence in opposition thereto, trial court's ruling did not justify reversal unless it deprived plaintiffs of a substantial right and resulted in miscarriage of justice under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1170(6)—Evidence being insufficient to warrant judgment for injuries to automobile guest in collision near railroad crossing, reversal of judgment for defendants for trial error was precluded (Civ. Code, § 486; Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In action for injuries to guest in automobile struck by train near crossing in which evidence was insufficient to warrant judgment for plaintiffs on theory that no bell was rung or whistle sounded as required by Civ. Code, § 486, or that train was wilfully and negligently operated at reckless and dangerous rate of speed without due care and caution, Const. art. 6, § 4½, precluded reversal of judgment for defendants for erroneous trial ruling.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Robert B. Lambert, Judge.

Action by Lawrence Mahoney and another against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Dorris & Henderson, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

E. W. Camp, Robert Brennan, and Leo E. Sievert, all of Los Angeles, and C. L. Clafin, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. This is an action for personal injuries suffered by plaintiff Maria Mahoney when an automobile in which she was riding as a guest was struck by a railroad train alleged to have been in the "exclusive possession and control" of the defendant railway company. Verdict and judgment went for the defendants, and the plaintiffs have appealed from the judgment.

The accident occurred near a country crossing a few miles south of Bakersfield. The highway there runs north and south and the railroad runs from a northeasterly to a southwesterly direction. The automobile in which Mrs. Mahoney was riding approached the crossing from the south as the train in question was approaching from the northeast. The complaint alleges that the view of the railroad from the highway is so obstructed as to make the crossing "extremely dangerous to those approaching it along the said highway." Admittedly, this allegation was sufficiently denied by the defendants and the evidence relating thereto is conflicting. Paragraph IX of the verified complaint reads as follows: "That as the said locomotive and string of cars approached the said crossing, and before they entered upon said crossing, as aforesaid, the defendants and each of them wilfully, carelessly and negligently failed to sound any whistle, ring any bell or give any other warning signal of the approach of the said locomotive and the string of cars to the said crossing, and that the said defendants wilfully and negligently propelled, ran and operated the said locomotive and the said string of cars up to and upon said crossing at a reckless and dangerous rate of speed, and wilfully and negligently failed to maintain or exercise due care and caution in the control and management of the said locomotive and the said cars while the same were approaching and entering upon the said crossing."

The defendants answered paragraph IX in the following language: "Defendant denies the allegations contained in the ninth paragraph of said complaint and all thereof."

In like form the defendants denied the allegation that the train was in the possession and control of the defendant railway company. In a separate defense the railway company alleged that the collision was "proximately caused by the negligence of the said

Marla Mahoney," setting forth the particulars of such negligence. In appellants' opening brief four alleged errors are specified, and it is then said: "These four errors all relate to one principle, and they may be considered together. The principle is that a denial of the allegations of a verified complaint which merely states that 'defendant denies the allegations of paragraph (giving number) and all thereof' is not such a specific denial as is required under our system of pleading, and is in effect an admission of the allegations of those paragraphs of the verified complaint."

At the time the answer was filed and at the time of the trial, section 437 of the Code of Civil Procedure provided: "If the complaint be verified, the denial of each allegation controverted must be specific, and be made positively, or according to the information and belief of the defendant."

[1, 2] It has been held that in an answer alleging that the defendant has no information or belief sufficient to enable him to answer the allegations of a particular paragraph of the complaint he may deny the same in the form adopted by the defendants in this case. Read v. Buffum, 79 Cal. 77, 82, 21 P. 555, 12 Am. St. Rep. 131. In considering similar denials, in Etchas v. Orena, 121 Cal. 270, 271, 53 P. 798, 799, it is said: "None of these facts were presumably within the knowledge of the defendant. * * * In answering the complaint in this form, it was not necessary that he should make a specific denial of each of the allegations. * * * As the defendant was equally without information or belief upon either of them, he could properly make the denial in the form adopted by him." In Jensen v. Dorr, 159 Cal. 742, 747, 116 P. 553, 555, in discussing similar general denials for want of information or belief, it is said: "Whatever we might think of this form of denial were the question a new one in this state, it is settled by the decisions that as to matters not presumably within the knowledge of a defendant such a form of denial is permissible, and that a specific denial of each of the allegations as to such matters is not essential, notwithstanding that the complaint is verified." Where, however, the matters alleged in the complaint are presumably within the knowledge of the defendant, his denials thereof, as the foregoing decisions imply, must be specific. Hensley v. Tartar, 14 Cal. 508, 510; People v. Hagar, 52 Cal. 171, 182; Muraco v. Don, 79 Cal. App. 738, 250 P. 1109; Kinard v. Kaelin, 22 Cal. App. 383, 390, 134 P. 370.

[3] The plaintiffs did not demur to the answer or move to strike out any of the defective denials thereof. Plaintiffs' first suggestion that such denials were defective was made by their counsel during the opening statement to the jury, when it was stated that the answer of the defendant railway company admitted that the train which struck the automobile was being operated by such defendant at the time of the accident. Counsel for the railway company interrupted and denied that the answer made any such admission. After argument by respective counsel, the court said, "I will hold that denial good." The plaintiffs, without further objection, thereupon introduced evidence to prove the allegations defectively denied and the defendants, also without objection by plaintiffs, introduced evidence in opposition thereto. At the close of the evidence the court refused to instruct the jury, as requested by the plaintiffs, to find for them in accordance with the allegations so denied. Respondents contend that, by introducing evidence in support of such allegations, the plaintiffs abandoned their objections to the sufficiency of the denials thereof. In discussing a similar question it is said: "It is not only the right of the court to settle or to designate at the outset of a trial the issues of fact which have been joined by the pleadings, and to direct and limit the introduction of evidence to those issues alone, but it is eminently a proper practice, and one which would serve greatly to expedite the trial of causes, if more commonly followed. At the same time, when the court has so declared upon the issues, either party has the unquestioned right to except to the ruling of the court, and, if by that ruling he shall have been deprived of any substantial right of defense to urge that upon the attention of the appellate court. He may not only submit to the ruling of the court without future offer of evidence upon the excluded defense, but it is his duty to accept such ruling." Pastene v. Pardini, 135 Cal. 431, 433, 67 P. 681, 682. See, also, San Joaquin L. & P. Co. v. Barlow, 43 Cal. App. 241, 243, 184 P. 899.

It remains to determine whether the plaintiffs have been "deprived of any substantial right" by the ruling of the court. A judgment is not to be reversed "for any error as to any matter of pleading, * * * unless, * * * the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." Const. art. 6, § 4½. There is nothing in the record to indicate that the case was not tried on its merits as fully as if the allegations of the complaint had all been denied specifically.

[4] The plaintiffs introduced evidence tending to show that the train in question was being operated by the defendant railway company at the time of the accident. They called the engineer and fireman of the train crew as adverse witnesses, both of them being named as defendants. The engineer testified "that the train was operating between 28 and 30 miles per hour; that the bell on the locomotive was ringing; that he blew the regulation crossing whistle for this crossing; that just as the pilot of the engine started over the concrete pavement of the highway the fireman yelled at him, 'hold her'; that he immediately applied the brakes in emergency; that just as he did apply the brakes in emergency he saw the automobile appear on the railway track, approximately 50 feet in front of the pilot of the locomotive; that he did not put the locomotive in reverse." The plaintiffs called two experts, who testified that a locomotive can be stopped more quickly by putting it in reverse than by the application of the air brakes and that "releasing the sand from the sand dome on to the track assists in making a sudden stop." One of them expressed the opinion that "a locomotive with one express car and one passenger coach attached, running at the rate of 28 or 30 miles an hour, could be stopped in a distance of less than 100 feet." He admitted "that he wanted to see the railroad company lose the suit." A county traffic officer, called by the plaintiffs, testified "that he heard the locomotive whistle; that he arrived at the scene of the accident just a short time after it happened and assisted in moving the injured parties; that he examined the highway and found rubber marks showing where the car had slid its wheels; that he paced the rubber marks from where the tires gradually started to slide to where they left the pavement and it was 48 good long steps, better than 150 feet; that after the car left the pavement he traced the tracks up onto the railway track at the point of the collision." Another of plaintiffs' witnesses testified "that he saw rubber marks on the pavement for approximately 150 feet before they left the pavement; the pavement was dry; that the automobile was struck upon the railroad right of way and not upon the highway." Witnesses for the defendant testified that the locomotive whistle was blown and that the bell was ringing as the train approached the crossing and that the train was moving at 28 to 30 miles an hour. One of them testified that he "measured the tire marks on the pavement; that the first tire marks on the pavement were 220 feet from the rails; that they started to leave the pavement 123 feet from the rails; that he traced the wheel marks down through a gully three or four feet deep and onto the railroad track; that the automoble was struck exactly 66 feet from the center of the crossing." The driver of a hay wagon testified that "nearly a quarter of a mile from the railroad tracks, the automobile involved in the accident passed him going at the rate of 50 miles per hour." An expert witness testified "that a train similar to the train involved in the accident traveling at the rate of 30 miles per hour, completely equipped with automatic air brake equipment, functioning in perfect efficiency, could not be stopped in less than 300 feet."

Appellants admit that the "dangerous character of the crossing was one properly placed in issue" and, under the evidence, "was a question for the jury." The other alleged acts of negligence relied on by the appellants, as stated in their opening brief, are: "The failure of the engine crew to ring the bell or sound the whistle as required by section 486 of the Civil Code" and "the failure of the engine crew to use proper means to stop the locomotive, upon ascertaining that the approaching automobile was likely to go upon the track."

The uncontradicted evidence shows that the bell was rung and the whistle sounded as required by section 486. No effort was made to prove the contrary. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, it appears that it would have been possible to have stopped the train within a distance of 100 feet and that the train crew first discovered the perilous position of the automobile when the train was within about 70 feet or less of the point of collision, and when it was therefore impossible to stop the train in time to avoid the collision.

An examination of the entire record not only fails to show "that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice," but it affirmatively appears that the evidence is insufficient to support a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs. Under such circumstances the constitutional provision cited forbids a reversal. Nittler v. Continental Casualty Co. (Cal. App.) 272 P. 309.

The judgment is affirmed.

LA RUE v. BARR. (S. F. 13016.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 4, 1929.

Appeal and error $\S$ 979(2)—Appellate court will not interfere with granting of new trial, supported on theory that evidence did not support finding of jury.

Since order granting new trial may be supported on theory that evidence does not support finding of jury that services of plaintiff of reasonable value of $12,000, in addition to value of plaintiff's board and lodging for over eight years, were rendered by plaintiff to decedent, Supreme Court cannot interfere with exercise of discretion of trial court, after its personal observation of witnesses.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Charles R. Barnard, Judge.

Action by Jennie La Rue against Warden T. Barr, as administrator of the estate of Helen C. La Rue, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff. From an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Superseding opinion in 279 P. 1019.

Lewis H. Smith, of Los Angeles, and Archie A. Smith, of Fresno, for appellant.

Frank Kauke, of Fresno, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order granting a new trial, after a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff for $12,000.

The plaintiff was the stepgranddaughter of defendant's decedent. Plaintiff lived in the home of decedent for over eight years prior to the death of the latter. During this period of time she was employed outside the home during the day for a considerable period, and it appears from the evidence that she assisted her grandmother with the household duties, attended to the household errands, and served as companion for the older woman during the evenings and when she was not employed otherwise. Upon the death of the grandmother, plaintiff contended that there was a contract between herself and decedent, whereby decedent promised to give by will all her property to plaintiff, if plaintiff would live with her, and aid and assist her in and about the household. This contract was pleaded in the first count of the complaint, but, not being in writing, was unenforceable, and a demurrer to that count was sustained. Plaintiff pleaded in a second count a cause of action for the reasonable value of her services, which she alleged to be $12,000, which was slightly more than the value of the estate.

The evidence is conflicting as to the amount of service rendered by plaintiff, and as to the demands made upon her by her grandmother. Even the impersonal printed pages of the record leave doubt as to whether the arrangement was for the benefit of the grandmother, or for the benefit of plaintiff, or for their mutual benefit, and, while the jury has found for the plaintiff in a sum in excess of the value of the estate, the trial court, in its discretion, has granted a new trial upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence.

Appellant contends that, since the motion for a new trial was based upon several grounds, including that of excessive damages, and was granted upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, we may not support it upon the ground of excessive damages, even though we are of the opinion that the trial court had in mind the question of excessive damages in awarding the new trial. The case of Smith v. Royer, 181 Cal. 165, 183 P. 660, restating a well-established rule, holds that the granting of a new trial rests very largely in the discretion of the trial court, and such an order will not be disturbed, if it can be upheld upon any ground shown by the record. To the same effect is the case of Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269, 29 P. 481, 18 L. R. A. 124.

Since the order granting a new trial may be supported upon the theory that the evidence does not support the finding of the jury that services of the reasonable value of $12,000, in addition to the value of plaintiff's board and lodging for over eight years, were rendered by plaintiff to decedent, we cannot interfere with the exercise of the discretion of the trial court after its personal observation of the witnesses.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Negligence of third party, if any, however much it might contribute to injury of another, is no defense for one whose negligence helps to bring about such injury.

2. Automobiles $\S$ 244(2, 36)—Evidence of defendant's negligence and proximate cause of collision held to support judgment for plaintiff for injury received in automobile collision while turning into private driveway.

In action for injury received in automobile collision while turning into private driveway, evidence of defendant's negligence and proximate cause of collision held to justify verdict for plaintiff.

3. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 133(6)—Statement of counsel that defendant in personal injury action was presumably wealthy held not grossly improper, in view of instruction to disregard.

In action for injuries received in automobile collision, statement of plaintiff's counsel in argument to jury that defendant was presumably wealthy could not be said to be either grossly improper or highly prejudicial, where court instructed jury to disregard it, and it was not claimed that verdict was excessive.

4. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 127—Question whether defendant selected place to which automobile was taken for repairs held proper cross-examination, and not prejudicial, as suggestive of insurance.

In action for injury received in automobile collision where inquiry was being made about repairs, question whether defendant selected name of place to which his automobile was taken for repairs held proper cross-examination, and not prejudicial, as being suggestive of insurance.

5. Evidence $\hookrightarrow$ 382—Discretion of trial court in admitting photograph of party injured in automobile accident, taken after accident, held not abused.

In action for injuries received in automobile collision, admissibility of photograph of injured party, taken shortly after accident and after her first operation, was within discretion of trial court.

7. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 1170(9)—Instruction, erroneous in unduly favoring negligent defendant as against his codefendant, held not to justify granting such codefendant new trial (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In passenger's action for injuries received in automobile collision, instructions, erroneous in unduly favoring one negligent defendant as against his codefendant, held not to justify granting of new trial on part of such codefendant, who was guilty of negligence proximately causing or contributing to injury, on ground that miscarriage of justice resulted, under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

8. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 880(3)—Negligent defendant cannot be heard to complain on ground that his codefendant unjustly escaped liability.

Fact that one codefendant unjustly escaped liability is not ground for complaint on part of negligent defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edmund P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by John H. Crabbe and another against Ira O. Rhoades and another. From a judgment for plaintiff against the named defendant, such defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. H. Sooy and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco (Geo. Allan Smith, of Monterey, of counsel), for appellant.

John H. Crabbe, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LUCAS, Justice pro tem. The appeal in this case is taken from a judgment on a verdict for $35,000, obtained in the court below as damages for personal injuries sustained by Mary F. Crabbe in a collision between two automobiles and for the resulting loss of her services to John H. Crabbe, her husband. The drivers of both colliding cars were joined as parties defendant, and negligence on the part of both was alleged. By the verdict of the jury, however, defendant Olive Gaston, driver of the car in which Mrs. Crabbe was a guest passenger, was impliedly found free from negligence, and the full amount of the verdict in favor of plaintiffs was rendered against the defendant Rhoades, appellant herein.

Without conceding that there was sufficient evidence of negligence on his part to warrant the case going to the jury, appellant takes the position that, even if the evidence might be considered sufficient for that purpose, it is nevertheless so slight and unsatisfactory as to call for a reversal, if any errors occurred in the trial, or if any prejudicial matters were injected into the case. He then proceeds to point out several matters and things wherein it is claimed the court erred, and directs attention to alleged prejudicial misconduct on the part of respondents' attorney. A casual examination of the record is sufficient to warrant the conclusion that the case was properly one for the jury on the question of the negligence of Rhoades; but a careful analysis of the evidence is necessary, in order to determine whether the conduct complained of or the alleged errors of the court were such as to warrant a reversal of the judgment.

The undisputed facts are that plaintiffs and respondents, John H. and Mary F. Crabbe are husband and wife; the husband being for many years a practicing attorney in San Francisco, and the wife, prior to her injury, being active in social affairs and club work. Mrs. Crabbe was 52 years of age at the time of trial. At about 11 o'clock a. m. on the morning of June 20, 1925, the defendant Olive Gaston, driving an inclosed Studebaker car weighing about 3,400 pounds, and accompanied by Mrs. Crabbe, Mrs. Rose Hepburn, and Mrs. Cordelia Page, left the Clift Hotel, in San Francisco, en route to a charitable affair at Menlo Park, San Mateo county. Mrs. Crabbe sat beside Mrs. Gaston in the front seat; Mrs. Hepburn and Mrs. Page occupying the rear seat. They had arranged to meet for luncheon another group of ladies at the Café de Paris, a café situated on the east side of the state highway leading from San Francisco to San Jose, immediately north of and adjoining the northerly limits of the incorporated city of Atherton.

At about 10:30 a. m. the same day appellant Ira O. Rhoades, a man past 60 years of age, left the city of San Jose in a Paige sedan, the weight of which was approximately 4,300 pounds, and proceeded in a northerly direction on said state highway toward San Francisco. Mr. Rhoades was alone in the driver's seat, while the rear seat was occupied by his wife, Katherine Rhoades, and a Mrs. Lillian G. Thomas. Mrs. Rhoades, who had been confined to her bed in a San Jose hotel for about two weeks with a severe heart attack, was being taken to her San Francisco home. The two cars came together at a point about opposite the Café de Paris. Here the paved portion of the highway is 30 feet wide and runs in a generally northerly and southerly direction. The Gaston car was proceeding south on the westerly side of the highway; the Rhoades car was traveling north on the easterly side.

As Mrs. Gaston's car approached the vicinity of the café she lessened its speed, and as she was passing, or had about passed, the café building proper, she made a left turn across the highway to the east for the purpose of entering the south driveway of the café grounds. When her automobile, heading in an easterly direction, and at right angles to the highway, had practically crossed the paved portion thereof, so that only about two feet of the rear of the car extended over the pavement on the east side of the road, the Paige sedan, driven by appellant, Ira O. Rhoades, came into collision with the rear of the Gaston car. Neither car was overturned. The Rhoades car proceeded about 35 feet in a northerly direction after the impact; the Gaston car came to rest against a cement post and curbing about 20 feet easterly of the east edge of the pavement and directly in front of the café. This point was about 20 or 25 feet north of the point of impact. Previous to making the turn, the Gaston car had been going in a southerly direction, but when it came to rest after the impact it was 20 or 25 feet further back toward the north than it was when crossing the highway. It was also turned completely around, for, while it had been facing east when the collision happened, when it came to rest the rear end was against the curb, and the front was facing approximately due west.

Either at the time of the collision of the two cars or at the time the Studebaker struck the cement post and curb, Mrs. Crabbe was thrown against some part of the automobile in which she was riding and sustained the injuries complained of. While these facts are necessary to an understanding of the case, they, of course, shed no light upon the subject of proximate cause. On this subject the evidence is decidedly conflicting.

As to negligence on the part of defendant Gaston, it is practically admitted that she was guilty of negligence per se in not complying with the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Law then in force (St. 1923, p. 558, § 130), requiring that "(a) the driver of any vehicle upon a public highway before starting, turning or stopping such vehicle shall first see that such movement can be made in safety, and if it cannot be made in safety, shall wait until it can be made in safety; then, if the operation of any other vehicle may reasonably be affected by such movement, the driver shall give a signal plainly visible to the driver of such other vehicle of the intention to make such movement. * * * Whenever the signal is given by means of the hand and arm, the driver shall indicate his intention to turn to the left by extending his hand and arm horizontally from and beyond the left side of the vehicle. * * * The signal herein required to be given * * * shall be given continuously during the last fifty feet traveled by the vehicle before turning."

[1] Whether or not Mrs. Gaston's violation of the above statute proximately contributed to the collision and the resulting injuries of Mrs. Crabbe is an entirely different question, which, whether rightfully or wrongfully, the jury answered in Mrs. Gaston's favor. Likewise all questions of negligence in fact were resolved in her favor. With the correctness of these findings we are not here concerned, for the fault of Mrs. Gaston, if any, however much it may have contributed to the injury, is no defense for one whose negligence helped to bring the injury about. Pastene v. Adams, 49 Cal. 87.

Negligence has been frequently defined as "the want of such care as a person of ordinary prudence would exercise under the circumstances of the case; the omission to do something which a reasonable man guided by those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs would do, or doing something which a reasonable and prudent man would not do. Negligence may be active or passive in character and may consist in heedlessly doing an improper thing or in heedlessly refraining from doing a proper thing. One who does not do what he should do is chargeable with negligence equally with him who does that which he should not." 19 Cal. Jur. 548.

[2] Both an act of commission and one of omission are by plaintiffs and respondents attributed to appellant as negligence proximately contributing to the injury, namely, excessive speed and failure to ever so slightly turn his car to the left, so as to avoid the collision. On the latter subject it is undisputed that at the time of the impact practically all of the Gaston car was easterly of the paved portion of the highway, the rear of the car extending but two feet westerly over the easterly line of the pavement. It is clear, therefore, that if at that point appellant's car was traveling at a distance of but 2½ feet or more westerly of said line the collision would not have occurred. It is also made clear from the evidence that appellant observed the Gaston car when he was some 40 or 50 feet southerly from it, that his view was unobstructed, and that there was nothing to interfere with his veering to the west on the paved portion of the highway sufficiently far to avoid the collision.

Concerning the rate of speed at which his Paige car was traveling, there is considerable conflict in the evidence. Rhoades himself testified that he was traveling at a rate of speed not to exceed 25 miles per hour, at a place where the speed limit was said by the court in its instructions to be 35 miles an hour. The credibility of this party, however, was somewhat impaired by his subsequent testimony to the effect that at the time of the collision his car had come to a full stop and that the Gaston car ran into it. This testimony was impeached by the testimony of several witnesses and by the physical condition found to exist immediately after the impact. Several witnesses, including two state motor officers, testified that from the point of impact northerly for a distance of something like 35 feet or more there were black skid marks on the pavement leading to the point where appellant's car finally came to rest. These marks could not have been made, had it been true, as appellant testified, that he stopped before the impact and then drove his car forward to its final stopping place.

Evidence tending to show that appellant was not traveling at an excessive speed was given by Bert L. Hackett, apparently a disinterested witness, who was driving northward behind Rhoades, and who testified that appellant was traveling at about 25 miles per hour. The force of this testimony, however, is materially lessened by the testimony of the two traffic officers that, immediately after the accident Hackett had said that appellant passed him "going like hell," and that "the man ought to be hung." Furthermore, as opposed to the testimony of Rhoades and Hackett is the testimony of Mrs. Hepburn, a guest of Mrs. Gaston, who testified that in her opinion the Rhoades car was traveling between 55 and 60 miles an hour when she first saw it, about 300 feet away, and that as a result of the impact the Gaston car (admittedly traveling at a slow rate of speed) was turned end for end by the impact, and the further physical fact that, when it came to rest, it was back from 20 to 25 feet in the direction from which it had been coming.

This and other evidence appearing in the record, which it is not necessary to set forth in full, not only made out a case of negligence on the part of appellant sufficient to warrant it being submitted to the jury, but is of such probative value as to justify this court in holding that, on the questions of appellant's negligence and proximate cause, the judgment appealed from is amply supported by the evidence.

[3] The acts claimed by appellant to constitute prejudicial misconduct on the part of respondents' attorney are said to disclose an attempt to prejudice the jury against appellant and his attorneys, and to lead the jury to believe the appellant was both wealthy and fully protected by insurance, while his codefendant was a poor, unprotected widow. After examining the record and the remarks of counsel assigned as error, we find them to consist principally of side-bar remarks, reflecting the ordinary attempt of a trial lawyer to ingratiate himself with the jury. These, while uncalled for, cannot be held to constitute prejudicial error. As inciding the conduct complained of, attention is directed to the following statement made by respondents' counsel in his argument to the jury: "Mr. Rhoades is a man of importance. But we are not going to be appalled by that fact surely. The fact that he happens to be a man of power in the community, and presumably wealthy—that is not going to frighten me."

The statement of counsel that appellant was "a man of importance" was justified by the showing in the record of the positions he had held and by the argument advanced by his own counsel in an endeavor to impress the jury with his client's integrity. The statement that appellant was presumably wealthy was entirely outside of the record and unjustified by the evidence. Immediately upon this statement being made, however, appellant's attorney assigned the remark as misconduct, and asked that the jury be discharged. The court thereupon, while denying the motion, stated that there was no evidence in the record concerning the wealth of any of the parties, and instructed the jury to that effect, and that wealth was not a proper subject of discussion before the jury. There then ensued between counsel considerable argument in reference to the expression "presumably a man of wealth," resulting in a further instruction by the court to the jury to disregard the statement, a request by respondents' counsel that the court instruct the jury to disregard it, and a further statement by said counsel that there was no evidence before the jury with respect to the wealth of any one, and that he did not claim there was any such evidence.

As was said in the case of Perez v. Crocker, 86 Cal. App. 288, 293, 260 P. 838, 840: "The question is whether or not the argument falls within that class of argumentative statements which are grossly improper and highly prejudicial, and whose evil influence and effect cannot be eradicated from the minds of the jury by any admonition from the trial judge. There is no horizontal rule by which we may be governed to determine these qualities, but each case is to be decided on its own merits, much depending upon the issues, the parties, and general atmosphere of the case." Applying this rule to the occurrences just detailed, and bearing in mind that there is no claim of the verdict herein being excessive, we cannot say that the statement complained of was either grossly improper or highly prejudicial.

[4] The following questions by respondents' counsel to appellant are also assigned as error:

"Q. Where was it [appellant's car] repaired? A. I don't know the name of the concern.

"Q. Did you select the name of the place to which it was taken for repairs?" On objection this question was withdrawn. Thereupon, after appellant's attorney had given the name of Harding & Keene as the name of the firm repairing appellant's car, the following questions were asked:

"Q. Did you receive a bill from Harding & Keene? A. No, sir.

"Q. Did you see the bill? A. No, sir.

"Q. Did you pay the bill? A. No, sir.

"Q. I asked you yesterday on the stand the place of your residence in San Francisco. What did you reply? A. I replied 1665 Eighth avenue.

"Q. Do you live there at the present time? A. Temporarily I have not been living there.

"Q. You live at the Fairmont, don't you? A. No; I don't live at the Fairmont.

"Q. Where do you live? A. I've been sleeping temporarily at the Mark Hopkins. I have been unable to sleep in my house in the evening."

References to the Fairmont and Mark Hopkins Hotels, known to all San Franciscans as hostleries of the better class, are said to have been made for the purpose of showing that appellant was a man of means, and the questions concerning the place where his car was repaired, and whether or not he received or paid the bill therefor, are said to have been asked for the purpose of suggesting to the jury that some insurance company was paying the bill.

The record shows, however, that preceding the question, "Where was it [appellant's car] repaired," counsel had asked about the injuries to the car, where it was taken after the accident, and whether the witness remembered the name of the garage in Redwood City where it was taken, and then asked, "Did you select the place where it should go to?" Counsel objected, and the court said: "They have a right to inquire where it was brought, so they can inquire there what repairs were made." The question was again asked, and, upon objection, withdrawn. Then came the question: "Did you receive a bill for the repairs?" After objection, the court said: "If you have the bill, produce the bill, and they can inquire there what repairs were made."

Appellant's counsel then furnished the name of the firm repairing the car, and respondents' counsel asked: "Did you receive a bill from Harding & Keene's?" This was not objected to. Counsel asked that the answer be stricken out, and the court, in denying the motion, said: "Suppose he had a bill, and it said that such and such a part of the machine was repaired; * * * if he does not remember, he can look at the bill and refresh his memory." The question, "Did you see the bill?" was asked by the court, and was not objected to; and the question, "Did you pay the bill?" asked by respondents' counsel, was likewise not objected to.

It is quite apparent that in this series of questions the only one that counsel could possibly assign as error is the one that was withdrawn; i. e., "Did you select the name of the place to which it was taken for repairs?" Appearing in the place it does in the record, where inquiry was being made about repairs, it is proper cross-examination, and not prejudicial, as being suggestive of insurance. To say that the other questions asked in reference to appellant's residence constitute or tend to constitute reversible error, we feel, would be to greatly exaggerate their importance. Furthermore, they were not objected to.

[5] The trial court's action in admitting in evidence a photograph of respondent Mary F. Crabbe, taken a short time after the accident and after her first operation, is also assigned as reversible error. The facts are that Mrs. Crabbe was frightfully injured about the head and face, one cheek bone was crushed, the sight of one eye destroyed, and the eye itself removed. Owing to the destruction of the cheek bone, she will never be able to wear an artificial eye. The photograph objected to was taken by Dr. Smith before the plastic surgery was done, or, as he expressed it, before he "commenced the big job of trying to mold back her face into presentable shape." It is true that there is a shocking contrast between the photograph of Mrs. Crabbe taken before the accident, and offered and received in evidence, and the one taken after the preliminary operation and before the plastic surgery was done, and it is also true that Mrs. Crabbe was present in court and the jury had an opportunity of seeing her in person; but they could not get a proper appreciation of her appearance, and the attendant physical and mental suffering that must have been hers prior to the plastic surgery, without such a photograph. In the opinion of this court it was clearly admissible on the question of damages, and, there being no complaint that the damages awarded are excessive, appellant's point appears to be without merit. In urging the point, however, appellant cites authority from Wigmore on Evidence (2d Ed.) vol. 2, p. 97, § 792(2), as follows: "There may be an objection * * * to the reproduction of a corporeal injury * * * calculated unduly to excite sympathy for one party and unfair prejudice against the other."

In the original text the language quoted is followed, in the same sentence, by the statement that the objection referred to therein is identical with an objection considered in subsequent sections of the text-book. An examination of these sections shows the true rule to be that the admissibility of such evidence is clearly within the discretion of the trial court. There was no abuse of discretion here.

Another claim of error is based upon the admission of a certain conversation claimed to be prejudicial. This conversation was said by a disinterested witness, who was present immediately after the accident, to have taken place between Mr. Rhoades and Mrs. Gaston. The record follows:

"Q. Did you hear any conversation between them? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Can you tell us what that conversation was? (Objected to and overruled.)

"Q. Will you tell what it was? A. Mr. Rhoades said to Mrs. Gaston, 'Why didn't you hold out your hand?' And she said, 'I did; you must have been going at a fearful rate of speed.'

"Q. Is that all the conversation? A. Well, that is the conversation I heard.

"Q. That is all the conversation you heard? Now, were you occupied— A. In attending this lady; yes, stopping the blood."

The substance of the conversation was really an accusation and a counter-accusation on the part of the drivers of the two colliding automobiles, each attributing negligence and wrongdoing to the other. The difference between the two is that Mrs. Gaston denies Rhoades' accusation, while the witness did not hear Rhoades' reply to Mrs. Gaston. The reply not being given, there is no proof that the accusation by Mrs. Gaston was admitted by Rhoades. The accusation of excessive speed, therefore, had little or no weight, particularly since Rhoades in his examination was given the opportunity to, and did, deny it.

Coming now to the subject of instructions, our attention has been directed to some 20 or more which are said to be contradictory, erroneous, or prejudicial. With respect thereto it is urged that, since it is practically an admitted fact in the case that Mrs. Crabbe was entirely free from negligence, the real contest is one between appellant, Rhoades, and his codefendant Mrs. Gaston; that, therefore, each of the codefendants was vitally interested in and affected by the instructions of the court bearing on the conduct and rights of the other, and that anything tending to relieve the defendant Gaston of responsibility, or to unduly favor her, was prejudicial against appellant's defense that Mrs. Gaston, and not he, was to blame. Much of the criticism we find unmerited; some of it is well taken.

We feel that it is unnecessary to here discuss all of the instructions which we find to be erroneously assigned as error, or which, while containing some slightly objectionable matter, are on the whole more favorable to appellant than to defendant Gaston, but will more particularly confine our discussion to those which we believe to be error and to an endeavor to determine whether that error is sufficiently prejudicial, under the law and the facts of the case, to warrant a reversal.

Instruction 55 is an example of one erroneously assigned as error. It reads:

[8] "LV. I instruct you that defendant Olive Gaston had a right to assume that other persons, using said highway at the time and place in question, would so operate their automobiles as to permit other persons operating automobiles, and in the exercise of ordinary care, to do so without endangering life, limb, or property."

This is a correct statement of the law. A person operating an automobile has the right to assume that others will so operate their automobiles as to permit drivers exercising ordinary care to operate their automobiles without endangering life, limb, or property.

Instruction 15 may be used as an example of an instruction containing slightly objectionable matter, but which on the whole was more favorable to appellant than to Mrs. Gaston, and was therefore not prejudicial. This instruction contains the expression: "If you further find that she [Mrs. Gaston] observed the car of the defendant Ira O. Rhoades approaching at an exceedingly fast rate of speed for that time and place, she, the defendant Olive Gaston, was no longer entitled to rely upon the presumption that the defendant Rhoades would comply with the rules of the road, and she was bound to take such reasonable measures as she could, under the circumstances, to prevent a collision."

The instruction is attacked upon the ground that it contains the expression "exceedingly fast rate of speed," which of itself does not imply an illegal rate of speed, and, furthermore, on the ground that the liability of Mrs. Gaston was predicated upon her failure to use ordinary care only after having seen the Rhoades car approaching. As a matter of fact, the instruction contained the admonition that a motorist must at all times use due care to avoid colliding with another, and must be ever alert and watchful, so as not to place himself in danger.

The following instructions may be said to be more or less objectionable:

(1) Instruction 69: "LXIX. I instruct you that if you find from the evidence that defendant Rhoades was operating his automobile at a high rate of speed at the time defendant Olive Gaston saw his automobile approaching, and that she turned her automobile to the left after seeing his automobile approaching, this would not necessarily be negligence on her part. She cannot be held to be negligent on this account unless the speed of the approaching Rhoades car was apparent to and realized by her."

This instruction would have more correctly stated the law had it read: "She cannot be held negligent on this account [turning after seeing appellant approaching at a high rate of speed], unless the speed of the approaching car was or should have been apparent to and realized by her." A person is chargeable, not only with what they know, but with what a reasonably prudent person ought to know.

(2) Instruction 26: This instruction contains the language: "The state Motor Vehicle Act also provides that the operator of a vehicle shall yield the right of way at the intersection of their paths to a vehicle approaching from the right, unless such vehicle approaching from the right is further from the point of intersection of their paths than such first named vehicle."

At one time this was the law. St. 1919, p. 215, § 20(f). But under the provisions of section 131 of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1923 (St. 1923, p. 560), in force at the time of the accident in question, it appears that this rule is applicable only at street intersections. This erroneous rule was injected into the instruction as a basis for an admonition to the jury that "it does not follow that one who changes his course to the left to cross the highway is entitled to the whole protection of this rule, for common sense tells us that he is bound to exercise great care to avoid colliding with machines that are on the highway and across whose path he must travel. That was what the Legislature had in mind when it provided that a vehicle, before starting to turn, 'shall see first that there is sufficient space for such movement to be made in safety,' so that the practical effect of this provision is to cast upon motorists intending to turn the duty of exercising greater care than is ordinarily required of them."

(3) Instruction 66: "The jury are instructed that the defendant Olive Gaston, at the time she made the turn on the highway, was not bound to assume that the defendant Rhoades would abandon any reasonable precautions or violate any obligation imposed upon him by the laws of the land. The defendant Olive Gaston in this case was authorized to assume that the defendant Rhoades, and all other persons using the road, would do so with ordinary care and would observe the rules of the road as established by law. In other words, the defendant Olive Gaston, when turning her car on the highway, was entitled to assume that the defendant Rhoades would comply with the requirements of the Motor Vehicle Act that he drive his car at such a speed as not to endanger the life, limb or property of any person."

The vice of this instruction is that, while Mrs. Gaston might be entitled to certain assumptions, those assumptions would avail her nothing, unless she herself were free from negligence.

(4) Instruction 68: The same criticism may be leveled at this instruction, which contains the words: "I instruct you that defendant Olive Gaston had a right to presume that drivers of other automobiles would not operate them at an unlawful rate of speed." According to the case of Carroll v. Central Counties Gas Co., 74 Cal. App. at page 309, 240, P. 53, 55, the correct rule is: "One who is himself not negligent is entitled to rely upon the presumption that others will exercise due care, so that it is not negligence to fail to anticipate danger which can come only from a violation of law or duty upon the part of another. * * * But reliance upon this presumption does not excuse one who is himself negligent."

(5) Instruction 61: "LXI. I charge you that the law presumes that a person saw that which, in the exercise of ordinary care, he could have seen. If you find from the evidence that defendant Olive Gaston did give a signal of her intention to turn her automobile to the left in the direction of the entrance to said Café de Paris, and if you find that an automobile driver operating an automobile in the place at which, from the evidence, you find that defendant Rhoades was operating his automobile at the time said signal was given on the day of said accident, would have seen said signal, then the failure of said defendant Rhoades to see said signal would be negligence on the part of said defendant Rhoades."

In view of the fact that Mrs. Gaston herself testified that she did not give the 50-foot turning signal required by law, appellant would hardly be chargeable for failing to observe a last-minute signal. Furthermore, the instruction omits the qualification of the automobile driver being a reasonably prudent person.

(6) Instruction 63: "LXIII. If you find from the evidence that a person operating an automobile at the place at which defendant Rhoades was operating his automobile at the time defendant Olive Gaston signaled her intention to make the turn into Café de Paris, if you find she did give such signal, could have seen such signal, and in the exercise of ordinary care could have stopped or turned his automobile, and thereby have avoided said collision, then the failure of said defendant Rhoades so to do was negligence on his part."

This instruction likewise omits the qualification of the person driving the automobile being a reasonably prudent person, and omits reference to the duty of Mrs. Gaston to give the 50-foot turning signal.

(7) Instruction 51: "LI. If you find from the evidence that the defendant Olive Gaston, at the time she started to turn her automobile to the left, misjudged the distance between her automobile and that of defendant Rhoades, or if she misjudged the speed of the automobile of defendant Rhoades, this would not necessarily be evidence of negligence on the part of defendant Olive Gaston. She was only bound to use ordinary care to avoid collision between her automobile and other vehicles. If you find that an ordinarily prudent person, in the exercise of ordinary care, would have misjudged such distance, or speed, or both, under the same circumstances, then I instruct you that such misjudgment was not negligence, and your verdict will be in favor of defendant Olive Gaston."

This instruction practically directs a verdict in favor of defendant Gaston, if her act of misjudging speed and distance were the act of an ordinarily prudent person. This instruction eliminates all other negligence on the part of Mrs. Gaston, of which she might have been guilty, including negligence per se in turning without complying with the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act.

(S) Instruction 14: "XIV. If you find that the separate, but concurrent, negligence, if any, of the drivers of both automobiles proximately contributed to the injuries to Mary F. Crabbe, if any, then and in that event I instruct you that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover from either the defendant Olive Gaston or the defendant Ira O. Rhoades, or from both the defendants Olive Gaston and Ira O. Rhoades."

This instruction is erroneous, for, were the jury to find that the negligence of the drivers of both automobiles proximately contributed to Mrs. Crabbe's injuries, they should in that event find against both drivers.

Other instructions, given on the subject of damages, were complained of, but we feel that, owing to the character of the injuries sustained by Mrs. Crabbe and the fact that approximately $5,000 was expended by Mr. Crabbe for medical and hospital services alone, and since no question is raised as to excessive damages, such technical objections as may be raised thereto are without merit.

The foregoing instructions we believe to constitute all of those concerning which appellant has any cause for complaint. However, before concluding what effect, if any, these instructions had upon the jury, it is only fair to call attention to other instructions which were given.

On the subject of proximate cause the jury was fully instructed in general language, and, so far as appellant Rhoades is concerned, it was advised in instruction 29 that: "If the operation of Mr. Rhoades' automobile might reasonably have been affected by the turn of Mrs. Gaston's automobile, then it was Mrs. Gaston's duty to give a signal plainly visible to Mr. Rhoades of her intention to make such turn. Such signal could have been given by the use of her hand and arm, or by means of a mechanical or electrical device; therefore, if you find that Mrs. Gaston turned her automobile across the road, and if you also find that the turn reasonably affected the movement of Mr. Rhoades' automobile, then it was Mrs. Gaston's duty to give a signal of her intention to make the turn; and if you find that she failed to give a signal, and if you also find that this was the entire proximate cause of the accident, then Mr. Rhoades is exonerated from liability in this case, and your verdict must be in his favor."

The jury was also instructed as to the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act in reference to the giving of signals before turning on the highway, the section first above quoted herein having been read in full to the jury. It was also instructed:

"XXXI. Even if Mrs. Gaston gave a signal of her intention to turn, that did not exonerate her from the duty of looking to see whether she could make such turn in safety. Therefore, even if you find that she gave a signal of her intention to make the turn but if you also find that she did not first observe whether the turn could be made in safety, and if you further find that her failure to see if the turn could be made in safety was the sole proximate cause of the accident, then this completely exonerates Mr. Rhoades, regardless of the fact whether Mrs. Gaston did, or did not, give any signal."

"XXXIII. If you find that Mr. Rhoades, driving the Paige automobile, exercised ordinary care and caution in driving it, that is to say, if he exercised such care and caution as a reasonably prudent person would have exercised under the same or similar circumstances, then he is not legally chargeable with responsibility for the accident, and in such case your verdict must be in favor of Mr. Rhoades and you must not award any damages against him."

"XXXVIII. If in this case you find that the evidence is so equally balanced that the scales of proof hang even on the question whether Mr. Rhoades was or was not negligent, then your verdict must be in his favor, and you cannot award any damages against him, regardless of what your verdict may be as to Mrs. Gaston."

"XLV. If you find that Mrs. Gaston was driving in a southerly direction along the highway, and if you also find that she intended to turn to cross the road, and did so, and if you also find that automobiles were approaching from the south, but that Mrs. Gaston failed to use ordinary care in making the turn, and that by reason of her lack of care in making the turn she drove directly in the path of Mr. Rhoades' automobile, and if you also find this was the entire cause of the accident, then this completely exonerates Mr. Rhoades, and you must not award any damages against him."

These constitute only a few of many instructions eminently fair to appellant and fully charging the jury as to the responsibilities of Mrs. Gaston. From the foregoing statement concerning instructions, and in the analysis thereof, it is apparent that error has been committed. Whether such error is sufficient to warrant a reversal of the case is the sole question for this court to decide.

As to the law, the appellant cites the case of Scarborough v. Urgo, 191 Cal. 341, 216 P. 584, 588, as illustrative of a case where the unduly favoring of one defendant in the giving of instructions prejudiced the rights of the other. The court there said: "Moreover, the rules of the road were stated in the instructions more favorably to the defendant Urgo than is warranted by the law. To be sure, the defendant transit company is not entitled in law to complain of the fact that its codefendant unjustly escaped liability, * * * but it is, we think, entitled to complain of an incorrect instruction as to the rules of the road applicable to its codefendant," etc.

In that case the judgment of the lower court was reversed, not on account of the giving of an incorrect instruction, however, but because the court refused to give one to which appellant was clearly entitled. This, it was held, resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

[7] It has also been held that a defendant may not complain because instructions given are too favorable to his codefendant (19 Cal. Jur. 765), and that, even if instructions be held erroneous as unduly favoring one defendant against his codefendant, this would not justify the granting of a new trial upon the part of such codefendant who himself was guilty of negligence proximately causing or contributing to the injury. (Goehring v. Rogers, 67 Cal. App. 255, at page 259, 227 P. 687; comment of Supreme Court in denying the petition to have cause heard in said court.)

With these rules in mind, it is clear that the liability of appellant Rhoades depended entirely upon the answer to the questions whether he himself was or was not negligent, and whether or not such negligence, if it existed, proximately caused or contributed to the injuries complained of. These questions are wholly independent of the question as to whether or not his codefendant Gaston was also liable.

Had this been an action brought by Mrs. Gaston against Rhoades, undoubtedly the giving of the instructions criticized herein would have constituted reversible error, but, being an action by an innocent third party against both, the situation is entirely different. "No judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted, in any case, on the ground of misdirection of the jury, or of the improper admission or rejection of evidence, or for any error as to any matter of pleading, or for any error as to any matter of procedure, unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." Article 6, § 4½, Const. Cal. Can it be said, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, that the giving of the instructions in question resulted in a miscarriage of justice?

[8] The record shows that the trial of the cause began on May 16, 1927; the instructions were read to the jury 10 days later. During that period of time testimony filling over 600 pages of the printed transcript was taken. At the conclusion of the hearing the court gave to the jury some 83 instructions, which fill 36 pages of the transcript. Conservatively estimated, it took the court fully an hour to read the instructions to the jury. Without commenting on the capacity of a jury to comprehend and apply to the facts all of the fine distinctions of the law presented to it in such circumstances, we feel that, unless it is made clearly to appear that there has been a miscarriage of justice and that the cause thereof was the errors complained of, a new trial should not be had. Taking a broad view of the situation, we cannot say that there has been any miscarriage of justice. Through no negligence on the part of Mrs. Crabbe she suffered frightful and permanent injuries, which can hardly be compensated for in dollars and cents. The evidence is sufficient to warrant a court and jury in holding the appellant guilty of negligence proximately causing or contributing to these injuries. He cannot be heard to complain of the fact that his codefendant unjustly escaped liability. Scarborough v. Urgo, supra; 19 Cal. Jur. 765; Goehring v. Rogers, supra.

Had the verdict gone against both Mrs. Gaston and Mr. Rhoades, the latter would be in no better position than he is to-day, with the judgment standing against him alone, for respondents could hold him responsible for the entire judgment.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

CHARLES M. WOODS CO. v. ARMSTRONG et al. (Civ. 6260.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California. Nov. 4,

Partnership ⚡55—Agreement to form corporation as soon as practicable held insufficient to overturn finding that partnership existed, where goods were delivered after incorporation.

In action for balance due on account for goods sold and delivered, provision in agreement that, as soon as practicable, corporation shall be formed, and stock issued to parties hereto in proportion to their respective interests, where goods were delivered on November 28th and corporation was formed under agreement on November 17th previous, held insufficient to overturn finding that partnership did in fact exist at time goods were delivered, since copartnership for one reason or another might have continued to exist for a considerable period of time subsequent to incorporation and strictly for purpose of fulfilling objects of association.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by the Charles M. Woods Company against H. B. Armstrong and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant W. D. Edwards appeals. Affirmed.

Emmons & Aldrich, of Bakersfield, and Chas. R. McCarty, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hyams & Himrod, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J. The plaintiff filed a complaint to recover the balance of an account for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered, alleging the existence of a copartnership between the defendants. An agreement was introduced in evidence dated October 27, 1923, which it is conceded establishes the fact that the defendants did enter into a partnership undertaking on that date. On this basis, and after proof that the goods were ordered a week or two before November 28 by one of the partners, H. P. Zumwalt, the date in November being that of delivery, the trial court rendered a judgment against all of the defendants over whom the court had acquired jurisdiction. The defendant W. D. Edwards alone appeals from the judgment.

The agreement to which we have referred contains the following closing paragraph: "As soon as practicable a corporation shall be formed, and stock shall be issued to the parties hereto in proportion to the respective interests of the parties hereto, as hereinbefore set out." The corporation thus agreed to be brought into being was incorporated on November 17, 1924. Appellant contends that without any proof of the transfer to the corporation of the partnership assets or without proof of dissolution we must assume that the copartnership ceased to exist on the date of the incorporation, or eleven days before the delivery of the merchandise. We cannot give our assent to this proposition. The copartnership for one reason or another might have continued to exist for a considerable period of time subsequent to the incorporation and strictly for the purpose of fulfilling the objects of the association. Let us assume, for example, that the corporation commissioner had not been satisfied to approve the issuance of the stock in the amount and proportion contemplated by the parties and the defendants had continued to pursue the business of the association in full accord with the agreement, is it not clear that the partnership relation would have continued? We do not find in the quoted paragraph sufficient to overturn the finding of the court that a partnership did in fact exist.

Appellant also suggests that it was competent for the defendant Zumwalt to contract on his own account and responsibility. The answer to this is that the court upon evidence justifying its conclusion found that the sale was made to the defendants.

Judgment affirmed.

BLEY v. STATE BOARD OF DENTAL EXAMINERS et al. (Civ. 3884.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 4, 1929.

1. Appeal and error ⚡790(2)—Questions presented on attempted appeal from original minute order inadvertently made and granting prohibition, where case was not heard on merits and new order made, held moot.

Where transcript of proceedings on petition for writ of prohibition, prepared pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, showed that case was never heard on merits, nor did record on appeal contain any formal order for issuing writ nor any such writ or findings of fact, clearly showing that minute order overruling demurrer to petition and granting prohibition was inadvertently made, and subsequently trial court modified original minute order to provide for temporary writ only, issues presented by attempted appeal from original order became moot, and remedy under circumstances was for parties to proceed to try action on its merits.

2. Appeal and error ⚡843(1)—Appellate court, where questions raised by appeal have been settled and are therefore moot, will not consider them.

Where questions raised by an appeal have been settled and are therefore moot, appellate court will not consider them.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 76(1)—Minute order, reciting that court made order that prohibition issue as prayed for and overruled demurrer to petition on file herein, held not final decree authorizing appeal.

Minute order in action for prohibition providing that, cause having been tried and submitted for consideration and decision, court made order that writ of prohibition issue as prayed for and overruled demurrer to petition on file herein, held not such final decree from which an appeal could be taken, since it was a mere minute order or court memorandum reciting that court had that day ordered that writ of prohibition issue as prayed for.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 338(1)—Notice of appeal from order if entered on November 22 filed on January 26 following held filed too late (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 939, 940).

If order attempted to be appealed from was duly made and entered on November 22 as recited in notice of appeal, notice of appeal filed on January 26 following held filed too late, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 939, 940, requiring notice of appeal to be filed with clerk within 60 days from entry of judgment or order.

5. Appeal and error $\S$ 348(1)—Limitation of time for filing notice of appeal is not dependent upon notice of entry of judgment or order (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 939, 940).

Limitation of time for filing notice of appeal as provided in Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 939, 940, is not dependent upon notice of entry of judgment or order.

6. Appeal and error $\S$ 356—Statute limiting time in which an appeal may be taken is jurisdictional and mandatory (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 939, 940).

Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 939, 940, requiring notice of appeal to be filed with clerk within 60 days from entry of judgment or order appealed from, held jurisdictional and mandatory, and, if appeal is not taken within time specified, appellate court has no power to entertain it.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Petition by Frederic A. Bley for writ of prohibition to restrain the State Board of Dental Examiners and others from proceeding to investigate certain charges of alleged misconduct on the part of petitioner in the practice of dentistry. From a minute order overruling the demurrer to the petition and granting a writ of prohibition, defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Frank B. Graves, of Oakland, and Jesse W. Carter, of Redding, for appellants.

Levinsky & Jones, of Stockton, for respondent.

R. L. THOMPSON, J. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal. The respondent filed in the superior court of San Joaquin county a petition for a writ of prohibition asking that the appellant board of dental examiners of the state of California be restrained from proceeding to investigate certain charges of alleged misconduct on the part of respondent in the practice of dentistry. Upon the filing of this petition, a temporary restraining order was signed and issued, together with an order to show cause why it should not be made permanent. To this petition a demurrer and answer were filed. Upon hearing the demurrer and order to show cause on the return day which had been fixed, the court, on November 22, 1928, made the following minute order: "The above entitled cause having been heretofore tried by the Court and submitted to the Court for consideration and decision, the Court this day made an order that a writ of prohibition issue as prayed for, and overruled the demurrer to the petition on file herein."

From this order the appellant served and filed a notice of appeal "from the judgment * * * made and entered in said action on the 22nd day of November, 1928. * * *" This notice of appeal was not filed until January 26, 1929. On January 29th the appellant served notice on the clerk to prepare a transcript of proceedings pursuant to section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, which was done. From this transcript it appears the case was never heard on its merits. Nor does the record contain any formal order for the issuing of a writ of prohibition, nor any such writ or findings of facts. The foregoing minute order was therefore clearly inadvertently made. From the affidavit and certificate of the county clerk which were filed in support of the motion to dismiss this appeal, it appears that the trial court subsequently, on February 15, 1929, modified its former minute order in the following language: "The minute order made herein on November 22, 1928, was inadvertently made, and does not express the intention of the court, and is for that reason amended to read as follows: * * * The court this day made an order that a temporary writ of prohibition pending the trial of said action should issue herein. * * *". This amendment of the court minutes is not refuted by the appellants.

[1, 2] From the foregoing amendment to the former minute order it appears that the issues presented by the attempted appeal have become moot. When questions which have been raised by an appeal have been settled and are therefore moot, an appellate court will not consider them. 2 Cal. Jur. 804, $\S$ 472. The remedy in the present case is for the parties to proceed to try the action on its merits.

[3] Moreover, the original minute order from which the appeal was taken does not purport to be such a final decree as the statute contemplates from which an appeal is authorized. It is a mere minute order or court memorandum reciting that the court had that day ordered that "a writ of prohibition issue as prayed for." The clear inference is that the court had authorized this by means of another written document, which does not appear in the clerk's certified record of the proceedings.

[4-6] The appellants assume that this order was duly made and entered on November 22, 1928, for its notice of appeal is specific in that regard. Assuming that the order was duly made and entered on November 22, 1928, as the appellants declare it was, the notice of appeal was filed too late and was therefore ineffectual. Sections 939 and 940 of the Code of Civil Procedure require the notice of appeal to be filed with the clerk "within sixty days from the entry of said judgment or order." The limitation of time for filing the notice of appeal is not dependent upon notice of the entry of the judgment or order. The notice of appeal was not filed with the clerk until January 26, 1929, which was 65 days after the date alleged by the appellants to have been the actual time of the entry of the order. The statute limiting the time in which an appeal may be taken is jurisdictional and mandatory. If the appeal is not taken within the time allowed by law, the appellate court has no power to entertain it. Lancel v. Postlethwaite, 172 Cal. 326, 156 P. 486; Smith v. Questa, 58 Cal. App. 1, 4, 207 P. 1036; Bates v. Ransome-Crummey Co., 42 Cal. App. 699, 184 P. 39; Donaldson Inv. Co. v. Shay, 86 Cal. App. 763, 261 P. 499.

The respondent's motion is granted, and the appeal is hereby dismissed.

PATENTS PROCESS, Inc., v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 6675.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 29, 1929.

1. Divorce $\S$ 267—Statute authorizing appointment of receiver to enforce requirement that husband provide maintenance did not authorize court to appoint receiver for corporation to which husband had conveyed community property (Civ. Code, $\S$ 140).

Civ. Code, $\S$ 140, authorizing appointment of receiver to enforce requirement that wife or husband, as case may be, provide maintenance or specified payments, does not authorize court, on petition of wife, to appoint receiver for corporation to which husband had conveyed property in which wife had community interest.

2. Divorce $\S$ 267—Court could consider affidavits in passing on its power to appoint receiver for corporation to which husband had conveyed community property.

Court, on wife's petition for appointment of receiver for corporation to which husband had conveyed community property, could consider affidavits before court in passing on its power to appoint receiver.

3. Corporations $\S$ 552—Court had power to appoint receiver for corporation created for purpose of depriving plaintiff of her rights (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 564).

Where husband created corporation to which he conveyed property in which wife had community interest for purpose of depriving wife of her rights, there being no adequate remedy at law, court had power to authorize appointment of receiver for such corporation, notwithstanding provisions of Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 564, relative to right of court of equity to appoint receiver for property of corporation.

Original application for writ of prohibition by the Patents Process, Inc., prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles and others. Application denied.

Superseding opinion in 279 P. 174.

Milton M. Cohen and R. D. Knickerbocker, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

William R. Millar, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. The case now comes before the court upon hearing granted after the court had entered an order denying the application for the writ. On both hearings, the cause was heard upon notice, and upon demurrer to the petition, and upon the petition and the answer of respondents. The opinion which accompanied said former order reads as follows:

There is pending in the superior court an action, No. 273—391, of Mildred Williams, Plaintiff, v. Frank D. Williams, Patents Process, Inc., a Corporation, and Others Defendants. In that action the plaintiff sets forth facts showing her right to an interest in described property owned by the plaintiff and by the defendant Williams, as community property, particularly as shown by the terms of an interlocutory decree of divorce granted to Mrs. Williams against her said husband. The complaint in action 273—391, after a statement of facts concerning said interlocutory decree of divorce, proceeds to state another series of facts which tend to show that defendant Frank D. Williams has been and is endeavoring to prevent the plaintiff from receiving her share of the community property awarded to her in the divorce action; that sundry other persons have been induced to confederate and conspire with Williams to accomplish his stated purpose; that, in order to more effectually carry out said plan and purpose, the defendant Patents Process, Inc., was created and organized; that sundry properties held by defendant Williams, and belonging wholly or in part to the plaintiff, were by said Williams caused to be transferred and placed in the name of said corporation; that practically all of the shares of capital stock of said corporation belong to defendant Williams, and those shares which have been issued to names of other persons are in reality his property; that defendant Williams is general manager, and is in actual control of said corporation and of said properties conveyed by him pursuant to said alleged purpose, plan, and conspiracy. The foregoing indicates the foundation and the nature of the action, but we do not attempt to make a complete statement of the complaint, or of the proceedings therein. Upon the filing of said complaint and, upon application made to a judge of respondent court, an order was made whereby a receiver was appointed of the property of the defendant corporation, Patents Process, Inc. The defendant duly presented a motion to vacate the order appointing the receiver, which motion was denied by an order of May 13, 1929. On the same day the court ordered that defendant Williams deliver to the receiver said described property of Patents Process, Inc., together with all other property of said corporation. The notice of motion to vacate did not state the grounds on which the motion would be made, but the affidavits filed therewith indicate a complaint against the qualifications of the appointee, rather than any challenge of the power of the court to appoint a receiver. In this present proceeding, application is made for a writ of prohibition to restrain the respondent court and the judges thereof from taking further proceedings in connection with the appointment or continuance in office of a receiver for the business of petitioner, and that the appointed receiver be restrained from acting as such receiver, notwithstanding said order of appointment.

In applying for the writ, petitioner relies upon a series of decisions which deny that there is any jurisdiction vested in a court of equity to appoint a receiver of the property of a corporation in a suit prosecuted by a private party, or in any case not directly authorized by the provisions of section 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Among these decisions are the French Bank Case, 53 Cal. 495, 550; Neall v. Hill, 16 Cal. 145, 76 Am. Dec. 508; A. G. Col. Co. v. Superior Court, 196 Cal. 604, 614, 238 P. 926; Dabney Oil Co. v. Providence Oil Co., 22 Cal. App. 233, 237, 133 P. 1155.

We are satisfied that the case stated in the complaint in the action in respondent court brings that action within a well-recognized exception to the general rule referred to in the preceding paragraph, and that respondent court had jurisdiction to appoint the receiver. Section 140 of the Civil Code (in the chapter relating to actions of divorce) reads as follows: "The court may require the husband [or wife, as the case may be,] to give reasonable security for providing maintenance or making any payments required under the provisions of this chapter, and may enforce the same by the appointment of a receiver, or by any other remedy applicable to the case." The allegations of the complaint, duly verified, are sufficient to show that the corporation Patents Process, Inc., is but the alter ego of defendant Frank D. Williams, and that the plaintiff, Mrs. Williams, although not a stockholder of the corporation, is an owner of at least a half interest in the property held by said corporation. It follows that the directors of the corporation owe to her, as such owner, a duty similar to that which is owed to the stockholders. Upon those alleged facts the directors are charged with the duty of administering a trust in which, so far as plaintiff's interest in the property is concerned, she is the primary beneficiary. That this trust is involuntary and unacknowledged only adds to the seriousness of the situation. Upon facts which as to the principles involved are the same, it was held that, where such a trust existed, and was being violated, the court had authority to appoint a receiver. As the court there said: "We cannot conceive a state of the law, under the enlightened principles which govern the exercise of the jurisdiction of courts of equity, which would deny the appointment of a receiver, under the allegations of the Charles complaint, merely, upon the ground that the plaintiffs were not stockholders of the corporation." Lieberman v. Superior Court, 72 Cal. App. 18, at page 37, 236 P. 570, 577.

[1] In the petition for rehearing it was pointed out that in Mayberry v. Whittier, 144 Cal. 322, 78 P. 16, it was decided that the provisions of section 140 of the Civil Code, relating to the giving of security for providing maintenance or making any payments required under provisions of the chapter in which the section is contained, cannot be extended "so as to embrace the matter of the division of common property." That decision is clear and positive on the point involved. It follows that said section 140 may not be relied upon as furnishing authority for the appointment of a receiver in the court below as shown in the present proceeding. Counsel for respondents suggests that the decision in Mayberry v. Whittier, supra, has been practically overruled by the decision in Meyer v. Meyer, 184 Cal. 687, 195 P. 387, but we are satisfied that in the latter case it was not intended to overrule said earlier decision.

It is conceded by petitioner that there are no decisions by our Supreme Court directly bearing upon the question as to whether or not a receiver can be appointed to take over the business of a corporation where there is an allegation to the effect that the corporation is the alter ego of an individual. It is claimed, however, that in the case of Fischer v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 129, 42 P. 561, the point was in principle determined against the power to appoint such receiver. In that case it was held that a mere averment that the corporation was only a medium of the partnership and not an independent corporation was not sufficient to remove the case from the general rule against the appointment of receivers of actually existing and operating corporations. It was admitted that the corporation was duly organized, and for some years had been actually operating the business of the properties conveyed to it, which properties were the real subject of controversy.

[2] In the case at bar there are additional elements tending to support the contention in favor of the power to appoint a receiver. In addition to the complaint, the court had before it several affidavits, which contain direct evidence of some of the principal facts which the plaintiff in her complaint had been obliged to allege only on information and belief, since they were not personally known to her. This removes from further consideration a large part of petitioner's argument based upon the fact that many of the allegations of the complaint were made upon information and belief. The facts thus shown in these affidavits, and which the court was entitled to consider in passing upon the question of its power to appoint the receiver, are facts tending to prove, not only that the corporation, Patents Process, Inc., is the alter ego of Williams and entirely owned by him, but, further, that said corporation was organized by said Williams and certain of his codefendants acting in concert with him for the purpose of secreting assets which were the community property of said Frank D. Williams and said Mildred E. Williams, and for the purpose of depriving said Mildred E. Williams of any interest in said property.

[3] In Elliott v. Superior Court, 168 Cal. 727, 734, 145 P. 101, 105, the Supreme Court, after again affirming its adherence to the general rule against the power to appoint a receiver of the entire assets of a corporation in a suit prosecuted by a private party, said: "This opinion is not to be construed as an authority opposed to the appointment of a receiver of specific property of a corporation, where such appointment would be proper under section 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure in certain actions between private parties. Our views must be taken as applying to an action of the kind now before the court and not as applicable to all kinds of cases against corporations." The general rule to which we have referred is based in part upon those provisions of law which declare that the powers of a corporation must be exercised, managed and controlled by its board of directors, and that to take away that control from the board of directors at the suit of a private person, whether creditor or stockholder, is in effect to bring about a dissolution of the corporation in a manner not authorized by law. But, if a case is presented wherein it appears that the corporation, in the very creation thereof, is nothing but a fraudulent mask fabricated for the purpose of depriving the plaintiff of his rights, and there is no remedy at law adequate to meet the situation, we believe that the powers of equity are broad enough to authorize the appointment of a receiver, not for the purpose of dissolving a genuine corporation, but for the purpose of reaching the man hidden behind the mask and compelling him to do equity. Of course, we cannot now know what the ultimate finding of facts will be when the case has been tried on its merits. In deciding upon the appointment of a receiver, the superior court is dealing with the prima facie case made by the pleadings and affidavits upon which it acts in making its order. Marblehead Land Co. v. Superior Court, 62 Cal. App. 408, 410, 217 P. 536. The case so made was, in our opinion, sufficient to sustain the jurisdiction of the court, which it exercised in appointing the receiver in this case.

The application for writ of prohibition is denied.

BUTCHART v. MOORHEAD et al. ★
(Civ. No. 3892.)

Rehearing Denied Dec. 2, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 30, 1929.

1. Appeal and error ☞339(3)—Appeal from judgment on notice served 61 days after order dismissing action as to certain defendants was ineffectual as to them (Code Civ. Proc. § 939).

Where two of defendants in mortgage foreclosure suit were eliminated in filing of amended complaint and their answer thereto was stricken and the action dismissed as to them, and they failed to appeal from order of dismissal and were not necessary parties, appeal taken from the judgment under notice of appeal not served or filed until 61 days after the order dismissing such defendants was ineffectual as to them, since notice of appeal came too late under Code Civ. Proc. § 939, and appeal did not purport to have been taken from the preliminary order.

2. Mortgages ☞571—Defendants in foreclosure suit who had disposed of interest, who were eliminated in amended complaint, and whose answer alleging usury was stricken, could not on appeal from judgment complain of dismissal.

Defendants who had disposed of their interest in mortgaged property, and who were eliminated as parties in filing of amended complaint in mortgage foreclosure suit, were not necessary parties and could not on appeal from the judgment complain of striking of their answer alleging affirmative defense of usury and of dismissal of action as to them, since special defense could be made subject of action, and elimination of such defendants in the amended complaint operated as dismissal as to them.

3. Dismissal and nonsuit ☞27—Filing amended complaint omitting defendants named originally operated as dismissal as to them.

Filing of amended complaint in mortgage foreclosure suit omitting defendants who were named in original complaint operated as dismissal of action as to such abandoned parties, who were without legal standing as litigants or appellants, where there was no order of court authorizing them to answer or intervene.

4. Mortgages §490—Taxes and costs and counsel fees are allowable under general prayer for relief in foreclosure where mortgage attached to complaint so provides.

Taxes, street assessments, charges for searching title, and costs and counsel fees may be allowed under general prayer for relief in foreclosure proceeding, where mortgage provides for reimbursement of such items and is attached to complaint as an exhibit.

5. Mortgages §490—In foreclosure suit complaint seeking general relief permitted recovery of taxes, assessments, penalties and costs of redemption, counsel fees, and charges for searching title.

Where mortgage was incorporated as part of complaint in foreclosure suit and recited that it was given to secure principal and interest and advancements made by holder of note for paying taxes and assessments, and services performed in searching title and fees for services of attorney and expenses and costs of suit in case of default and foreclosure, and complaint recited default of mortgagor in payment of delinquent taxes and street assessments and incurring of costs and counsel fees and prayed for judgment for relief, delinquent taxes, street assessments, penalties and costs of redemption, counsel fees, and charges for searching title incident to foreclosure were properly allowed without supplemental pleadings.

Appeal from Superior Court; Los Angeles County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by J. H. Butchart against Paul G. Moorhead, the Title Insurance & Trust Company, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

R. B. Turnbull and R. L. Horton, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Bernard Petter, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ROLFE L. THOMPSON, J. [1] This is an appeal on the part of certain defendants from a decree foreclosing a mortgage. In filing an amended complaint the names of Paul G. Moorhead and wife were eliminated and they were abandoned as defendants. They, however, voluntarily appeared and answered without securing permission of the court. On motion duly made their answer was stricken from the record and the action dismissed as to them. From this order they failed to appeal. No deficiency judgment was sought or secured. They were not necessary parties, having disposed of their interest in the property. The appeal was therefore ineffectual as to these defendants.

The plaintiff as assignee of a note and mortgage instituted this action of foreclosure against Paul G. Moorhead and wife, who were the makers of the note and mortgage. Many others were also made party defendants. The original makers of the instruments had parted with their interest in the mortgaged property. Separate demurrers in behalf of the respective defendants were filed, presented, and sustained. In due time an amended complaint was filed, in which neither Paul G. Moorhead nor his wife was included as a defendant. Their names were purposely omitted therefrom. The amended complaint was not served upon them. No decree against them was sought and no deficiency judgment was asked for or recovered. Nevertheless, the Moorheads voluntarily appeared and without leave to answer or intervene filed a separate demurrer and answer to the amended complaint attempting to set up a special defense charging the mortgagee, Builders' Mortgage Company of Los Angeles, with exacting usurious interest and failure to pay to the mortgagors $9,500 of the principal sum for which the note and mortgage were executed. These defenses were made by none of the other appellants. To this answer the plaintiff demurred and at the same time gave notice of motion to strike it from the records and dismiss the action as to these defendants. On March 15, 1927, this motion was granted. The court then ordered that the "motion to dismiss action as to defendants Moorhead is granted." From this order no appeal was taken. The cause was tried upon the issues presented by the answers of the other defendants, and a decree of foreclosure was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the principal sum represented by the original loan, no part of which had been paid, together with deferred interest, cost, taxes paid, a street assessment, and counsel fees. The findings disregarded the issues tendered by the Moorhead answer which had been stricken from the record. No judgment was rendered against them and no deficiency judgment was awarded. The decree of foreclosure was entered April 19, 1927. The notice of appeal was from "the judgment therein entered in the said Superior Court on the ——— day of ———, 1927, and from the whole thereof." This notice of appeal was served and filed May 16, 1927. This appeal does not purport to have been taken from the order and judgment striking the Moorhead answer from the records and dismissing the action as to them. Indeed, the notice of appeal was too late to become effectual for that purpose. Section 939, Code Civ. Proc. That order was made in the presence of the attorney for these defendants March 15, 1927, and the only notice of appeal which was given in this case was not served or filed until 61 days thereafter. The attempted appeal of the Moorheads was therefore ineffectual for any purpose whatever.

[2] Moreover, Mr. and Mrs. Moorhead were not parties to this action and had no standing as interested litigants either at the trial or upon appeal. The filing of the amended complaint in which the names of these defendants were omitted operated as a dismissal of the action as to them. The decree in this case deprived them of no rights or remedies which they may not assert in a proper action against the proper parties, if there be merit in the special defense which they attempted to plead. They made no application to the court in this case to file an answer or to intervene. It is immaterial that their pleading asked for affirmative relief.

[3] The filing of an amended complaint omitting defendants who were named in the original complaint operates as a dismissal of the action as to the abandoned parties, and in the absence of an order of court authorizing them to answer or intervene, they are without legal standing as litigants or appellants. Schlake v. MacConnell, 69 Cal. App. 207, 230 P. 974, 975; Brittan v. Oakland Bank of Savings, 112 Cal. 1, 44 P. 339; Spreckels v. Spreckels, 172 Cal. 775, 158 P. 537.

In the case of Schlake v. MacConnell, supra, it is said: "The filing of an amended complaint, omitting a defendant named in the original complaint, operates as a dismissal of the action as to such defendant. 18 C. J. 1166; MacLachlan v. Pease, 171 Ill. 527, 49 N. E. 714; San Antonio & A. P. Ry. Co. v. Mohl (Tex. Civ. App.) 37 S. W. 22. Upon the foregoing authorities it is apparent that at the time defendant attempted to file its purported answer and cross-complaint it was not a party to the action and had no right to file the same. It recognized this situation and requested leave to intervene, which was denied. It did not appeal from that order, which was its only remedy at the time, but decided to ignore the same, as well as the amended complaint, and filed an answer and cross-complaint to the original complaint, which had become functus officio. The only way this so-called cross-complaint could have any standing would be to treat the same as a complaint in intervention, and, as permission to file such a document had been refused to appellant, the same was properly stricken from the files when called to the attention of the court."

[4, 5] Taxes, street assessments, charges for searching title, costs, and counsel fees may be allowed under the general prayer for relief in a foreclosure proceeding where the mortgage provides for the reimbursement of such items and is attached to the complaint as an exhibit thereto. McKelvey v. Wagy, 157 Cal. 406, 108 P. 268. In the present case the mortgage was incorporated as a part of the complaint and recited that it was given to secure "the principal and interest * * * all advancement made by the holder of the note for paying liens prior to this mortgage, taxes and assessments including the tax on the money secured hereby, services performed in the care of the premises, premiums paid for insurance on the buildings, and in case of a default and foreclosure, searching of the title therefor, fees for the services of any attorney, expenses and costs of suit. * * *" Paragraph V of the complaint also recited the default of the mortgagor in the payment of delinquent taxes and street assessments and alleged the sale of the property therefor together with the incurring of costs and counsel fees, and that the same "now remains due, owing and unpaid." The complaint then prayed for judgment for the principal, interest, counsel fees, and costs, and "such other sums that have been or may be expended by plaintiff under the terms and provisions of said mortgage, * * * and that the plaintiff may have such other or further relief in the premises as * * * may seem meet and agreeable to equity." Under such pleadings delinquent taxes, street assessments, penalties and costs of redemption, counsel fee, and charges for searching title incident to foreclosure proceedings were properly allowed without supplemental pleadings. The allowance of such items is not without the issues under such pleadings. The findings are proper and adequate.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re PRINCIPAL'S GUARDIANSHIP.*MOOSLIN v. PRINCIPAL.

(Civ. 7028.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 5, 1929.

1. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 388(2)—As no answer was required and none filed denying allegations in petition for appointment as guardian, no findings were required; "issue of fact," "issue joined" (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 590, 632, 1717).

As no answer was required by statute and none was filed denying allegations set forth in petition to be appointed as guardian of minor, there was no "issue of fact" within meaning of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 590, 632, and no "issue joined" within meaning of section 1717, so that no findings were required.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First Series, Issue Joined; First, Second, and Third Series, Issue of Fact.]

2. Guardian and ward $\hookrightarrow$ 13(8)—Appellate court must assume trial court believed evidence that father failed to maintain child and based decree appointing another guardian thereon.

Where petitioner seeking to be appointed guardian of minor alleged that minor's father, having ability to do so, failed to maintain his minor child for more than two years previous thereto and allegation was supported by abundance of evidence, District Court of Appeals must assume, nothing to contrary appearing, that trial court believed it and based its decree granting petition thereon.

3. Guardian and ward $\hookrightarrow$ 10—That father failed to maintain child warranted holding that father forfeited rights to be guardian or have minor's custody (Civ. Code, § 246, subd. 4).

That father failed to maintain his minor child for more than two years before petition of another to be appointed guardian and father had ability to do so, that fact alone warranted trial court in holding that father had forfeited his rights to be appointed guardian or to be awarded custody of minor under Civ. Code, § 246, subd. 4, providing for forfeiture of rights to guardianship by abandoning support of child.

4. Guardian and ward $\hookrightarrow$ 13(3)—Incompetency of minor's father, not alleged in another's petition to be appointed guardian, was not in issue where application to modify divorce decree was not called for hearing.

Where petition to be appointed guardian of minor contained no allegation on subject as to whether minor's father as defendant was competent and application to modify decree of divorce was not called up for hearing, trial court did not err because it made no finding as to father's incompetency, since there was no issue of competency on which to base finding.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Proceedings, by Pearl Mooslin to be appointed guardian of Leon Principal, Jr., a minor, against Leon Principal. From an order granting the petition, the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. A. Garrett and Stoner & Gardner, all of Los Angeles, and A. V. Dalrymple, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Joseph A. Brown, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The petitioner applied to be appointed guardian of Leon Principal, Jr., a minor. Notice of the application was served on the father of the minor and a hearing was had before the trial court. The court made an order granting the petition, and from that order the father has appealed and has brought up a typewritten record.

[1-3] The parents were married October 28, 1922. They were divorced by a final decree of divorce September 14, 1928. The mother died September 27, 1928. On October 16, 1928, this petitioner filed a petition asking to be appointed guardian of the minor. Among other things she alleged probative facts to the effect that the child's father had forfeited his right to be appointed guardian. Civ. Code, § 246, subd. 4. On October 18, 1928, the father filed an application asking that the decree in the divorce action be modified and that the custody of the minor be awarded to him. Neither pleading was answered. By stipulation the petition for letters and the application to modify the divorce decree were set down for hearing in the same court at the same time. The application for a modification was not called up for hearing and the moving party did not attempt to introduce any evidence thereon. As no answer was required by the statute and none was filed denying the allegations set forth in the petition of Mrs. Mooslin, there was no "issue of fact" within the meaning of sections 590 and 632 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and no "issue joined" within the meaning of section 1717 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Waller v. Weston, 125 Cal. 201, 57 P. 892. Therefore findings were not required. No findings were asked and none, in name, was made. But in the order granting the petition for letters there were inserted some recitals, among others: " * * * That said minor has been abandoned by his father Leon Principal within the meaning of subdivision 4 of section 246 of the Civil Code of the state of California." The father contends that the trial court erred in finding that the said minor, Leon Principal, Jr., had been abandoned by his father. The point is not well taken for several reasons. As we have pointed out there were no findings. Nevertheless, if we call the passage above quoted a finding, it is apparent at once that it is a conclusion of law as distinguished from a finding of fact. Moreover, if we treat the language referred to as a finding of fact, and if we concede, as the applicant contends, that it is not supported by the evidence, the judgment of the trial court may not be disturbed. This is so because the petitioner had alleged that the appellant, having the ability so to do, failed to maintain his minor child for more than two years prior to October 16, 1928. That allegation was supported by an abundance of evidence. Nothing to the contrary appearing, we must assume that the trial court believed it and based its decree thereon. As subdivision 4 of section 246 is in the disjunctive, this fact alone warranted the trial court in holding that the father had forfeited his rights to be appointed guardian or to be awarded the custody of the minor.

[4] The appellant also contends that the trial court erred because it made no finding as to the incompetency of the father. The petition contained no allegation on the subject, and the application to modify the decree of divorce was not called up for a hearing; therefore there was no issue of competency on which to base a finding.

We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

HANSEN v. MUNICIPAL COURT OF CITY OF LOS ANGELES, COUNTY OF LOS ANGELES, et al. (L. A. 11685.) ★

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 22, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 19, 1929.

Criminal law ~~§~~1081—One is not precluded by giving oral notice of appeal from later and within time filing written notice thereof and perfecting appeal (Pen. Code, §§ 1239, 1467, 1468).

Although Pen. Code, § 1239, was not repealed by sections 1467, 1468, one is not precluded by giving oral notice of appeal from later and within time filing written notice thereof and perfecting his appeal.

In Bank.

Application by Helen Hansen for writ of mandate to be directed to municipal court of city of Los Angeles, Caryl M. Sheldon, Judge, and others, to compel certification of statement on appeal. Writ granted.

Rehearing denied; PRESTON, J., voting for a rehearing.

John A. Jorgenson, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Lloyd S. Nix, City Prosecutor, and Joe W. Matherly and F. W. Fellows, Deputy City Prosecutors, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LANGDON, J. This matter comes to us upon a petition for a writ of mandate directed to the judge and clerk of the municipal court of Los Angeles, to compel certification of statement upon appeal.

Petitioner was charged with vagrancy and convicted in said municipal court and sentenced to serve 90 days in the county jail on May 23, 1929. On the same day motion for new trial was made and denied and oral notice of appeal was given. Thereafter a substitution of attorneys occurred, and on June 7, 1929, petitioner filed written notice of appeal. On June 12, 1929, a written statement of grounds of appeal was served and filed. The court refused to certify said statement upon appeal upon the ground that it was filed too late; since the oral notice of appeal was given on May 23, 1929, it was held that the time for serving and filing said statement expired on May 28, 1929.

Petitioner seeks the writ of mandate upon the ground that the oral notice of appeal was ineffectual; that sections 1467 and 1468, Penal Code, have repealed section 1239, Penal Code, with reference to the procedure upon appeal. Although conceding that the argument is concluded against her upon this point, by the case of Lillywhite v. Sup. Ct., 80 Cal. App. 533, 251 P. 945, petitioner asks us to overrule that case.

We are satisfied with the reasoning and the rule announced in the case cited. However, that case is not conclusive of the rights of petitioner herein. While it has been held that an oral appeal is permissible under the provisions of section 1239, Penal Code, and that that method of appeal is coexistent with the written appeal to be filed within 15 days after entry of judgment, no case has been called to our attention which holds that, having given oral notice of appeal, one is precluded from later and within time filing a written notice of appeal and perfecting it in accordance with the statute. That is precisely what was done in this case: After the oral notice of appeal a written notice was filed in due time and the statement of grounds of appeal was filed within 5 days thereafter. The trial court should examine and settle the statement upon appeal therefor.

The writ should be granted as prayed and it is so ordered.

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 15, 1929.

1. Divorce ⇨ 181—Appeal in divorce proceedings held not within time, where notice thereof was not filed until 180 days after entry of decree (Code Civ. Proc. § 939).

Where notice of appeal was not filed until 180 days after entry of interlocutory decree of divorce nor within 60 days from order denying motion to set aside decree and order denying motion to dismiss action, appeal held not taken in time under Code Civ. Proc. § 939.

2. Divorce ⇨ 181—Appellant could not justify delay in giving notice of appeal from decree of divorce on ground that he had not received written notice of entry thereof (Code Civ. Proc. § 953d).

Appellant could not justify delay in giving notice of appeal from interlocutory decree of divorce, order denying motion to set aside decree, and order denying motion to dismiss, on ground that written notice of entry was not given him, as Code Civ. Proc. § 953d, does not apply to notice of appeal which must be filed within 60 days after entry of judgment or order appealed from, but applies only to notice required by provisions of section 650, relating to settlement of bills of exception, and section 653a, relating to preparation of transcript on appeal, and section 659, relating to motion for new trial.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Suit by Emma Cook against George Cook. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. On plaintiff's motion to dismiss appeal. Motion granted.

Geo. M. Cook, of Taft, for appellant.

Brittan & Brittan, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

WASTE, C. J. Respondent moves to dismiss the appeal taken by appellant from an interlocutory decree of divorce and from two orders subsequently made, which are not identified by date, but which we assume from the transcript to be an order denying a motion to set aside the interlocutory decree and an order denying a motion to dismiss the action. The motion to dismiss the appeal is made on the ground that the appellant failed to file his notice of appeal and his notice to prepare transcript, and to perfect his appeal within the time required by law.

[1] The notice of appeal was not filed until 180 days after the entry of the interlocutory decree, nor was it filed within 60 days after the entry of the orders sought to be appealed from. It follows, therefore, that the appeal was not taken in time. Code Civ. Proc. § 939.

[2] Appellant attempts to justify his delay by invoking the provisions of section 953d of the Code of Civil Procedure, and insists that, as written notice of the entry of the judgment was not given him, his appeal was taken within time. That section, however, does not help him, for it does not relate to notices of appeal which must be filed within 60 days after the entry of the judgment or order appealed from, but applies only to the notices required by the provisions of section 650 of the Code relating to settlement of bills of exception, section 659 relating to motions for a new trial, and section 953a relating to preparation of transcript on appeal.

The motion to dismiss is granted.

BARRIOS & CO., Inc., v. INDEMNITY INS. CO. OF NORTH AMERICA.
(Civ. 6637.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 6, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 6, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 2, 1930.

1. Banks and banking ☞136—On insolvency of depositor, bank may declare due unmatured indebtedness owing from depositor and exercise bankers' lien.

Where depositor in a bank becomes insolvent, bank may declare due unmatured indebtedness owing from depositor and exercise its bankers' lien.

2. Attachment ☞345—Surety in action on undertaking given to release attached property is estopped to deny debtor's ownership or liability of property to attachment.

Recitals of undertaking given to procure release of property from attachment are conclusive as between the parties thereto, and, in an action upon the undertaking, surety is estopped to deny that property levied on was subject to attachment or belonged to debtor.

3. Attachment ☞331—Attachment undertaking constitutes original, independent, and absolute contract of sureties.

Attachment undertaking constitutes original, independent, and absolute contract on part of sureties.

4. Attachment ☞331—Surety on undertaking for release of attachment providing for surety's redelivery of properly attached was bound to restore attached bank deposit, notwithstanding bank's application thereof under bankers' lien.

Where writ of attachment was issued and levied upon deposit in bank to credit of debtor, and attachment was released by undertaking providing that surety would redeliver property attached or pay full value of such property, surety, on creditor's recovery of judgment against debtor, was under duty to restore money on deposit with the bank, so that execution could issue thereon, and it was no defense that the bank had appropriated the amount of deposit under its bankers' lien to unpaid indebtedness of debtor who was insolvent, irrespective of whether bank exercised this right properly or wrongfully.

5. Attachment ☞349—Complaint on undertaking given to release attached property must, as against general demurrer, show execution has been returned unsatisfied (Code Civ. Proc. § 552).

Complaint in action on undertaking given to obtain release of attached property, which does not show that remedy by execution has been regularly pursued and that execution has been regularly returned unsatisfied in whole or in part, is bad on general demurrer, under Code Civ. Proc. § 552.

6. Attachment ☞349—Judgment creditor's complaint against surety on undertaking to release attachment, which alleged surety's refusal to pay on demand held not defective for failure to show return of execution unsatisfied where there was no demurrer and debtor was insolvent (Code Civ. Proc. § 552).

In judgment creditor's action against surety on undertaking given to obtain release of attached property of debtor, complaint alleging demand upon surety, and surety's refusal to pay held sufficient, where there was no demurrer, notwithstanding failure to allege that execution was issued and returned unsatisfied, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 552, especially where record affirmatively showed that judgment debtor was insolvent and issuance of execution would be futile.

7. Attachment ☞344—Creditor may sue surety on bond for release of attached property of insolvent debtor without issuing execution (Code Civ. Proc. § 552).

Issuance of execution against debtor, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 552, is not a condition precedent to an action against surety on the bond given for the redelivery of attached property, where debtor is insolvent.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Barrios & Co., Inc., against the Indemnity Insurance Company of North America. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Goldman & Altman, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Glensor, Clewe & Van Dine and Harold H. Price, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This action was brought to recover the sum of $1,514.71 upon an undertaking executed by defendant for the release of an attachment levied in a case wherein appellant was plaintiff and G. V. Pettigrew Company defendant.

The complaint alleged the commencement of the action by plaintiff herein against G. V. Pettigrew Company, the issuance of a writ of attachment therein, and levy of the same upon moneys on deposit to the credit of Pettigrew Company in the American Bank of San Francisco, which sum, it was further alleged, was in excess of the amount sued for. The issuance of an order for the release of the attachment upon the filing of the undertaking above referred to was then alleged, as was also the obtaining of a final judgment in favor of plaintiff and against the Pettigrew Company for the amount heretofore stated. Further allegations recited that the judgment remained wholly unpaid; that demand was made upon defendant herein for the return by it of the money attached, which demand was refused. Defendant, by answer, in substance, alleged that there was no money or property levied upon under or pursuant to the writ of attachment, and there was therefore no property to be redelivered by it. The trial court found that at the time the writ of attachment was levied by plaintiff there was on deposit in the name of the Pettigrew Company with the said bank a sum in excess of $3,000, and it further found that at that time the Pettigrew Company was indebted to the bank in the sum of $10,000. It also found that the company was insolvent, and the bank, by reason thereof, had no money in its possession or under its control belonging to such insolvent company. The finding that the bank had no funds in its possession belonging to the company was based upon evidence that it had applied the amount of the account under its bankers' lien to the unpaid indebtedness of such company, and accordingly made return to the sheriff that there was no balance due. Judgment went in favor of defendant surety company, and plaintiff appeals.

The contention is made, in support of the appeal, that the filing of the bond for releasing the attachment made it incumbent upon the defendant in this action, upon the final determination of the case of Barrios v. Pettigrew in favor of plaintiff, to place plaintiff in the same position as it was at the time of the levy of the attachment, namely, to have available in the bank to the order of the Pettigrew Company a sum sufficient to satisfy the judgment against it, and, upon failure so to do, plaintiff was entitled to a judgment against the surety company for the amount of its claim against the Pettigrew Company in the amount fixed by the final judgment. Defendant, on the other hand, contends that the bank had a lien upon the funds attached and had a right to exercise its lien, and, when it did in fact do so, there was no money on deposit with the bank subject to attachment in the action against the Pettigrew Company, and, this being so, there was nothing to redeliver.

[1-4] There can be no question that, where a depositor in a bank becomes insolvent, the bank may declare its unmatured indebtedness due and payable and exercise its bankers' lien. Pendleton v. Hellman Com. Bank, 58 Cal. App. 448, 208 P. 702. But whether it rightfully or wrongfully exercises this right is a question with which we are not here concerned. Whether the fund belongs to a third party or for any reason was not legally subject to the attachment, is a question to be litigated between the claimants, and it in no manner affects the surety's express covenant to restore. It was its duty under the terms of its bond to redeliver the attached property to the proper officer. By the filing of the bond, the writ of attachment was released, and with it the claim of plaintiff to the fund attached. The bond here sued upon provided that, upon the release of the attachment, defendant would redeliver the property attached, or, in default thereof, would pay the full value of the property released. The recitals of an undertaking given to procure the release of property from attachment are conclusive as between the parties thereto, and, in an action upon the undertaking, the surety is estopped to claim that the property levied upon was not subject to an attachment, or that it did not belong to the debtor. Pierce v. Whiting, 63 Cal. 538. Whether the property belongs to a third person, or for any legal reason was not subject to the attachment, are, as we have said, questions to be litigated between the adverse claimants, and they in no manner affect the covenants of the surety. McCormick v. National Surety Co., 134 Cal. 510, 66 P. 741; Hesser v. Rowley, 139 Cal. 410, 73 P. 156; Tormey v. McIntosh, 43 Cal. App. 411, 184 P. 1012. The attachment undertaking constitutes an original, independent, and absolute contract on the part of the sureties. Heine v. Wright, 76 Cal. App. 338, 244 P. 955; 3 Cal. Jur. p. 531. Upon the determination of the action in which the attachment issued in plaintiff's favor, it was the duty of the surety, on demand, to restore the money on deposit with the bank to the sheriff, so that execution could have issued thereon.

[5-7] From what has been said, it follows that the findings of the trial court are not supported by the evidence. Respondent urges the further claim in support of the judgment that the action was prematurely filed, for the reason that no execution was issued and returned unsatisfied before the commencement of the action, as required by section 552 of the Code of Civil Procedure. There can be no question that a complaint in an action on an undertaking, given to obtain the release of attached property, which does not show that the remedy by execution has been regularly pursued, and that the execution has been regularly returned unsatisfied in whole or in part before the action was commenced, is bad on general demurrer. But no demurrer was here interposed, nor was any such question raised in the court below. The complaint alleged the demand upon the surety and its refusal to pay. While the complaint does not allege that the demand was made through execution, the demand as alleged is sufficient in the absence of demurrer. Then again it affirmatively appears from the record that the Pettigrew Company was insolvent, and the issuance of an execution against it would be a futility. The issuance of an execution against an insolvent debtor is not a condition precedent to an action on an undertaking against a surety on the bond given for the redelivery of attached property. Rosenthal v. Perkins, 123 Cal. 240, 55 P. 804; 3 Cal. Jur. 518.

LOWERY v. HALLETT. (Civ. 3835.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California. Nov. 21, 1929.

Rehearing Granted Dec. 21, 1929.

1. Automobiles ⇨245(87)—Guest held not contributorily negligent as matter of law in making no protest or suggestion to automobile driver respecting speed.

One injured when automobile in which he was riding ran into tree after going around curve in road at speed of over 50 miles an hour held not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law in making no protest or suggestion to driver respecting speed, though he was watching speedometer and knew speed at which car was going.

2. Automobiles ⇨244(35)—Prima facie evidence of violation of statute in exceeding speed limit becomes conclusive on failure of other evidence to contradict and overcome it (California Vehicle Act, § 113, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30).

Prima facie evidence of violation of California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553) § 113, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30, in exceeding speed limit fixed by subdivision (b), as declared by subdivision (c) becomes conclusive on failure of other evidence to contradict and overcome it.

3. Trial ⇨296(4,5)—Instructions not referring to issue of contributory negligence held not prejudicially erroneous, in view of other instructions and rulings on evidence (California Vehicle Act, § 113, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30).

In action for injuries to guest in automobile, instructions to find for plaintiff, if defendant drove car faster than 35 miles per hour in violation of California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553) § 113, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30, and such violation was proximate cause of accident, instruction that defendant was negligent as matter of law, if he drove car in violation of subdivision (a), and instruction to find for plaintiff if defendant failed to exercise ordinary care, and plaintiff was injured by reason thereof, held not prejudicially erroneous because not referring to issue of contributory negligence, in view of other instructions and court's rulings on evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Action by Jeff Lowery against L. P. Hallett. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, and Irving D. Gibson, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Carter & Smith, of Redding, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for damages. The facts upon which the judgment is based are as follows:

At the time the alleged injuries were suffered by the plaintiff, he and the defendant were residing on a ranch near Redding. The defendant "wanted to see the country over there at Goose Valley," and he asked the plaintiff "to go along with him and show him the country"; the plaintiff being familiar therewith and the roads leading thereto, while the defendant was not. The plaintiff accepting the invitation, the parties proceeded on the contemplated journey in the defendant's Buick touring car, driven by the defendant. A part of their course was along the highway running easterly from Redding to Burney. When they had reached a point within about 3 miles of Burney, they came to a straight and comparatively level stretch of road about a mile in length, at the end of which the highway curves to the left. The defendant drove over this stretch of road at a speed of between 50 and 55 miles an hour, and continued around the curve at the same speed until his automobile ran off to the right and into a large tree about 290 feet from the commencement of the curve, thereby causing the injuries for which the plaintiff claims damages. During all this time the plaintiff, who is a half-blood Indian, was watching the speedometer, and knew the speed at which the automobile was going, but he made no protest or suggestion to the defendant in relation thereto. The plaintiff testified that he did not not make any protest because he was "afraid he would go faster," and that he "thought he would slack up a little" at the curve.

[1] Appellant contends that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, and that a nonsuit should have been granted. A similar contention was considered and answered in the negative by the Supreme Court in Shields v. King, 277 P. 1043, and in Benjamin v. Noonan, 277 P. 1045. Those cases and the authorities cited therein are deemed decisive of this.

"You are instructed that the maximum speed at which a motor vehicle was permitted to travel on the public highway in the State of California on the 21st day of August, 1927, was thirty-five miles per hour, and if you believe from the evidence that the defendant, L. P. Hallett, was driving the automobile in which the plaintiff was riding, at a rate of speed in excess of thirty-five miles per hour at the time the accident happened, the said defendant was operating said automobile in violation of the law of the state of California, and if said violation was the proximate cause of the accident, defendant was guilty of negligence as a matter of law, and if said negligence was the proximate cause of the injury to plaintiff, your verdict must be in favor of the plaintiff.

Another instruction to the same effect was given. Admittedly the instruction is erroneous in stating that the speed limit was 35 miles an hour at the time of the accident, August 21, 1927. California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553) § 113, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30. Subdivision (b) of that section provides that "it shall be lawful," except as otherwise provided, to drive a vehicle at the speeds therein enumerated, and subdivision (c) provides: "In all charges for a violation of this section, speeds in excess of those set forth in subdivision (b) of this section shall be taken as prima facie but not as conclusive evidence of a violation of this section." If it be conceded that it is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury to determine whether a speed in excess of any of those enumerated in subdivision (b) of section 113 as amended is a violation of that section, still the prima facie evidence of violation of that section, referred to therein, becomes conclusive upon failure of other evidence to contradict and overcome it. Miller & Lux, Inc., v. Secara, 193 Cal. 755, 771, 227 P. 171. The plaintiff testified that the defendant was driving in excess of 50 miles an hour at the time of the accident. No attempt was made to overcome this evidence. The defendant did not testify in the case, and his silence tends to strengthen the case made by the plaintiff.

The court, after reading subdivision (a) of section 113 as amended, instructed the jury that, if the defendant drove his automobile in violation of that subdivision, "he was guilty of negligence as a matter of law, and if such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury to plaintiff, your verdict must be in favor of the plaintiff." In another instruction the court stated that, if the defendant "failed to exercise ordinary care in the operation of the automobile, * * * and that by reason of the failure of said defendant to exercise ordinary care in the operation of said automobile, plaintiff received the injuries complained of, it is your duty to return a verdict in favor of the plaintiff." No reference is made in any of the four instructions mentioned to the issue of contributory negligence. Appellant contends that all of such instructions are prejudicially erroneous by reason of such omission. It may be conceded that, considering the instructions abstractly, they are incomplete and inaccurate, but, under the circumstances of this case, later to be considered, they are not deemed prejudicial. Two subsequent instructions, given at the defendant's request, are as follows:

"If you find from the evidence that plaintiff was guilty of any negligence which proximately contributed to his alleged injury, or was guilty of any lack of ordinary care, whether by doing an act or by omitting to do what a person of ordinary care and prudence would have done under the same or similar circumstances, and such lack of ordinary care, act or omission, if any such there was, proximately contributed in any degree to the accident, and without which the accident would not have occurred, then you cannot go further and apportion the negligence, if any, between the parties, but in such event plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence which defeats his recovery and your verdict must be in favor of defendant and against plaintiff."

"I further instruct you that a passenger in an automobile operated by another not for hire is required to use ordinary care for his own safety. If he is aware that the operator is carelessly operating the automobile, or is carelessly rushing into danger, it is incumbent upon him to take such steps as an ordinarily prudent person would take under the same circumstances for his own safety.

"I therefore instruct you that if you find from the evidence that said plaintiff, while a passenger in the automobile in which he was injured, by the exercise of ordinary care could have avoided the injuries which he received, and that such failure of plaintiff to exercise ordinary care proximately contributed to his injuries then your verdict should be for the defendant."

Since the evidence shows that the defendant was guilty of negligence as a matter of law, the only issue in the case, other than as to the amount of damages, was the alleged contributory negligence of the plaintiff. During the cross-examination of the plaintiff he repeatedly stated that he made no protest or suggestion to the defendant in relation to the speed of the automobile. Thereafter counsel for the plaintiff, misconceiving the effect of the decision of this court in Brown v. Davis, 84 Cal. App. 180, 257 P. 877, moved the court, in the presence of the jury, to strike out all such testimony. The court granted the motion, saying in effect that the plaintiff's conduct, or omissions, did not constitute contributory negligence. Thereafter, counsel for the plaintiff, thinking that possibly he had led the court into error, moved the court to change the ruling striking out the aforesaid evidence, and the court granted the motion, saying:

"The motion to withdraw the objection to the questions as propounded and also the motion to strike out the answers of the plaintiff, and the motion to withdraw the objection to said answers will be granted and the objection will be overruled and the answers will stand and the court will instruct the jury that they are to disregard the remarks of the court in regard to whether or not such acts proximately contributed to the injury of the plaintiff, and that it will be the duty under the instructions of the court and the law and the evidence as offered to determine whether such acts on the part of the plaintiff proximately contributed to his injury and not to consider the remarks of the court in determining that question as to whether or not such acts were contributory negligence."

red, and after the court had given the instructions on contributory negligence quoted herein, it seems impossible that the jurors could have been misled by the omission of any reference to the issue of contributory negligence in the first four instructions referred to herein. Presuming that they were persons of ordinary intelligence, they must have understood that any contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff was sufficient to bar a recovery. It is by no means certain that jurors would understand such instructions, standing alone, to exclude the consideration of contributory negligence. It has been held that the use of the words "the proximate cause" of negligence "necessarily implies that it is the only proximate cause." Straten v. Spencer, 52 Cal. App. 98, 106, 197 P. 540, 543. See, also, Douglas v. Southern Pacific Co., 203 Cal. 390, 393, 264 P. 237, and Saltzen v. Associated Oil Co., 198 Cal. 157, 161, 244 P. 338. If the word "proximate," as used in the instructions under reconsideration, had been preceded by the word "only" or "sole," there would have been no error in the omission of any reference to contributory negligence. What is said herein is not intended as an approval of the form of those instructions, but only as reasons for holding that, under the particular facts of this case, they are not prejudicially erroneous.

Appellant complains of the court's refusal to give other requested instructions on the subject of contributory negligence, but the instructions on that subject herein set forth clearly cover the questions of law involved, and, from what has already been said, it appears that the jurors must have fully understood their duty in that connection.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

Action by Irving L. Blinn against James Ritchie and another, individually and as copartners doing business under the fictitious name and style of the Walnut Park Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Irving P. Austin, of Compton, for appellants.

I. R. Rubin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. In the action which gives rise to this appeal, which was originally filed in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles, the complaint is cast in the form of a common count alleging that the plaintiff had performed certain services "for and at the request of the defendants" and the reasonable value thereof. The title of the action, as it appears in the caption of the complaint, reads as follows: "Irving L. Blinn, Plaintiff, vs. James Ritchie and Joseph F. Knopf, individually, James Ritchie and Joseph F. Knopf, copartners doing business under the fictitious name and style of Walnut Park Lumber Company."

Judgment for $400 was ordered "in favor of the plaintiff Irving L. Blinn, and against the defendants, James Ritchie and Joseph F. Knopf, individually, and James Ritchie and Joseph F. Knopf, copartners, doing business under the fictitious name and style of Walnut Park Lumber Company."

Upon an appeal taken by the defendants to the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles, the judgment of the municipal court was affirmed. From this judgment of affirmation by the superior court this appeal is taken by "Joseph F. Knopf, James Ritchie and Joseph F. Knopf, copartners doing business under the fictitious name and style of Walnut Park Lumber Company."

Appellants in their brief present and argue several reasons for reversal of the judgment, but, in view of the conclusions we have arrived at, we deem it necessary to discuss but one proposition.

[1] The judgment must be sustained, if at all, upon the basis of the existence of a copartnership between the defendants Ritchie and Knopf. There is no finding that such a copartnership existed, nor is there competent evidence in the record to sustain such a finding, if one had been made. It is not contended that the defendant Knopf had anything to do personally with the hiring of the plaintiff, or even that he had any knowledge of such a hiring, or of any services rendered by the plaintiff to the Walnut Park Lumber Company. The defendant Knopf can be held for plaintiff's claim only upon a showing that Ritchie, who admitted the hiring of the plaintiff, was a partner of Knopf at the time. The only evidence in the record touching upon the question of copartnership is the testimony of the plaintiff that, prior to his employment by Ritchie, Ritchie had told him that "Knopf was a silent partner in the business, and was not actively engaged in the conduct of the business," and the testimony of the defendant Ritchie: "That he and defendant Joseph F. Knopf were the owners of the Walnut Park Lumber Company; that he was in active charge of said business, and that Mr. Knopf acted as a silent partner."

[2, 3] Appellants' contention that the foregoing testimony is insufficient to support a judgment against Knopf on the basis of a copartnership existing between Ritchie and Knopf must be sustained. The testimony of the plaintiff as to what Ritchie told him about Knopf's connection with the business was mere hearsay; while the testimony of Ritchie that Knopf was his silent partner is clearly a conclusion of law. There is not a scintilla of evidence in the record as to any contract of copartnership, nor as to any acts of Knopf relating to the conduct of the business of the Walnut Park Lumber Company, that would justify an inference of the existence of a copartnership agreement.

In the case of Hammond v. Borgwardt, 126 Cal. 611, 59 P. 121, the court, having under review evidence markedly similar to that contained in the instant case, held that the evidence was insufficient to warrant a finding of the existence of a copartnership. In the case of Doudell v. Shoo, 20 Cal. App. 424, 129 P. 478, the court, in approving the language used in Hammond v. Borgwardt, supra, emphasized the rule that a contract of copartnership must be proved in the same manner that any other contract must be established, and that the mere declaration of a witness that another person was his partner is a mere conclusion of law, and does not furnish the evidentiary facts necessary to support a finding of copartnership.

[4] Respondent endeavors to avoid the consequences of the rule requiring evidentiary facts instead of conclusions of law to support a finding of copartnership by asserting that an exception to the rule exists where one makes the statement that he and another party were partners in the presence of the alleged partner and such alleged partner makes no denial. Respondent claims the benefit of this asserted rule on the theory that defendant Knopf was present in the municipal court during the trial, and that the testimony of the defendant Ritchie was given in his presence, and that Knopf made no denial. Without determining the legal question involved in this contention, the fact that there is nothing in the record to show defendant Knopf was present in the courtroom when Ritchie testified disposes of this point adversely to appellants' contention.

[5] Nor is there merit in respondent's contention that the defendant Knopf, by filing an answer in the action, admitted the existence of the claim of partnership between himself and Ritchie. This contention is based upon the introductory language used in the answer, which reads as follows: "Comes now defendants, Joseph F. Knopf and Walnut Park Lumber Company, a copartnership, and answering plaintiff's complaint herein, admit, allege and deny as follows:" By no theory of pleading can this language be construed as being an admission of any essential element necessary to support the judgment. Maclay Co. v. Meads, 14 Cal. App. 363, 112 P. 195, 113 P. 364. Furthermore, there is nothing in the quoted introductory statement that indicated who constituted the Walnut Park Lumber Company, a copartnership.

The judgment is reversed as to defendant Joseph F. Knopf as an individual, and James Ritchie and Joseph F. Knopf, copartners, doing business under the fictitious name and style of Walnut Park Lumber Company.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 12, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 12, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 9, 1930.

1. Automobiles $\Rightarrow$ 220(3)—Pedestrian leaving street car had no right to assume passing automobile would stop until he reached curbing (Motor Vehicle Act, § 134).

Pedestrian leaving street car had no right to assume passing automobile would stop until he reached curb, especially in view of Motor Vehicle Act, § 134 (St. 1923, p. 560), not requiring vehicle to stop while passing street car halted at street corner, but merely providing that vehicle shall at all times be operated with due care and caution for safety of passengers alighting.

2. Municipal corporations $\Rightarrow$ 705(10)—Failure of pedestrian to look in direction from which vehicles may approach, in absence of excusable circumstances, constitutes contributory negligence.

Pedestrian while crossing city street has duty to carefully look in direction from which he may anticipate approach of vehicles immediately before venturing into pathway of traffic, and failure to do so, in absence of excusable circumstances, will constitute contributory negligence.

3. Automobiles $\Rightarrow$ 220(7)—Pedestrian struck by taxicab after leaving street car held contributorily negligent as matter of law in not looking in direction from which vehicles might be expected to approach.

In action for personal injuries resulting when pedestrian was struck by taxicab after leaving street car and walking to curbing, evidence held to show plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in failing to look in direction from which vehicles might be expected to approach.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Action by R. L. Bence against Teddy's Taxi and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Irving D. Gibson, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Fred J. Harris and M. F. Shelley, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff as a result of having been struck by a taxicab while crossing a street after leaving a street car at an intersecting corner in Sacramento. The appellant relies chiefly upon the alleged contributory negligence of the plaintiff as a cause for reversal. The plaintiff failed to look to his right, whence the automobile which caused his injuries approached, before he proceeded to cross the street.

The plaintiff, who was 75 years of age, was employed as a janitor at the courthouse in Sacramento. The morning of June 16, 1928, he entered a street car for the purpose of going to his work. Proceeding westerly along K street this car stopped at about 5:30 o'clock a. m. at the corner of Seventh street, opposite the post office building. Except for the taxicab which was involved in the accident, no other traffic was present at this point. There were but two other passengers on the street car. The pedestrians' pathway across K street where it intersects Seventh street was indicated by broad white bands painted on the pavement. A safety zone 4 feet in width was likewise outlined on the pavement, adjacent to and parallel with the street car track on the north side for a distance of 44 feet east of the easterly intersecting line of Seventh street. The distance from the northerly line of this safety zone to the northerly curbing of K street was 12½ feet. This space was reserved for machines traveling westerly along K street.

For a distance of about a block the defendants' taxicab had been following the street car upon which the plaintiff was riding. As the street car stopped at the corner of Seventh and K streets, the taxicab slackened its speed, but did not stop. The plaintiff left the street car from its front end, grasping the upright bar with his left hand, as he stepped down onto the pavement at the extreme westerly end of the safety zone. He failed to look for vehicles along the street toward the rear of the street car either before he descended from the car or immediately afterward. Promptly stepping into the pedestrians' pathway, without looking to his right, from which direction he might expect approaching vehicles, he proceeded to cross K street to the northerly curbing. After reaching a point about 8 feet from the place where he alighted, for the first time he looked to his right and observed the taxicab rapidly bearing down upon him. He jumped forward to escape the imminent danger, but was struck and seriously injured. There is ample testimony to support the implied findings that the defendants were guilty of negligence.

In answer to the complaint for damages which was filed in this case, the defendants pleaded and relied upon the charge of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff for failure to look for approaching vehicles before stepping into the pathway of danger. After a careful examination of the record we are unable to find evidence of any circumstances which may excuse this necessary exercise of ordinary care. The evidence is without conflict to the effect that the plaintiff did fail to exercise this precaution for his own safety. It therefore appears to be imperative to hold that he was therefore guilty of negligence as a matter of law, which directly contributed to the injuries which he sustained.

The plaintiff testified that when the street car stopped at the corner of Seventh and K streets with the front end of the car at the white mark indicating the pedestrians' pathway across K street, he "stepped right off the (front end of the) car in the pedestrians' lane. Q. Which way were you facing when you got off the car? A. Northwest—west and north. * * * I started across the street * * * toward the postoffice on Seventh street. * * * I got about eight feet across the street, and I turned around this way and saw the car coming. * * * I turned around towards the east, I was facing this way (indicating), * * * the (taxi) car was coming down K street on the north side, * * * going on west. * * * It (the taxicab) was about 16 or 18 feet from me when I saw it first * * * coming in the same direction as the street car was progressing. * * * I jumped for my life to get out of the way of it. * * * The car hit me and knocked me down. * * * I didn't know anything for a little while."

Upon cross-examination he further testified:

"Q. And you faced to the north, or northwest (when you alighted from the street car)? A. West of north; I thought I was facing north.

"Q. You faced, looking down K street, did you, as you got off the car? A. Yes towards that Bon Marche corner there, * * * the northwest corner of Seventh and K streets, * * * the opposite corner from the postoffice. * * *

"Q. And then you turned and walked directly toward the sidewalk in front of the postoffice. A. I did.

"Q. And you had gotten about eight feet, you say, when you first saw the taxicab coming? A. Approximately. * * *

"Q. That was the first time that you saw the taxicab, * * * wasn't it? A. Yes sir.

"Q. And at that time the taxicab was about sixteen feet away from you? A. Sixteen or eighteen, approximately, yes sir. * * *

"Q. As soon as you alighted from the street car you started to walk over towards the sidewalk, is that right? A. Yes sir. * * *

"Q. Then you had come about half the distance from the street car to the curb when you first looked around to see the taxicab coming on your right, isn't that right? A. Pretty near that. * * * I turned around about the time I saw it. * * * It came right down on the north side of the zone. * * *

"Q. Did you see it before it got within 16 or 18 feet of you? A. No, I did not, it was coming pretty fast. * * *

"Q. Now when you first got off the street car and put your foot down on the street for the first time, you didn't look up K street towards Eighth street, did you? A. How could I look up K street if my face was turned the other way. * * * I didn't have time to look up the street. * * *

"Q. I think you have made that quite clear, you didn't look, at any time before you got at least eight feet away from the edge of the safety zone, you didn't look up K street, that is right, isn't it? A. I think that is right."

[1] The plaintiff makes it very clear that he utterly failed to look to his right along the public street, from which direction he should have anticipated the approach of vehicles. He took no precaution for his own safety before stepping into the pathway of danger. The record contains no evidence to the contrary. Nor are there any circumstances which may excuse this failure to exercise ordinary precaution. It was broad daylight. The street car was not crowded with passengers so as to obscure his view to the rear. The street was almost free from traffic. The record indicates that the defendants' taxicab was the only automobile in sight. A glance to the rear before the plaintiff alighted from the street car, or before he walked out into the pathway of the automobiles, would have disclosed this approaching car. The plaintiff had no right to assume that a passing automobile would stop until he reached the curbing. The law as it then existed did not even require a machine to stop while passing a street car which had halted at a street corner. Section 134 of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 560) then read: "In passing any * * * street car while passengers are alighting from or boarding the same, vehicles shall be operated or driven on the right-hand side of such cars and at a rate of speed not exceeding ten miles an hour * * * and shall at all times be operated with due care and caution so that the safety of such passengers shall be assured. * * *"

[2] It is the invariable rule of law, which is in accordance with good reason, that it becomes the duty of a person, who purposes to cross a city street, to carefully look in the direction from which he may anticipate the approach of vehicles, immediately before venturing into the pathway of traffic. In the absence of excusable circumstances, the failure to do so will constitute contributory negligence. Niosi v. Empire Steam Laundry, 117 Cal. 257, 49 P. 185; Davis v. Breuner Co., 167 Cal. 633, 140 P. 586; Lord v. Stacy, 68 Cal. App. 517, 229 P. 874; Finkle v. Tait, 55 Cal. App. 425, 432, 203 P. 1031; Mayer v. Anderson, 36 Cal. App. 740, 173 P. 174; Filson v. Balkins (Cal. App.) 268 P. 445, superseded by opinion in (Sup.) 273 P. 578.

[3] Conceding the negligence of the defendants in the present case with respect to the careless manner in which the taxicab was operated, the undisputed evidence showing a lack of due caution on the part of the plaintiff precludes his right to recover. It therefore becomes unnecessary to consider the other points presented by the appellants.

The judgment is reversed.

OHLHAUSEN v. MILLS, City Clerk.
(Civ. 74.)

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California. Nov. 12, 1929.

1. Elections $\S$ 8—City charter, making general state law governing elections applicable and providing for nomination under state primary law, made all state laws governing primary and general elections applicable (Const. art. 2, $\S$ 2 $\frac{3}{4}$).

City charter, making provisions of general law of state governing municipal elections held separate from general elections applicable to elections in city, and provisions of state law governing elections for state and county officers applicable to city elections in matters not provided for in charter, and providing in another section that candidates for city offices should be nominated at primary election to be held as provided for in direct primary law of state, makes all of state law governing both primary and general elections for all state and county officers applicable, irrespective of result at primary, since method of election provided by freeholders' charter governs, under Const. art. 2, $\S$ 2 $\frac{3}{4}$.

2. Municipal corporations $\S$ 58—Each part of city charter must be given effect (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1858).

City charter should be so construed as to give meaning and effect to instrument as a whole and to each part thereof, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1858, requiring such construction of statute.

3. Elections $\S$ 172—Where city charter made general state law applicable to city elections, only highest candidate for municipal office at primary could have name on ballot in general election (State Primary Law, $\S$ 23; Const. art. 2, $\S$ 2 $\frac{3}{4}$).

Only name of candidate for municipal office as council member who received largest number of votes at primary should be placed on ballot to be used at general municipal election under city charter, making provisions of general law of state applicable and providing for nominations of candidates for city offices as provided in direct primary law of state of California, since such charter provisions made applicable State Primary Law, $\S$ 23 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 2256), providing that, in case only one person was elected to judicial, school, county, or township office at November election, candidate receiving majority at primary should alone have his name printed on ballot; Const. art. 2, $\S$ 2 $\frac{3}{4}$, allowing variation in method of election under freeholders' charter.

4. Elections $\S$ 159—Where state law, made applicable to city elections, permitted only one name on ballot at final election, voters could write in name of another person (Const. art. 2, $\S$ 2 $\frac{3}{4}$; State Primary Law, $\S$ 23).

Municipal charter, making provisions of general state law governing municipal elections held separate from general state elections applicable as law governing city elections and making provisions of general state law governing elections for state and county officers apply in matters not provided for in charter, gave right to electors at general election to write in name of person other than successful candidate in primary, though but one person's name appeared on ballot at general election, under Const. art. 2, $\S$ 2 $\frac{3}{4}$, and State Primary Law, $\S$ 23 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 2256), relative to elections.

Original petition by Charles A. Ohlhausen for a writ of mandate to be directed to G. Albert Mills, City Clerk of Riverside. Temporary writ denied.

Joseph Seymour, of Riverside, for petitioner.

Eugene Best, of Riverside, for respondent.

Alphonse E. Ganahl, of Corona, amicus curiæ.

BARNARD, J. This is an original petition for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent, as city clerk of the city of Riverside, to place the name of petitioner upon the ballots to be used at the general municipal election, to be held in the city of Riverside on the third Tuesday of November, 1929, as a candidate for election to the office of member of the council of said city from the fourth ward thereof.

The petitioner alleges:

That he is a resident and qualified elector of said fourth ward in said city of Riverside. That the respondent is the duly elected, qualified, and acting city clerk of said city. That said city of Riverside is a duly organized and established city of more than 3,500 inhabitants, and that there is now in force in said city a freeholders' charter, duly ratified by the electors of said city, and approved by the Legislature of the state of California on March 22, 1929. That, pursuant to the provisions of said charter, a primary election for the purpose of nominating candidates for city offices, including, among others, the office of member of the council of said city from the fourth ward thereof, was held in said city on September 17, 1929. That at said primary election there were only two candidates for member of the council for the fourth ward, and votes cast at such primary election for said particular office were canvassed and the result duly announced as follows:

Candidates	Votes
Fred M. Lindsley.....	473
Charles A. Ohlhausen.....	446
Total	919

That the petitioner herein is the same Charles A. Ohlhausen who received votes as above indicated, and that he has complied with all the requirements of law regarding a candidate for said office. That, under the terms of said charter, a general municipal election will be held in said city for the purpose of electing various city officers, including a member of the council from the fourth ward, on the third Tuesday of November, 1929. That said election will be a separate city election. That it is the duty of respondent, as clerk of said city, to prepare, cause to be printed, and provide for the use of the electors, the sample and official ballots required by law for said election. That it is the duty of respondent to place upon said sample ballots, and the said official ballots, as candidates for the office of member of the council for the fourth ward of said city, to be voted upon at said general municipal election, the names of both said Fred M. Lindsley and Charles A. Ohlhausen, being the names of the two candidates who received the highest number of votes cast for said office at said primary election. That the respondent city clerk has prepared and caused to be printed, sample and official ballots bearing only the name of one candidate for the said member of said council for the fourth ward of said city, to wit, the name of Fred M. Lindsley. That, although demand had been made upon said city clerk to place the name of petitioner upon said ballot as one of the candidates for said office, respondent has refused and still refuses to so place petitioner's name upon said ballot. That, if the name of petitioner is not placed upon said sample and official ballots, the qualified electors of the fourth ward of said city will be deprived of their right to vote for any candidate, other than the said Fred M. Lindsley, by writing in the name of any such other candidate, and that petitioner will be deprived of his right to have his name so placed upon the ballot, to be used at said general election.

The respondent city clerk filed a general demurrer and also an answer, the material part of which denies that it is his duty as such city clerk to place on the official ballots and sample ballots, to be used at such general election, the name of Charles A. Ohlhausen as a candidate for member of the council for the fourth ward of said city. Because of the necessity for the utmost haste, if the decision in this matter is to be of any practical use, in view of the date of the general election involved, counsel for both parties appeared at the hearing and stipulated that all matters of time, notice, and the filing of briefs should be waived, and the matter was submitted upon the argument presented at the hearing.

Section 2½ of article 2 of the Constitution of California, reads as follows:

"Any candidate for a judicial, school, county, township, or other nonpartisan office who at a primary election shall receive votes on a majority of all the ballots cast for candidates for the office for which such candidate seeks nomination, shall be elected to such office. Where two or more candidates are to be elected to a given office and a greater number of candidates receive a majority than the number to be elected, those candidates shall be elected who secure the highest votes of those receiving such majority, and equal in number to the number to be elected. Where a different method of election is provided by a freeholders' charter, the charter provision shall govern."

It is conceded that the office involved in this action is a nonpartisan office, and that the said Fred M. Lindsley received a majority of all the votes cast for this office at the primary election referred to in the petition; therefore, unless under the provisions of the charter of the city of Riverside, a different method of election is provided, under the terms of this constitutional provision the said Fred M. Lindsley was elected at the primary election. It becomes necessary, then, to examine the provisions of said charter to determine whether or not a different method of election is thereby provided.

Sections and portions of sections of the charter of the city of Riverside which throw any light upon this subject are as follows:

"Sec. 186. Elections to be held in said city for the purpose of electing the officers thereof and for all other purposes, are of three kinds:

- "1. General municipal elections;
- "2. Special elections;
- "3. Primary elections.

"Sec. 187. General municipal elections shall be held in the city as follows: The first election shall be held on the third Tuesday in November, nineteen hundred and twenty-nine; the second election shall be held on the third Tuesday in November, nineteen hundred thirty-two. Said elections shall be held on the third Tuesday of November every two years thereafter. * * *

"One member of the council from each of the third, fourth, sixth and seventh wards of the city shall be elected by the electors of said wards, and two members of the board of education shall be elected by the electors at large at the first general municipal election. * * *

"Sec. 188. The officers elected at a general municipal election shall, after they have qualified as provided in this charter, take office and enter upon the discharge of their duties at ten o'clock a. m., of the first Monday in January next succeeding their election, or if said day falls on a holiday, then upon the day following."

"Sec. 190. The provisions of the general law of the state governing municipal elections where the same are held separate from the general state elections, are hereby adopted as the law governing city elections, and the provisions of the general laws of the state governing elections for state and county officers shall govern city elections in matters for which no provision is made in this charter, and the council and the city clerk respectively shall exercise the powers and perform the duties conferred on, or imposed by, such laws or boards of supervisors and county clerks concerning elections; provided, that where this charter makes provision relating to any matters contained in such general laws, the said charter provisions shall govern. * * *

"Sec. 191. All candidates for city offices shall be nominated at a primary election to be held on the third Tuesday in September next preceding each general municipal election, as provided for in the direct primary law of the State of California as now in force, or as may hereafter be amended, provided, however, that the council may by ordinance provide that any primary election may be consolidated with the state election held in the same year, and in such case the said primary election shall be held at the same time and place and together with said state election within the limits of the city, in accordance with the provision of any general law of the state providing for such consolidation.

"Sec. 192. When candidates for any office are nominated as specified in section 191, it is hereby provided and directed that no party name or designation shall appear on the certificates or ballots and that the names of the candidates for each office shall be arranged alphabetically on said ballot."

It will be noted that section 191 of the charter provides that all candidates for said office shall be nominated at the primary election held on the third Tuesday in September, "as provided for in the direct primary law in the state of California." That portion of the State Primary Law which seems to throw any light on the question here involved, is a portion of section 23 thereof (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 2256), which is as follows:

"Except in the case of a candidate for nomination to a judicial, school, county, township or municipal office the person receiving the highest number of votes at a primary election as the candidate for the nomination of a political party for an office shall be the candidate of that party for such office, and his name as such candidate shall be placed on the official ballot voted at the ensuing election; provided, he has paid the filing fee as required by section seven of this act; and provided, further, that no candidate for a nomination for other than a judicial, school, county, township or municipal office who fails to receive the highest number of votes for the nomination of the political party with which he was affiliated thirty-five days before the date of the primary election, as ascertained by the secretary of state from the affidavit of registration of such candidate in the office of the county clerk of the county in which such candidate resides, shall be entitled to be the candidate of any other political party. * * *

"In the case of a judicial, school, county, township, or municipal office, the candidates, equal in number to twice the number to be elected to such office, or less, if the total number of candidates is less than twice the number of offices to be filled, who receive the highest number of votes cast on all the ballots of all the voters participating in the primary election for nomination to such office, shall be the candidates for such office at the ensuing election, and their names as such candidates shall be placed on the official ballot voted at the ensuing election; provided, however, that in case there is but one person to be elected at the November election to any judicial, school, county, or township office, any candidate who receives at the August primary election a majority of the total number of votes cast for all the candidates for such office shall be the only candidate for such office whose name shall be printed on the ballot at the ensuing election. * * *

[1] If section 191 of the charter stood alone, it would seem clear that the machinery provided for taking care of the results of the primary election as outlined in the portions of section 23 of the State Primary Law as quoted would govern; and, in that event, no different method of election would be provided, and, under section 2¾ of article 2 of the Constitution, the one receiving the majority of votes for the office would be elected. But we have in the charter not only the provisions of section 191, but also those of section 190, in which it is especially provided that "the provisions of the general laws of the state governing elections for state and county officers," shall also govern election in this city, in matters for which no provision is made under its charter. The word "elections" as here used, includes both general municipal and primary elections, under the terms of section 186 of the charter. These provisions amplify section 191 of the charter, by making applicable not only the direct primary law of the state, but all the general laws of the state governing elections for state and county officers. One of these general laws is the right to write in at the general election the name of a person not nominated at the primary. Section 187 of the charter provides specifically that members of the council and other city officers are to be elected, not only at a general municipal election, but at a particular general municipal election, to wit, the first one to be held under the terms of this charter, the exact day thereof being named. In thus specifically providing that the first officers be elected on a definite date, at a general election, which is in the charter differentiated from a primary election, and in specifically applying to both the primary election and the general municipal election, the machinery and method of procedure provided for not only by the State Primary Law, but also by the laws of the state applying to and governing the election of state and county officers at all elections, thereby including those portions of the state law permitting the writing in of the names of a person not nominated in the primary election, and in making no specific provision as to how names shall go upon the ballots after the primary election, it must be held that the framers of the charter and the people in adopting the charter, had something in mind other than the application of the earlier parts of section 23 of the State Primary Law, as might be indicated in section 191 of the charter. If all they had in mind was to apply the general provisions of the state primary law, so far as they affect municipal elections, it would have been sufficient to leave the entire matter as provided for by section 191 of the charter; but they saw fit to insert also, and first, the additional provisions in section 190 of the charter, heretofore referred to.

Since they did not leave it entirely to be governed by the provisions of the State Primary Law, but specifically added the additional provisions, a different method of election is provided by this charter, than would have been the case had section 191 of the charter stood alone. In effect, section 190 of the charter adds the word "municipal" to the latter part of the quoted portion of section 23 of the State Primary Law, and also makes all other state election laws, both for primary and general elections, apply to this particular city, except as otherwise provided in the charter.

Section 2¾ of article 2 of the Constitution excludes the operation of a part of the general law of the state, in certain circumstances, by providing that no further right to write in the name of another person exists, where a certain result occurs in the primary election. But it expressly allows any particular city to provide to the contrary. While the charter involved in this case is inartificially drawn, in this particular respect, it is apparent that in its entirety it has made all the laws of the state governing both primary and general elections for all state and county officers applicable, no matter what the result at the primary, and thus a different method of election has been provided.

[2-4] It is fundamental that wherever possible, a statute or Code section shall be construed so as to give meaning and effect to the instrument as a whole, and to each part thereof. Code Civ. Proc. § 1858. The same rule of interpretation applies to a city charter. From the extremely hasty examination which has been made necessary by the circumstances attending this case, we are of the opinion that, if all portions of this charter in question be given effect, as they should be, there is provided a different method for proceedings after the primary election, than those provided for in the State Primary Law alone, and that this different method consists in refusing to adopt alone the first part of section 23 of the State

Primary Law, as it applies to municipal elections, which provides for placing the names of the two candidates receiving the highest vote on the ballot, and in lieu thereof, this charter provides for adding, in effect, the word "municipal" to the list of officers named in the latter part of the quoted portion of section 23, and for adding also all other provisions of the state law, applying to the election of state and county officers, including the right to write in the name of a person not appearing on the ballot. Therefore, under the circumstances set forth in the petition herein, the name of Fred M. Lindsley should alone go on the ballot, with the right preserved to the electors to write in the name of any other person if they so desire.

If our views as thus hastily formed are not correct, then the only alternative possible is to hold that there is no different method provided for in the charter of the city of Riverside than that contemplated in section 2¾ of article 2 of the Constitution. In that event, the constitutional provision applies, and, a person already having been elected to the office in question, the right of the petitioner to have his name included on the ballot necessarily fails. For the reasons given, the demurrer is sustained, and the issuance of a peremptory writ as prayed for, is refused.

The court made findings in favor of the defendants, and, from a judgment entered thereon, the plaintiffs have appealed.

On the 16th day of March, 1927, the parties entered into a written contract which contained among others, the following:

"Memorandum of agreement, entered into this 16 day of March, 1927, between Kolb and Dill, party of the first part, and W. H. Russo, party of the second part.

"Whereby it is mutually agreed that said party of the first part hereby engaged to play Kolb and Dill in 'Queen High' at Alameda, Cal. for the term of One Night, and no Matinee, beginning Tuesday, March 29, 1927 and terminating ——— making in all One performance.

* * * * *

"The said party of the first part, in consideration of one dollar in hand (the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged) and of certain payments herein named, made by said party of the second part, agrees to faithfully perform at the above theatre for the above time and will not perform previously at any other place of entertainment in said city during the season, furnishing entire entertainment on the stage, and such display printing as necessary, with dates for same, and conform to the rules and regulations which govern said place of entertainment.

* * * * *

"For the faithful observance and fulfillment of said party of the first part of each and all of the above conditions, the said party of the second part agrees to pay him or his representatives the sum resulting from the following terms: Said party of the second part agreed to pay to said party first part the sum of sixteen hundred dollars ($1600.) for the said one performance. Said sum to be paid at eight o'clock on the night of the performance. * * *"

The plaintiffs claim that on the evening of March 29, 1927, they, together with their associates, eleven persons in all, appeared at the theater ready, able, and willing to perform their contract, and that they were refused admittance to the theater. In reply the defendants contend that the plaintiffs appeared with only a part of their cast, eleven persons instead of eleven persons and a chorus consisting of twelve women and six men. The plaintiffs do not dispute the fact, but claim that under their contract they were not bound to produce a chorus of twelve women and six men. The same contention arose in the trial court. The trial court admitted certain evidence over the objection of the plaintiffs and decided the controverted question against the plaintiffs and in favor of the defendants. The case presents many attacks, all of which depend on whether the trial court erred in admitting evidence to enable it to interpret the contract. The plaintiffs planned and organized the performance as a musical comedy on or about the 1st day of November, 1926, carrying a cast of eleven persons, together with a chorus of twelve women and six men. As so organized, the musical comedy was produced by the plaintiffs at many places in California and Arizona between the 24th day of November, 1926, and down to and including the 22d day of March, 1927. When the performance was being so produced at the Wilkes in San Francisco during said season, the defendants attended, and later the contract above set forth was entered into. The chorus had been organized and taken from Los Angeles. At the time the contract was executed, the troupe was at San Diego. On its return from San Diego and while at Los Angeles, on the 22d day of March, 1927, the chorus was dispensed with and disbanded. When the defendants heard that the plaintiffs had dismissed the chorus, they immediately notified the plaintiffs that the plaintiffs must bring the chorus to Alameda or the defendants would refuse to accept the performance as a compliance with the terms of the contract. Many other items of evidence of a similar nature were introduced by the defendants. The plaintiffs do not specially complain of any one item, but they complain generally that the trial court should have confined the parties to the facts stated on the face of the written contract. In this connection they take the position that the written contract was clear and unambiguous and therefore that extrinsic evidence was not admissible for any purpose. They say, "In the absence of any specific agreement relating to the number of persons who should take part in the play, other than the principals, it is hardly necessary to observe that the contract, omitting any such provisions, left the plaintiffs at liberty, in the absence of any allegations or showing of fraud, to cut down the cast and arrange and rearrange the cast in any manner they saw fit, irrespective of what might have been in the minds of the defendants at the times the contracts were executed." The foregoing contention is vehemently controverted by the defendants. They cite and rely on Nelson v. Dutton, 63 Cal. App. 717, 220 P. 12; Reid v. St. John, 68 Cal. App. 348, 229 P. 863; 22 C. J. 1261, § 1683; Balfour v. Fresno C. & I. Co., 109 Cal. 221, 224, 225, 41 P. 876. The authorities cited clearly support the defendants, and the trial court did not err in admitting the evidence complained of.

At the same time the above entitled case was tried, another case entitled Kolb and Dill v. Rusco and Glesea, was also tried. Except as to the name of the theater, the name of the place, and the date of the engagement, the facts are the same. Both cases were tried together in the trial court, and both records are contained in the transcripts on file. One set of briefs was prepared. All that has been said regarding the first case is applicable to the second.

We find no error in the record. Both judgments are affirmed.

LUNDBLADE v. BOYES et ux. (Civ. 6734.)★

Rehearing Denied Dec. 12, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 6, 1930.

1. Fraud ☞58(2)—Evidence in action for deceit held to sustain conclusion that plaintiff erected dwelling in reliance on defendants' promise to convey premises, without intention to perform.

Evidence in action to recover damages for deceit held to sustain conclusion of trial court that plaintiff erected a dwelling on premises owned by defendants in reliance on promises of defendants to convey, which they did not intend to perform when the same were made, and which they subsequently refused to perform.

2. Appeal and error ☞1010(1)—Findings supported by sufficient evidence cannot be disturbed.

Findings of trial court supported by sufficient evidence cannot be disturbed on appeal.

3. Tender 16(2)—Tender was unnecessary where it was certain that it would have been refused.

Where it was certain that owners of lot on which building was erected pursuant to promise to convey would not have accepted tender of reasonable value thereof, thereby in effect repudiating contract, a tender was unnecessary.

4. Fraud ☞12—Promise to convey premises on which building was erected, without intention of performing, constituted willful deceit, for which damage was recoverable (Civ. Code, §§ 1709, 1710).

Promise of owners to convey premises on which building was erected, without any intention of performing the same, constituted willful deceit within Civ. Code, § 1710, for which they were liable for any damage thereby suffered in accordance with section 1709.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Harry W. Falk, Judge.

Action by Charlotte Lundblade against William Boyes and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Puter & Quinn, of Eureka, for appellants.
Nelson & Ricks, of Eureka, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. An action to recover damages for deceit, in which judgment was entered for the plaintiff.

Defendants, who are husband and wife, own a ranch consisting of 320 acres of timber and farm land situated in Humboldt county. The plaintiff alleged that, induced by the oral promises of the defendants to convey to her for its reasonable value a lot approximately one-fourth of an acre in area which formed a part of the above ranch, she built a dwelling house upon the lot; that the defendants did not intend to perform their promises when the same were made, and have since failed and refused to perform, all to the damage of plaintiff in the amount expended for the construction of the dwelling.

The court found in conformity with the above allegations of the complaint, and further that the dwelling cost $849.36, for which sum judgment was entered.

Defendants, who have appealed, contend that the findings are unsupported; that plaintiff as a consequence of her own default was not entitled to recover; and that the judgment was not in accord with the correct measure of damages in actions for deceit.

That the boundaries of the lot were marked by defendants, and the dwelling house erected thereon with their permission is undisputed. No price for the lot was agreed upon previous to the erection of the dwelling, but, according to the plaintiff, she was told by defendants " * * * not to worry about the price; everything would be fixed up and the price would be the smallest thing. * * * " She testified that she was ready and willing to pay the reasonable value thereof, but, after the erection of the dwelling, defendants demanded $1,000 for the lot, which she declined to pay.

According to the testimony of William Boyes, he would not have sold for less, although the evidence shows the value of the timber land in which the lot was situated to have been between $500 and $1,000 per acre.

[1, 2] The position of the defendants with respect to the transaction is not clear from their testimony. After the controversy arose, they claimed that the agreement was for a lease of the lot, and caused the dwelling to be insured for $1,000 as their property. At the trial they claimed that they had offered to convey the lot to the plaintiff for $1,000 after the survey and location of a proposed public highway through the land. Despite the conflict in the testimony, there was sufficient evidence to support the conclusion of the trial court that the dwelling was erected in reliance upon promises which the defendants did not intend to perform when the same were made, and which they subsequently refused to perform. Under such circumstances, the findings cannot be disturbed on appeal. Sherman v. Sandell, 106 Cal. 373, 39 P. 797; Waer v. Waer, 189 Cal. 178, 207 P. 891; Aronson & Co. v. Pearson, 199 Cal. 295, 249 P. 191.

[3] We cannot agree with the claim that plaintiff was in default. The testimony shows that she was ready and willing to pay the reasonable value of the lot, which at most was but one-fourth of the amount demanded by defendants, and that she visited their residence for that purpose. It is true that no actual tender was made; but, the defendants having in effect repudiated the contract found by the court, and it being certain that it would have been refused, a tender was unnecessary. Dowd v. Clarke, 54 Cal. 48; Scribner v. Schenkel, 128 Cal. 250, 60 P. 860; Pierce v. Lukens, 144 Cal. 397, 77 P. 996; Liver v. Mills, 155 Cal. 459, 101 P. 299; Burg v. Harris, 72 Cal. App. 379, 237 P. 399; Retsloff v. Smith, 79 Cal. App. 443, 249 P. 886.

[4] The promise made by defendants without any intention of performing the same constituted under the circumstances shown willful deceit (Civ. Code, § 1710), for which they were liable for any damage thereby suffered by the plaintiff (Civ. Code, § 1709). Here the damage which proximately resulted was the amount found by the court to have been expended in constructing the dwelling, and for which the judgment was entered.

LEIPSIC v. TAGGART. (Civ. 5711.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 8, 1929.

Brokers Ⓒ49(2)—Denying commissions on selling mortgage held by bank for pledgee held justified, where defendant's proposal was conditioned on bank's taking up loan.

Where defendant's written proposal to broker to sell mortgage contained provision that defendant had "borrowed at my bank against this mortgage and the sale to you is predicated on their allowing me to take loan up immediately," and where pledgee for whom the bank held the mortgage refused to allow his loan on the mortgage to be paid up and exercised option to purchase it, receiving the mortgage from the bank, trial court was justified in finding for defendant in broker's action for commissions for securing purchaser for the mortgage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. C. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Harry Leipsic against M. W. Taggart. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas J. Pitts, of Ontario, for appellant.
Robert F. Shippee, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant to recover a broker's commission, alleging that he produced a buyer ready and willing to buy and who offered to buy the mortgage, which defendant had offered to sell, on terms made by the defendant, and that the defendant's offer was accepted by the buyer and he agreed to pay 2 per cent. commission to the plaintiff upon consummation of the transaction.

This mortgage, prior to this time, had been hypothecated by the defendant at the Citizens' National Trust & Savings Bank to secure a loan made by one Feigenbaum to defendant, which loan had been negotiated at the bank, and the mortgage and note were being held and handled by the bank when the following offer was signed by the defendant. Defendant's only offer to sell and pay commission was the following:

"September Fourteenth, 1925.

"Mr. Harry Leipsic, 3809 Wilshire Blvd., Los Angeles, Calif. Dear Sir: "I hereby offer to sell for your client an existing first mortgage dated August 22nd, 1925, on the house and property at 49 Fremont place, known as lot 49, tract 89, as per map recorded in book 14, pages 166-167 of maps.

"This mortgage is for $35,000.00 payable on or before three years from August 22nd, 1925, to the order of Charles P. Fisher at 8% made by A. A. Cochrane.

"You are authorized to offer this at 4% discount and 2% commission to you on consummation of the transaction.

"At the present time, I have borrowed at my bank against this mortgage and the sale to you is predicated on their allowing me to take the loan up immediately.

"Very truly yours,

"M. W. Taggart."

At the time this offer was signed, however, the defendant explained the last paragraph of this letter by stating that the last condition was inserted because he did not know if the bank would accept the money, and that, if the bank would accept the money, he would be very glad to allow the customer McGuire to buy the mortgage as soon as he found out whether the bank would allow such payment to be made, and whether it could be arranged by defendant so that he could deliver the mortgage to the customer of the plaintiff. As soon as the request was made at the bank, Feigenbaum refused to allow his loan to be paid up and forthwith exercised an option to purchase the mortgage, which option Feigenbaum had as a part of his loan agreement, and the bank forthwith turned over to said Feigenbaum the mortgage in question. The misunderstanding between the parties seems to have arisen from the fact that the loan was negotiated by and at the Citizens' National Trust & Savings Bank, and that the bank continued to hold the mortgage only for Feigenbaum and subject to such rights as Taggart had therein.

The last paragraph of the letter of defendant Taggart, which we have heretofore set out, to wit: "At the present time I have borrowed at my bank against this mortgage and the sale to you is predicated on their allowing me to take the loan up immediately," is not necessarily in conflict with this explanation of the fact, and it is not in conflict with the statement made by Mr. Taggart as testified to by Mr. McGuire, the prospective purchaser furnished by plaintiff herein.

There was sufficient evidence for the trial court to make its finding in favor of the defendant, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

LOS ANGELES PRINTING CO. et al. v. LOS ANGELES ROUND-UP et al. (GANAWAY, Intervener). (Civ. 7096.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 9, 1929.

Appeal and error $\Rightarrow$ 151(6)—Labor claimant, who failed to file claim in attachment suit or intervene, was not aggrieved and could not appeal from stipulated judgment (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1206, 1207).

In attachment suit in which labor claimants filed claims with sheriff under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1206, 1207, and judgment was entered by stipulation, labor claimant, who was not shown to have joined in claim under statute or to have received funds in sheriff's hands, and who failed to intervene in action but merely filed notice of motion for intervention, was not an aggrieved party, and therefore could not appeal from the judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by the Los Angeles Printing Company and another against the Los Angeles Round-Up and others, in which George H. Ganaway filed notice of motion for intervention. From the judgment George H. Ganaway appeals. Appeal dismissed.

George H. Ganaway, in pro. per.

Fredericks, Hanna & Morton, of Los Angeles, for respondents Los Angeles Round-Up and others.

KOFORD, P. J. Several parties plaintiff filed attachment suits against defendants and levied attachments. Various labor claimants came forward, claiming a preference upon the property and funds attached. Thereafter a judgment was entered pursuant to stipulation. The stipulation was signed by the attorneys for the several parties plaintiff and by the attorneys for the defendants and also by a firm of attorneys who the stipulation said represented at that time all of the labor claimants who had filed claims with the sheriff pursuant to sections 1206 and 1207 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The stipulation provided the judgment might be entered for the plaintiffs as prayed in their several complaints and that upon execution being issued the sheriff would pay out of the moneys in his hands $2,791.14 as full satisfaction of all labor claims and that the balance should be applied in satisfaction of the plaintiffs' judgments. A judgment was made by the court upon reading and filing this stipulation on the 15th day of April, 1926.

Thereafter the appellant herein, George H. Ganaway, a labor claimant, gave notice of a motion to vacate said judgment. The said motion was apparently denied by the court, although the clerk's transcript does not show such a minute order. The said George H. Ganaway thereupon filed a notice of appeal to the Supreme Court from the judgment rendered in said action and from the whole thereof and stated that said judgment appealed from was entered on the 15th day of April, 1926.

It is the claim of respondent, in answer to appellant herein, that the said appellant is not a party to said action, is not aggrieved, and cannot prosecute the appeal from the said judgment. Our examination of the record, which is a clerk's transcript, shows that said Ganaway, in propria persona, filed a notice of motion for intervention November 10, 1925, and that the court upon the same day granted the said motion for leave to intervene in the said actions. No complaint in intervention was filed by him and nothing further was done until he made the motion to vacate the stipulated judgment. The record fails to show whether or not the said Ganaway filed a claim with the sheriff under sections 1206 and 1207 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Furthermore, it does not appear whether, if he filed such a claim, he was represented by the attorneys joining in the stipulation for the judgment. Neither does it appear whether he received his pro rata share of the fund in the hands of the sheriff which was distributed amongst the labor claimants. The record is therefore insufficient to show whether or not the said Ganaway has any cause for complaint in this proceeding.

The said appellant, never having intervened in the action and not being a party to the action, is not aggrieved by the judgment which was entered by stipulation. If he was not a party to the stipulation, he is neither bound by the judgment nor is he aggrieved thereby in any way which entitles him to appeal. If he were a party to the stipulation, of course, he would have no complaint whatever under the other facts appearing in the record. It is therefore ordered that the said appeal be and the same is hereby dismissed.

PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO. v. PETROLEUM MIDWAY CO., Limited. (Civ. 5595.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 7, 1929.

Carriers ⇨ 196—Evidence, in action to recover demurrage, supported finding that cars were held in order to permit railroad to determine applicable tariff rates.

Evidence, in railroad's action to recover demurrage charges, held to support finding that cars were not held in storage yard for consignee's order, but were held in order to permit railroad to determine matter of tariff rates applicable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Electric Railway Company against the Petroleum Midway Company, Limited. Judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Karr, C. W. Cornell, and R. E. Wedekind, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Morgrage & Stanley and R. K. Barrows, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. Appeal by plaintiff, Pacific Electric Railway Company, from a judgment for the defendant Petroleum Midway Company, Limited, in an action brought to recover judgment for $657 claimed by plaintiff as owing from defendant for demurrage charges on certain carloads of freight consigned to the defendant.

The record fairly justifies the following brief statement of the material facts necessary to a consideration of the legal question which, in our opinion, is determinative of this appeal.

Plaintiff and appellant is a public carrier with tracks located in and about Wilmington, Cal. The defendant and respondent operates an oil refinery at Wilmington. During the month of June, 1923, an ocean freighter carrying a consignment of manufactured steel for respondent, instead of docking at its usual wharf at San Pedro, where the respondent expected to receive the steel, unloaded its cargo at East San Pedro, and delivered to the Union Pacific Railroad Company the steel in question to be delivered over its rails to respondent at Wilmington. It required 32 cars to carry the steel, these cars being loaded and delivered in lots of 6 to 8 cars at a time. The Union Pacific moved the cars over its tracks to Wilmington, where it delivered the cars to appellant's tracks for delivery by it to respondent. Upon receipt of the cars on appellant's track, Mann, appellant's agent at Wilmington, caused them to be placed in the general storage yards, because appellant's published tariff provided no rates for spotting cars received under the conditions affecting these cars on its public unloading track. Thereupon, Mann telephoned to A. P. Lee, traffic manager for respondent, advising him that appellant had these cars of steel for delivery to respondent in its general storage yards, and that he could not spot them on its public unloading track because of the tariff difficulty. Lee protested the fact that the steel was in the hands of the railroad company, pointing out that under respondent's orders the steel was to be delivered to it by the steamship company at a wharf at San Pedro. In this conversation, it was suggested by Mann that the tariff difficulty might be avoided if permission were obtained from some utility having a private side track connected with appellant's track to place the cars of steel on such side track for unloading. The conversation ended without any determination of the question as to where the cars were to be spotted but with a definite declaration by Mann that before the cars could be spotted on appellant's public unloading track as requested by Lee, permission would have to be secured from the traffic department of appellant at Los Angeles.

Appellant contends that the result of the conversation was that Lee would take the necessary steps to solve the problem, either by securing permission from some private interest to use its side track, or secure a ruling from the traffic department of appellant at Los Angeles that would enable the placing of the cars on appellant's public unloading track.

Respondent contends that the result of the conversation was that the matter of determining when and where the cars would be spotted was left entirely to appellant.

The testimony as shown by the record relating to the conversation in question does not indicate clearly what, if any, agreement was reached concerning the matter. However, it appears that P. H. Mann, appellant's agent at Wilmington, while on the witness stand was asked the following question and gave the answer which follows:

"Q. As I understand, the reasons why these cars were not switched immediately onto the switch track was that you had no tariff to permit you to receive a car from another line and put it on your particular delivery track? A. That is right."

It appears that in due course the traffic department of appellant decided that the cars in question could be spotted on its public unloading track, and a charge of $2.50 per car made therefor. This was agreed to by respondent and the cars were so placed. The cars were promptly unloaded by respondent after they were placed on the unloading track.

The controversy here arises over the question as to whether or not the appellant is entitled to collect demurrage charges on the cars during the time they lay in its general storage yards awaiting determination of the question as to where they were to be placed for unloading.

The appellant's published tariff regulations contained the following rules relating to the matter under consideration:

"Rule 1: Section A: 'Cars * * * held for or by consignors or consignees for loading, unloading, forwarding direction or for any other purposes * * * are subject to these demurrage rules.'

"Rule 3: Section B-1: 'On cars held for orders * * * whether such cars have been placed in position to unload or not, time will be computed from the first 7:00 a. m. after the day on which notice of arrival is sent or given to the consignee or party entitled to receive the same.'

"Rule 2: Section A: 'Forty-eight hours' (two days) free time will be allowed for loading or unloading all commodities.'

"Rule 7: Section A: '* * * After the expiration of free time allowed, the following charges per car per day, or fraction of a day, will be made until car is released:

"For each of the first four days, $2.00.
"For each succeeding day, $5.00."

It is appellant's contention that a "constructive placement" was made of the cars when they were placed in its general storage yards and respondent notified of their arrival. This contention has for its basis the assumption that after the conversation between Mann and Lee the cars were held by appellant "for orders" from respondent, and rule 3 of appellant's tariff regulations is pointed out as applying to the situation.

Respondent contends that the record does not support appellant's position that the cars were held awaiting respondent's orders, but that the delay was entirely due to appellant's difficulty in determining what placement it could make of the cars under its tariff regulations.

The court found that: "Defendant did not detain or retain any of said cars in excess of the forty-eight hours free time allowed by said tariff, but on the contrary unloaded each and every one of said cars promptly upon the delivery thereof to it and redelivered and released the same to plaintiff within said forty-eight hour period."

We are of the opinion that respondent's contention must be sustained, for the reason that there is abundant evidence in the record to support the conclusion that the cars in question were not held by appellant in its storage yard for respondent's orders, but were held for appellant to determine the matter of tariff rates applicable. With this conclusion, it readily follows that the finding complained of is supported by the evidence and that the judgment finds support both in the evidence and in law.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BABA. (Cr. 1543.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 8, 1929.

1. Criminal law $\S$ 511(2)—Evidence corroborating accomplice's testimony is sufficient if it tends to connect defendant with commission of crime charged (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1111).

While testimony of an accomplice must be corroborated by other evidence tending to connect defendant with commission of the offense, under Pen. Code, $\S$ 1111, such corroborating evidence need not extend to all the elements of the offense, but is sufficient if it tends to connect defendant with commission of crime charged; weight of such evidence being for jury.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 511(4)—Defendant's explanation of circumstances of forgery, testimony respecting his business relations with accomplice, and evidence of his misrepresentations in cashing check, corroborated accomplice's testimony (Pen. Code, $\S\S$ 470, 1111).

In prosecution for forgery of check drawn by codefendant, under Pen. Code, $\S$ 470, defendant's attempted explanation of circumstances under which check was made, his testimony respecting his business relations with codefendant, with evidence of misrepresentations at time check was cashed, corroborated testimony of accomplice with respect to defendant's guilty knowledge, within requirement of Pen. Code, $\S$ 1111.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 370—Other false checks drawn by defendant and codefendant about time of forgery complained of were admissible to show guilty knowledge (Pen. Code, $\S$ 470).

In prosecution under Pen. Code, $\S$ 470, for forging and uttering check, other false checks drawn by defendant and codefendant about the time of the forgery complained of were admissible for purpose of showing guilty knowledge or intent.

4. Forgery $\S$ 44($\frac{1}{2}$)—Evidence held sufficient to support conviction for forgery (Pen. Code, $\S$ 470).

In prosecution under Pen. Code, $\S$ 470, for forging check and knowingly uttering and passing the same as genuine, evidence, including proof of other false checks drawn about the same time, held sufficient to support conviction.

5. Forgery $\Rightarrow$ 48—In prosecution for forgery by aiding another in false drawing of check and by utterance thereof, instruction calling attention to statute making signing of another's name to check without authority forgery held not error (Pen. Code, §§ 31, 470).

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 470, for forgery, it was not error for the court to call the attention of the jury to that portion of the statute providing that one signing another's name to check without authority is forgery, where the evidence sufficiently showed that defendant aided and abetted his codefendant in affixing forged name; defendant being principal under Pen. Code, §§ 31, 470, whether he aided in drawing check or uttered it as genuine with knowledge of forgery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Homer R. Spence, Judge.

Malcolm Baba was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Leo A. Sullivan, of Oakland, and W. H. Older, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel B. Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. Appellant was charged by an information filed in the superior court of Alameda county with the violation of section 470 of the Penal Code, it being alleged that he, with one Elbert Pimental, forged a certain check, and knowingly uttered and passed the same as genuine. He was found guilty, and has appealed from the judgment of conviction and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

As grounds for the appeal it is contended that the evidence was insufficient to establish an intent to defraud, and also that the court failed to instruct the jury as to matters material to the defense.

The check in question purported to have been drawn by Manuel Pimental, whose name was signed thereto by Elbert Pimental. The date, amount of the check, and appellant's name as payee were written thereon by the latter, who indorsed the instrument and procured it to be cashed. The evidence shows that the name of Manuel Pimental, who is the father of Elbert Pimental, was attached to the check without authority, and the latter testified that appellant knew the fact and was the moving spirit of the transaction. It was also shown that other false checks were drawn by appellant and his codefendant about the same time.

[1-4] While a conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense (Pen. Code, § 1111), such corroborating evidence need not extend to all the elements of the offense (People v. Jones, 87 Cal. App. 482, 490, 262 P. 361), and it is sufficient if it tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime charged; its weight being a question for the jury (People v. Barker, 114 Cal. 617, 46 P. 601). Here appellant's attempted explanation of the circumstances under which the check was made, his testimony respecting his business relations with his codefendant, together with evidence of misrepresentations at the time the check was cashed, strongly tended to prove his knowledge of the falsity of the check, and in this respect corroborated the testimony of his accomplice. Moreover, the other checks mentioned were admissible for the purpose of showing guilty knowledge or intent (People v. McGlade, 139 Cal. 66, 72 P. 600; People v. Hansen, 62 Cal. App. 105, 216 P. 399; People v. Lucas, 67 Cal. App. 452, 227 P. 709), and, with the other evidence sufficiently supported the conclusion of the jury on that issue.

[5] Appellant complains that the court in its instructions improperly called attention to that portion of section 470 of the Penal Code which provides that "every person who, with intent to defraud, signs the name of another person, * * * knowing that he has no authority so to do, to, * * * check * * * is guilty of forgery." While it is conceded that appellant did not sign the name of the purported drawer to the check, the evidence sufficiently shows he aided and abetted his codefendant in affixing the forged name thereto, and, under section 31 of the Penal Code, he was a principal to the forgery, whether the same was accomplished by the above method or by uttering, publishing, or passing such instrument as true and genuine, knowing the same to be forged; the latter acts being also denominated forgery by the section first mentioned.

The jury was fully and fairly instructed as to the law of the case, and a review of the record convinces us that its findings are supported and that no error occurred in the proceedings which reasonably sustains the conclusion that the result was a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and order appealed from are accordingly affirmed.

HARE v. CANFIELD. (Civ. 6261.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2. California. Nov. 20, 1929.

1. Automobiles ⇨245(72)—Contributory negligence of pedestrian, struck by automobile while on crosswalk after passing safety zone, when car was 100 feet away, held for jury.

Contributory negligence of pedestrian on diagonal crosswalk about 18 inches from curb opposite public house of worship when struck by automobile, which was apparently 250 or 300 feet away when she first saw headlights and in middle of street about 100 feet distant when she reached safety zone 11 feet 4 inches from curb, held for jury.

2. Negligence ⇨136(9)—Contributory negligence is law question only when evidence compels such inference.

Contributory negligence is a question of law only when the evidence compels one inference, that is, plaintiff's negligence.

3. Appeal and error ⇨203(3)—Physician's qualifications to testify as to nurses' average charges and reasonableness of charges made need not be considered on appeal, in absence of appropriate objection and evidence below.

Where no objection was interposed in court below to physician's testimony as to average charge for outside nurse, on ground that he did not qualify as expert on question of usual charges by practical nurses, and there was no showing that nurse employed to care for plaintiff was not a professional nurse, such witness' qualifications and reasonableness of nurse's charges need not be considered on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Action by Nellie Hare against M. E. Canfield. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Kidd, Schell & Delamer, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Harry D. Parker, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J., Acting P. J. The respondent was injured by appellant's automobile while attempting to walk across a public street in the city of Los Angeles, and this is an appeal from a judgment rendered in her favor, holding that respondent was negligent, and rejecting a plea of contributory negligence.

Appellant concedes that the determination of the question here presented must be governed by the evidence given on behalf of the respondent. It is also agreed that respondent walked from her automobile on the westerly side of Glendale boulevard, to the safety zone, on the easterly side thereof, and that appellant was driving in a northerly direction upon said thoroughfare. Respondent testified that she first saw appellant's headlights when he appeared to be 250 or 300 feet away; that as she reached the middle of the street it was about 200 feet from her, and that it was in the middle of the street and about 100 feet distant when she arrived at the safety zone which a diagram indicated as being 11 feet 4 inches from the easterly curb. It appears that, as she approached within about 18 inches of the curb, appellant struck her with his machine.

[1, 2] It is argued that respondent, seeing the automobile at a distance upon a busy street, should have anticipated danger, that there is an easterly curve at the point of contact, and that it was negligence upon her part in attempting to cross after observing the lights of the approaching car. She testified, however, that she did not know the speed of the machine, that she was in the diagonal crosswalk provided for pedestrians, and that she watched the automobile nearly all of the time until she neared the easterly safety zone. The trial court may well have concluded that respondent was justified in anticipating that one approaching from far down the street, with headlights, would be alert for pedestrians upon a crosswalk. It is admitted that the accident occurred in front of a public house of worship where pedestrian and vehicular traffic might at any time be heavily congested, and a photograph which was introduced in evidence shows that the curve in the street, which appellant stresses, is not such as to obstruct the view of drivers. Reliance is attempted to be placed upon Lord v. Stacy, 68 Cal. App. 517, 229 P. 874, wherein a pedestrian was struck by an automobile whose lights she first saw when stepping from the curb. The distinction is obvious. The rule of ordinary care with which pedestrians are charged in such cases, and to which the appellant here assiduously adheres, cannot be invoked to the exclusion of other considerations. Resolving all intendments in favor of the judgment, and in view of appellant's admission that he did not see the respondent in full view of his lights nor know of her presence in the street until he felt the impact, we do not deem it necessary to further discuss the evidence in this respect, nor do we think the court erred. Minor v. Foote (Cal. App.) 280 P. 197. Contributory negligence is a question of law only when the evidence in a given case compels one inference, that is, the negligence of the plaintiff. Power v. Crown Stage Co., 82 Cal. App. 660, 256 P. 457.

[3] The only other contention of appellant is that the trial court allowed excessive damages for nursing and caring for the respondent. It appears that she remained for a period of about three months at the home of a Mrs. Richardson, who, it is argued, was not a professional nurse. The attending physician testified that the average charge for an outside nurse is "around $40 a week, when they give them nursing, care and board." For aught that the record may reveal, Mrs. Richardson may have been a professional nurse. We are unable to find in her testimony or that of the doctor that she was not. It is also objected that this evidence was incompetent and irrelevant for the reason that the doctor did not qualify as an expert upon the question of usual charges when practical nurses are employed. No objection was interposed in the court below as to the evidence offered in these respects, and we are not called upon to consider the qualifications of the witness nor the reasonable character of the charges presented for the first time upon appeal.

102 Cal. App. 2d

Ex parte HUEWITT. (Cr. 1095.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 15, 1929.

1. Criminal law $\S$ 258(2)—Language of memorandum of judgment, reciting that defendant should be punished by \$400 fine or six months in jail, held sufficient compliance with statute (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1446).

Language of memorandum of judgment entered in justice's docket, reciting that defendant should be punished by "Fine of four hundred dollars or serve term of six months in county jail of county of H.," held sufficient compliance with Pen. Code, $\S$ 1446.

2. Fines $\S$ 12—Where justice court had jurisdiction of offense of possessing liquor, statute providing defendant may be imprisoned until fine be satisfied at rate of \$1 per day prevails (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1446).

Where justice court had jurisdiction of offense of possessing intoxicating liquor, Pen. Code, $\S$ 1446, providing that judgment that defendant pay fine may also direct that he be imprisoned until fine be satisfied in proportion of one day's imprisonment for every dollar of fine, prevails.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 258(4)—Language of justice's court docket memorandum of judgment for possessing liquor was not controlling and could be amended.

Language of justice's docket memorandum of judgment in prosecution for possessing liquor was not controlling, and docket could be amended by justice to conform to judgment as it was actually rendered.

4. Fines $\S$ 12—Justice's judgment for possessing liquor imposing fine of \$400 or imprisonment of one day for each dollar, but not exceeding six months, held valid (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1446).

In prosecution in justice's court for possessing intoxicating liquor, judgment in effect ordering that defendant be fined \$400, or in event of failure to pay fine that he be imprisoned in county jail for one day for each unpaid dollar of fine, provided, however, that term of imprisonment was not to exceed six months' duration, held valid judgment which neither violated the provisions of Pen. Code, $\S$ 1446, nor exceeded maximum penalty for the offense described by statute.

5. Fines $\S$ 12—That statute provided no penalty of imprisonment for offense did not preclude commitment to jail for nonpayment of fine (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1446).

That statute provided no penalty of imprisonment for first offense of possessing liquor did not preclude court from committing prisoner to jail, as provided by Pen. Code, $\S$ 1446, for nonpayment of fine which court was authorized to impose.

6. Fines $\S$ 12—In justice court, no limitation of term of imprisonment for possessing liquor as means of enforcing fine exists, except that it may not exceed one day for each dollar (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1446).

In justice court, no limitation of term of imprisonment for possessing liquor as means of enforcing fine exists, except that it may not exceed one day for each dollar of fine under Pen. Code, $\S$ 1446.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 260(11)—Defendant could not complain of discretion exercised in his favor in limiting imprisonment for nonpayment of fine (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1446).

Defendant could not complain of discretion which court exercised in his favor of limiting imprisonment for nonpayment of \$400 fine to 180 days, where maximum term of 400 days was permissible under Pen. Code, $\S$ 1446.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 1213, 1214—Judgment for possessing liquor imposing fine of \$400 or imprisonment for nonpayment, but not exceeding six months, did not violate constitutional inhibition against excessive fines or cruel punishment (Const. art. 1, $\S$ 6).

Judgment of justice of the peace, in prosecution for possessing liquor, imposing fine of \$400 or imprisonment, but not exceeding six months, in county jail, for nonpayment of fine, in proportion of one day's imprisonment for every dollar of fine, held not to violate Const. art. 1, $\S$ 6, prohibiting excessive fine or cruel and unusual punishment.

9. Fines $\S$ 12—Imprisonment for nonpayment of fine is not distinct punishment (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1446).

Imprisonment for nonpayment of fine under Pen. Code, $\S$ 1446, is not distinct punishment, but is merely a means of enforcing payment of fine.

Application by C. Huewitt for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied.

Henry L. Ford, of Eureka, for petitioner.

S. E. Metzler, Dist. Atty., and A. G. Bradford, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Eureka, for respondent.

ROLFE L. THOMPSON, J. This is a petition for a writ of habeas corpus.

The petitioner was held upon two charges. Since the filing of this petition the second complaint was dismissed. We have to consider only the first proceeding.

The petitioner was charged in the justice's court of Eureka township, Humboldt county, with the offense of having possession of intoxicating liquor. To this accusation he pleaded guilty and was sentenced to pay a fine of $400, for the nonpayment of which he was committed to the county jail one day for every unpaid dollar thereof. The memorandum of this judgment, which was entered in the justice's docket, recited that the defendant should be punished by "a fine of four hundred dollars, or serve a term of six months in the county jail of the county of Humboldt." From the stipulation of facts which was filed in this proceeding, it appears that the judgment and order of commitment, which were actually made and signed by the justice, provided that the defendant should "pay a fine of four hundred dollars, and in case said fine be not paid that * * * (he) be imprisoned in the county jail of the county of Humboldt, State of California, until the fine be duly satisfied, in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for every dollar of the fine but not to exceed in all six months."

It is contended this judgment is void as to the provision imposing the sentence of imprisonment for the reason that the statute authorizes no penalty of imprisonment for the first offense, and because the docket entry of the judgment does not conform to the provisions of section 1446 of the Penal Code.

[1, 2] The language of the memorandum which was entered in the docket might well have been more specific, but this precise form has been repeatedly upheld as a sufficient compliance with the statute. In re Glavich, 74 Cal. App. 144, 239 P. 707, 708; In re Riley, 142 Cal. 124, 75 P. 665; In re Cohen, 198 Cal. 221, 225, 244 P. 359; People v. Magoni, 73 Cal. App. 78, 82, 238 P. 112. In the Glavich Case, supra, the judgment provided that "the defendant, * * * pay a fine of $500 or [that he] be imprisoned in the county jail for 500 days." In the Riley Case, supra, the language of the judgment was that the defendant "pay a fine of $30, or * * * serve 15 days in the county jail." These judgments were sustained on the assumption that where the intention of the court is clear and the sentence which is prescribed is within the law, the statute will be deemed to be a part of the judgment for the purpose of fixing the rate of credit to which the prisoner is entitled in serving his term of imprisonment. When the superior court has jurisdiction of the cause, section 1205 of the Penal Code applies in fixing the rate of credit and the maximum term of imprisonment. When the justices' or police courts have jurisdiction of the offense, section 1446 of the Penal Code prevails. This section provides that: "A judgment that the defendant pay a fine may also direct that he be imprisoned until the fine be satisfied, in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for every dollar of the fine."

Under this section the ratio of imprisonment is definitely fixed at one day for each dollar of the fine. The statute prescribes no limitation of the maximum term of imprisonment as a means of satisfying a fine which is applicable to inferior courts. In this regard, it has been held there is a clear distinction between the provisions of section 1205 of the Penal Code, which is applicable to the superior court alone, and section 1446 of the same Code, which governs the ratio of imprisonment for the payment of a fine imposed by an inferior court. In re Kennerly, 190 Cal. 774, 214 P. 857.

[3-7] The language of the justice's docket memorandum of judgment was not controlling. This docket entry may be amended by the justice to conform to the judgment as it was actually rendered. In re Glavich, 74 Cal. App. 144, 239 P. 707. The judgment which was actually rendered and signed by the justice in the present case, in effect, ordered that the defendant be fined $400, or in the event of a failure to pay the same, that he be imprisoned in the county jail one day for each unpaid dollar of the fine, provided, however, that the term of imprisonment was not to exceed six months' duration. This was a valid judgment which neither violated the provisions of section 1446 of the Penal Code nor exceeded the maximum penalty for this offense which is prescribed by statute. In re Glavich, 196 Cal. 723, 239 P. 708. It does not appear from the record whether the defendant was charged with a first or subsequent offense. Assuming that it was his first offense, he was subject to a fine of $500 or imprisonment one day for every one dollar thereof. For the first offense of this nature the statute provides for no penalty of imprisonment distinct from the authorization to impose a fine. But this omission does not preclude the court from committing the prisoner to jail as provided by law for the nonpayment of the fine which the court is authorized to impose. Ex parte Garrison, 193 Cal. 37, 223 P. 64. When a statute prescribes a maximum penalty of imprisonment for a crime of which the superior court has jurisdiction, the judgment may not exceed the maximum term, even as a means of enforcing the payment of the fine. Section 1205, Penal Code. This limitation of imprisonment to enforce the payment of a fine does not apply to judgments of inferior courts. In re Kennerly, 190 Cal. 774, 214 P. 857. No limitation of the term of imprisonment in the present case, as a means of enforcing the fine exists, except that it may not exceed one day for each dollar of the fine. A maximum term of imprisonment of 400 days to satisfy the fine might have been legally imposed, instead of only 180 days, which the court did fix. The prisoner, however, may not complain of this discretion which was exercised in his favor. When the fine was satisfied by the payment thereof or by service of imprisonment for 180 days, the prisoner would be entitled to his liberty.

[8, 9] There is the further constitutional inhibition against excessive fines or cruel and unusual punishment. Const. of Calif. art. 1, § 6. The present judgment does not violate this constitutional provision. In re Kennerly, supra; People v. Magoni, 73 Cal. App. 78, 238 P. 112. It does not purport to impose a penalty of imprisonment independent of the commitment which is authorized as a means of enforcing the payment of the fine. It has been definitely determined that imprisonment for the nonpayment of a fine is not a distinct punishment, but is merely a means of enforcing the payment of a fine. Ex parte Garrison, 193 Cal. 37, 223 P. 64.

The judgment is therefore valid.

The writ is denied.

JOHN A. ECK CO. v. COACHELLA VALLEY ONION GROWERS' ASS'N. (Civ. 9.)

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California. Nov. 14, 1929.

1. Principal and agent ⇨103(7)—Agreement held to create sales agency, whereby agent was empowered to enter into contract with brokers to dispose of principal's onion crop.

Agreement providing, among other things, that agent agreed to market and sell as agent for onion growers' association onions grown as provided in contract, held to create sales' agency whereby agent was empowered to enter into contract with brokers in that line of business for disposal of association's onion crop.

2. Principal and agent ⇨161(2)—Deviation from stipulated price and time and quantity of shipment specified in agency contract justified principal's repudiation of contract agent made for disposal of onion crop.

Deviation from stipulated price at which onions were to be sold and time and quantity in which onions were to be shipped, specified in contract authorizing agent to enter into contract with brokers to dispose of onions, justified repudiation of contract with broker, when brought to attention of principal.

3. Principal and agent ⇨170(3)—Where agent made unauthorized contract March 12, principal, repudiating contract on April 23d on learning of unauthorized terms, did not ratify unauthorized acts, and was not estopped.

Where agent having authority to make contract for disposal of onions grown by onion growers' association made contract with brokers containing unauthorized terms on March 12 and 14, 1923, and association had no knowledge of unauthorized terms of contract until April 23, 1923, when it repudiated contracts and refused to perform under them, association did not ratify unauthorized acts of agent, and was not estopped from disputing agent's authority.

4. Principal and agent ⇨177(2)—Agent's knowledge of provisions of contract entered into by him beyond scope of employment could not be imputed to principal.

Where agent having authority to execute contracts for disposal of onions grown by onion growers' association on terms specified entered into contract with brokers containing provisions beyond scope of his employment, agent's knowledge of such provisions could not be imputed to association.

5. Principal and agent ⇨173(3)—Evidence supported finding that sales contracts executed by agent containing unauthorized provisions were not contracts of principal.

In action for breach of contract for sale of onions, court's finding that contracts sued on which had been executed by defendant's agent, and which contained unauthorized provisions, were not contracts of defendant, held supported by evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; William H. Ellis, Judge.

Action for damages for loss of profits arising from breach of contract, by the John A. Eck Company against the Coachella Valley Onion Growers' Association. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hickcox & Thomson, of Los Angeles, and A. Heber Winder, of Riverside, for appellant.

H. L. Carnahan, Harry Povey, and Walter S. Barrette, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, P. J. This action was brought by the appellant, an Illinois corporation, engaged in a general fruit and brokerage business, against the defendant, a corporation organized under the laws of California, and engaged in the production of onions in the county of Riverside, state of California.

The action was brought to recover from the defendant damages for alleged loss of profits arising from breach of contracts purported to have been entered into between the plaintiff and defendant corporation. The appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendant, and denying plaintiff the relief asked for.

The alleged contracts in question purport to have been entered into with the plaintiff by one W. L. Benchley, doing business under the name of Benchley Fruit Company, in behalf of, and as the alleged authorized agent of defendant company. The whole controversy rests upon the authority of Benchley to obligate the defendant by these contracts. The agency, if it existed, was created by the following agreement:

"Coachella Valley Onion Growers Association—Benchley Fruit Company.

"This agreement, made and entered into this 3rd day of March, 1923, by and between the Coachella Valley Onion Growers Association, a corporation duly organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, with its principal place of business in Coachella, County of Riverside, State of California, said association hereinafter called the party of the first part, and The Benchley Fruit Company, with its principal office in the City of Fullerton, California, said company hereinafter called the party of the second part.

"Witnesseth:

"Whereas, the Board of Directors of the Coachella Valley Onion Growers Association on March 2nd, 1923, adopted the following resolution, to-wit:

"Be It Resolved: by the Board of Directors of the Coachella Valley Onion Growers Association, that the association accept the proposition of the Benchley Fruit Company, to-wit: That the Benchley Fruit Company agrees to market and sell as agent for the Coachella Valley Onion Growers Association fifty (50) car loads of No. 1 Yellow Bermuda onions at One and 50/100 ($1.50) Dollars per crate net f. o. b. loading point, Coachella Valley: That Seventy-five (75c) cents per crate is to be deposited with a bank, or banks, in escrow upon the signing of a contract between the Coachella Valley Onion Growers Association and the Benchley Fruit Company and a guarantee of a bank or banks on the balance in the sum of Seventy-five (75c) cents per crate at the time of delivery of said onions f. o. b. loading points in the Coachella Valley: Shipment of said onions to be made at the rate of ten (10) cars per week during the onion season.'

"And whereas, the party of the second part has agreed to carry out the terms of the said resolution,

"Now therefore, the party of the first part having adopted the said resolution at a meeting of the Board of Directors of the Coachella Valley Onion Growers Association held on March 2, 1923, authorizing the entering into a contract with the party of the second part, and authorizing the party of the second part to market the 1923 onion crop of the party of the first part, which said resolution is hereby made a part of this contract, the following supplementary clauses are agreed upon by both parties:

"During the life of this contract the party of the first part agrees to market through the agency of the party of the second part all of the onions produced and controlled by it. If any sales are made otherwise than through the agency of the party of the second part, said second party shall nevertheless be entitled to receive the same charge per crate that would be due if marketed through their agency.

"The party of the first part reserves the right to decide when or in what amounts to ship, and with the exception of cars sold at auction, to decide prior to sale the price that it is willing to accept.

"It is understood that in the shipping, marketing and the distribution of the crop, the party of the second part acts as agent only, and shall not be liable for any transportation charges nor for any loss resulting from the shipping, marketing or distribution of the crop.

"The party of the second part agrees to use its best efforts to sell and dispose of the crop or crops covered by this contract, but it is expressly understood that in so doing it acts as agent only of the party of the first part, and assumes no responsibility or financial liability therefor further than it agrees to turn over to the party of the first part the cash proceeds of all sales as soon as received, retaining their brokerage for their services as hereinafter provided.

"It is further agreed that the party of the first part shall pay all expenses and costs incidental to the harvesting, packing, inspecting, loading and marketing of the crop. Party of the second part shall do all the clerical work connected with the collection of the proceeds, at their own expense. All collection charges and exchange, if any, shall be paid by the party of the first part.

"Party of the second part agrees to place a competent employee at the loading station during the shipping season, at their own expense, to assist in the billing and routing of the cars, and to aid the association in developing membership.

"It is understood and agreed that the party of the second part will refund to the party of the first part Seven ($7.00) Dollars per car out of their Five (5c) cents per crate as hereinafter specified on the Fifty (50) cars sold as in the above resolution provided, said refund to be made at the time remittance is made for the said onions.

"It is understood and agreed that the party of the second part as agents, will purchase for the party of the first part the necessary crates for the packing of said onions, and said party of the second part agrees to guarantee the payment thereof; the party of the second part to retain from the net proceeds of the sale of the first onions delivered, the purchase price of said crates and to render an accounting of the same to the party of the first part, provided however, the party of the second part agrees to allow the party of the first part the necessary harvesting money.

"The party of the second part is hereby authorized to retain from the net proceeds of all sales made by it the sum of five (5) cents per crate, said sum to be their full compensation for the services rendered. The balance of the proceeds to be remitted at once to the party of the first part; provided however, that any indebtedness of the party of the first part to the party of the second part may be deducted from any returns received by it.

"The party of the first part shall have the right at any time to inspect the books and accounts of the party of the second part, in so far as said accounts may relate to the business covered by this contract.

"It is agreed that in so far as possible, the marketing of this crop shall be done through co-operative agencies, such as the Federated Fruit and Vegetable Growers. Coachella Valley Onion Growers Association, Party of the first part, By Ben L. Clary, its president, By Chas. B. Jones, its secretary. Benchley Fruit Company, Party of the second part, By W. L. Benchley, its president."

[1] The foregoing agreement undoubtedly created a sales agency, whereby W. L. Benchley, as the Benchley Fruit Company, was empowered to enter into contracts with the plaintiffs, or other brokers in that line of business, for the disposal of the defendant company's 1923 onion crop. But this agency agreement, while it created the relation of principal and agent, also put its express limitations upon the agent's powers.

As to the first 50 carloads of onions, a sales price of $1.50 per crate net, f. o. b. at loading point, Coachella Valley, is required, with 75 cents per crate of the purchase money to be deposited upon the execution of the agency contract, and a bank guaranty to be given on the remaining 75 cents per crate at the date of delivery of the onions; any subsequent sales are to be made subject to the right of the onion company to decide when and in what amounts to ship, and, with the exception of sales made at auction, to decide prior to the sale the price the onion company was willing to accept.

Under this sales agreement, Benchley proceeded to execute, with the plaintiff corporation, the two contracts in question, which are the basis of this action.

One is of date March 12, 1923, shown in the record as Plaintiff's Exhibit B, wherein it is recited that the Benchley Fruit Company, acting as agent for the Coachella Valley Onion Growers' Association, as party of the first part, contracts to sell to the plaintiff, John A. Eck Company, as party of the second part, 50 carloads of onions, at a guaranteed price of 75 cents per crate, f. o. b. Coachella, Cal., the party of the second part guaranteeing to the party of the first part an average of 75 cents per crate, and that any overage that shall be received on marketing the onions shall be the money of the party of the first part, after deducting 7 per cent. commission on the gross sale of each car. This contract also provides that the shipping dates on the onions shall be from the first shipments from Coachella district, right through the shipping season, at not to exceed a maximum of 5 cars, or less than a minimum of 3 cars per day, weather conditions, crop maturity, and railroad facilities permitting, and that the party of the second part will have free and unrestricted right to sell all these onions through their Chicago office "as they roll," and that they are expected to get the prevailing market price for Coachella Valley onions at the time the sale is made, they, however, to use their own judgment and discretion in making these sales, and are free and are authorized to handle to the best of their judgment and ability.

The second contract, which is of date March 14, 1923, contains the same recitals as to parties as the first, and is for the sale to the plaintiff corporation of an additional 50 carloads of Coachella onions at a guaranteed price averaging 75 cents per crate, and all additional amounts received from the marketing of the onions in excess of 75 cents per crate, after deducting the agreed commission of 7 per cent. to be paid to the party of the first part; the shipping conditions are practically the same in both contracts, commencing with the first shipments from the Coachella district, and continuing it not to exceed a maximum of 5 cars daily, with a minimum of 3 cars per day.

Neither of these contracts is executed in the name of the Coachella Valley Onion Growers' Association, but they are signed, respectively, "Benchley Fruit Company, per W. L. Benchley; John A. Eck Company, per H. A. Eck, Sec'y."

It may be reasonably questioned, under the circumstances of the execution of these two contracts, if they were intended to create an original and primary contractual liability between the Coachella Valley Onion Growers' Association and the John A. Eck Company.

[2] However that may be, it clearly appears that the Benchley Company intended by these contracts to bind its principal, the Coachella Valley Onion Growers' Association, and it is also obvious that each of the agreements contained material provisions, not only in excess of, but in direct violation of, limitations placed on the agent's powers under the sales agency contract. The sales agency agreement expressly stipulates a sales price of $1.50 per crate on the first consignment of 50 carloads of onions, and as to all further sales reserves to the onion company the right to determine in advance the sales price it is willing to accept, and when and in what amounts shipments shall be made.

It further appears from the record that the plaintiff corporation, before or at the time the sales contracts were entered into, had before it the sales agency agreement under which the Benchley Company was purporting to act.

The sales contracts contain a number of provisions with reference to escrows of amounts to be advanced on the purchase price of the onions and other conditions which, while not directly provided for in the agency agreement with the Benchley Company, may be said to come within the incidental and implied authority of an agent, but there can be no question that the deviation from the stipulated price at which the product was to be sold, and the time and quantity in which the onions were to be shipped, unless subsequently ratified by the principal, justified the repudiation of these contracts when brought to the attention of the defendant corporation.

The trial court finds, in effect, that the contracts in question sued on here were not enforceable against defendant.

[3] The only remaining question is as to whether the defendant company, by its conduct subsequent to the execution of these contracts, ratified the unauthorized acts of its agents, or is estopped from disputing the agent's authority.

It is contended by appellant that there was unreasonable and unnecessary delay on the part of the respondent in repudiating the sales contracts made by the Benchley Company. The contracts were executed, respectively, on the 12th and 14th of March, 1923. The respondents repudiated these contracts and refused to perform under them on the 23d day of April, 1923. There is no evidence that respondent had any actual knowledge of the terms and conditions of these contracts prior to that date. There is testimony in the record that on or about March 20, in a telephone conversation between one Webster, connected with the Benchley Company, and a Mr. Kyle, assistant secretary of the defendant company, Kyle was informed that Mr. Benchley had made a very advantageous contract with the plaintiff company. It is not claimed that this was more than a casual conversation, or that any details of the contract were given. Benjamin L. Cleary, president of the defendant corporation, testified that at no time prior to April 23, 1923, had his company received any notice or information concerning the terms of the contracts from either Benchley or the plaintiff. He admits that about the middle of April these contracts were referred to at a meeting of the board of directors, but that the wording was not indicated, and he does not think the name of Eck was mentioned. Charles B. Jones, secretary of the defendant company testified: "We were not informed of contracts until receipt of telegram from plaintiff April 23d, and that no contract with plaintiff was mentioned on April 16th in the conversation between Benchley and the board of directors."

We are satisfied that, up to the time of the repudiation of these contracts with the plaintiff corporation, the defendants were in the possession of no actual knowledge of the terms of the contracts that had been entered into by its agent which indicated unnecessary delay or other elements of estoppel to repudiate liability thereunder.

[4] Was respondent in the possession of such imputed knowledge arising from the fact that the Benchley Company was its agent for effecting a sale of this onion crop as to constitute notice of the contents of the agreements entered into in excess and in violation of the terms of such agency? The general rule is well settled that the knowledge of the agent, in the course of his agency, is the knowledge of the principal, but we are satisfied that this rule will not apply to the provisions of a contract entered into by the agent beyond the scope of his employment.

This limitation is laid down in 1 Cal. Juris. p. 849, § 126, as follows: "Knowledge of the agent is not knowledge of the principal as to matters not within the scope of the agent's authority. Thus, where the agency is special, rather than general, the principal is not bound by the knowledge of the agent as to acts outside the scope of his authority. The doctrine manifestly cannot be maintained that the principal, if he has knowledge of the exercise by the agent of certain powers, is bound by the act of the agent, and that he must be held to have such knowledge from the fact that the agent knows of it himself. Such doctrine would place it within the power of an agent to bind the principal to any course of conduct, however foreign or obnoxious to the authority actually conferred." Westerfeld v. New York Life Insurance Co., 129 Cal. 68 79, 58 P. 92, 61 P. 667; Raleigh v. Lee, 26 Cal. App. 229, 146 P. 696.

The authorities cited by appellant are in support of the doctrine of imputed notice, but no farther than its application to matters within the knowledge of the agent transpiring in the course of his agency. Shamlian v. Wells, 197 Cal. 716, 242 P. 483.

When an actual agency exists and the principal has knowledge that the agent has transcended his authority, the liability of the principal to be held to a ratification of the unauthorized act by acquiescence is much greater than it would be in a case where an utter stranger had assumed to act as agent without authority. But this rule would only apply in case of actual knowledge or notice of the agent's unauthorized act.

Moreover, in this case the evidence discloses that the plaintiff corporation was informed as to the limitations on the power of the Benchley Company to contract, and, with this knowledge in their possession, ordinary prudence and diligence would call for prompt action on their part to obtain some confirmation of the agent's unauthorized acts before relying upon their acceptance by the principal.

[5] The finding of the court that the contracts sued on were not the contracts of the defendant is supported by the evidence. The other findings complained of by the appellant follow necessarily the nonexistence of an enforceable contractual relation.

The judgment is affirmed.

SHAHER et al. v. GREGORY et al.
(Civ. 6770.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 19, 1929.

1. Mortgages ⇨275—Plaintiffs could not claim trust deed under which defendants claimed was presumptively fraudulent, where plaintiffs assumed incumbrance as sole consideration for property.

Plaintiffs were not in position to raise question that deed of trust under which defendants claimed title was presumptively fraudulent, where they assumed obligation existing against property as sole consideration of acquiring it.

2. Mortgages ⇨275—That deeds were renewed after plaintiffs acquired title did not enable them to question validity of lien, where their assumption thereof was sole consideration for property.

Fact that liens were renewed after plaintiffs acquired their title did not enable them to question validity of lien under which defendants claimed, where plaintiffs assumed obligations existing against property as sole consideration of acquiring it.

3. Mortgages ⇨372(1)—Title passing under trustee's sale related back to time original deeds of trust were given as security.

Title which passed to grantee under trustee's sale related back to time original deeds of trust were given to her as security.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Action by W. S. Shafer, as receiver of certain properties held in trust by the National Radio Company, and others, against Jessie S. Gregory and others, in which defendants filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

R. M. F. Soto and J. Clark Benson, both of San Francisco, James H. Boyer, of Oakland (W. E. Cashman, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants.

George M. Naus and Grant & Zimdars, all of San Francisco, for respondent Jessie S. Gregory.

TYLER, P. J. Plaintiffs prosecute this appeal from a judgment quieting the title of respondent Gregory to certain real property.

The action was prosecuted by plaintiffs to remove an alleged cloud on their title to the real property involved, created by a trustee's deed to said Gregory, and to carry into effect a certain judgment in their favor, in an action wherein one Herman Eggers and others were plaintiffs and the National Radio Company, a corporation, was defendant.

[1-3] By their answer defendants denied the title of plaintiffs and the right of possession of plaintiff Shafer as receiver. By a cross-complaint defendant Gregory asserted title in herself. To establish their title to the real property involved plaintiff introduced in evidence the judgment roll in Eggers v. National Radio Company. It is conceded that whatever title plaintiff had to the property in question was based upon such judgment. Respondent Gregory was not a party to the Eggers judgment, nor was she in privity thereto. Her claim of title in and to the property was based upon a certain deed of trust securing notes which existed against the property long prior to the time of its acquisition by plaintiffs, and which deed of trust was foreclosed by sale, at which respondent Gregory became the purchaser. Plaintiffs claimed that the deed of trust under which respondent claims title was presumptively fraudulent, and the burden rested upon her to establish its bona fides. The trial court found, and rightfully so, that plaintiffs were in no position to raise this question, for the reason that they assumed the obligations existing against the property as the sole consideration of acquiring the same. Then, again, the judgment upon which appellants relied was not a final one, and it has since been reversed. Eggers v. National Radio Company (Cal. Sup.) 281 P. 58. Plaintiffs here concede that whatever title they had was based upon such judgment, and that in consequence of its reversal their alleged title has failed. Irrespective and apart from this concession, however, plaintiffs took title to the property in question subject to the incumbrances against the same, and which incumbrances they agreed to pay. This, as we have said, was the sole consideration paid by them. This being so, they were in no position to question the validity of the same. To hold otherwise would be to permit them to acquire the land without paying for it. Nor does the fact that the liens were renewed after plaintiffs acquired their title alter or change the situation. Respondent's claim is a purchase-money claim. The title which passed to her under the trustee's sale related back to the time the original deeds of trust were given to her as security.

We do not deem a further discussion of the case to be necessary. As above pointed out, the sole consideration paid by plaintiffs for the property was the assumption by them of the liens against it, and their agreement to pay the incumbances. Irrespective therefore of whatever rights they may have acquired under the Eggers judgment, and which they here concede to be none, the conclusion of the trial court, from the facts, that plaintiffs or either of them is not the owner or possessed of any interest in and to the real property involved, but that cross-complainant is the owner, finds full support in the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WRIGHT. (Cr. 1094.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 12, 1929.

1. Criminal law § 829(1)—Refusal of instructions covered by instructions given was not error.

Refusal of instructions covered by instructions given was not error.

2. Criminal law § 781(6)—Refusal of instruction that verbal admissions must be viewed with caution held not error.

In prosecution for rape, refusal of requested instruction that verbal admissions are to be viewed with caution held not error.

3. Criminal law § 1137(5)—Defendant cross-examining mother-in-law, developing fact defendant beat her, and cross-examination of defendant's wife showed without objection he had knocked mother-in-law out of house, he could not complain of proof he was imprisoned therefor.

In rape prosecution, where defendant, on cross-examination of defendant's mother-in-law, developed fact that defendant had beaten her up, and on cross-examination of defendant's wife it was shown without objection that he had knocked mother-in-law out of house, admitting proof on cross-examination of defendant's wife that he was imprisoned as punishment therefor held not prejudicial, since it was fact that he beat up woman which probably weighed against him with jury, and, having proved that fact himself, he could not complain of its effect on jury.

4. Rape § 43(2)—In prosecution for rape committed in February, evidence that prosecutrix wore blood-stained bloomers in following April held properly excluded.

In prosecution for rape committed February 24, 1929, in which prosecution introduced evidence of blood-stained bloomers which prosecutrix testified she was wearing at time of offense, defendant's proof that, on or about April 15th following, blood was observed on bloomers which prosecutrix was wearing at that time, and that she then disappeared in the house and returned shortly with bloomers free from blood, held properly excluded.

5. Criminal law § 1159(4)—Where evidence would support verdict for either party, determination of truth was exclusively within province of jury and trial court.

In rape prosecution, where there was ample evidence in record to support verdict for either defendant or the state, determination of where truth lay was exclusively within province of jury and trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Harry W. Falk, Judge.

Floyd Wright was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Superseding opinion in 281 P. 411.

Blaine McGowan, of Eureka, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of rape committed upon a girl of the age of nearly 9 years. He has appealed from the judgment.

The evidence, both direct and indirect, is in substantial and irreconcilable conflict. The testimony of a physician, who examined the girl a few days after the alleged act, is sufficient to show that some person committed the crime. The testimony of the girl, standing alone, is sufficient to show that the defendant committed a forcible rape upon her. It is deemed unnecessary to set out the testimony on account of the character thereof.

[1, 2] Appellant complains of the refusal of the court to give seven instructions requested by him. A careful examination of these proposed instructions and a comparison thereof with instructions given show that, with one exception, all rules of law stated in the proposed instructions were fully set forth in those given. In the excepted case, the instruction requested stated that "verbal admissions are to be viewed with caution." The refusal to so instruct the jury was not error. Hirshfeld v. Dana, 193 Cal. 142, 160, 223 P. 451.

Mrs. James, the defendant's mother-in-law, who is the mother of the prosecutrix, was a witness for the prosecution. She was cross-examined by counsel for the defendant as follows:

"Q. You and your son-in-law don't get along very well together, do you, Mrs. James? A. No sir. Q. Did you ever say that you hated him? A. Yes sir. Q. Did you ever say that you would fix him? A. No. Q. Didn't you ever say, 'I will fix you'? A. No sir. Q. Did you ever say anything like that? A. No sir. Q. Now think. A. Well, I will tell you why I never care for my son-in-law ever since he beat me up. Q. He beat you up? A. Yes sir. Q. That was the time that you spit at him? A. Yes. Q. And that was the time that you said he was no man? A. Yes sir. Q. That was the time you had him arrested wasn't it? A. Yes sir."

The defendant's wife was a witness for him. On direct examination, she testified as follows:

"Q. Have you ever heard your mother say to him (defendant), 'I hate you?' A. Yes. Q. How many times has she said that? A. She has said that most every time I go and visit her. They always get into a quarrel and things like that. * * * Q. Did she ever say to him, 'I will fix you?' A. Yes, she said that once after this other trouble. Q. She said that when? A. She said that after this other trouble."

On cross-examination, she testified as follows relating to the same matters:

"Q. And you say that at one time she said to him, 'I hate you?' A. Yes. Q. And 'I will fix you?' A. Yes. Q. Now you testified that that occurred about the time of the other trouble. Now what other trouble do you mean, Mrs. Wright? A. Well, that is the time they said he knocked her out of the house. * * * Q. Well, didn't he throw her out of the house? A. Not that I saw. I was in bed at the time. Q. You don't know that he plead guilty to that in the justice's court, do you, Mrs. Wright?

"Mr. McGowan: I object to that as improper cross-examination. * * *

"The Court: Objection overruled; go ahead.

"A. No, I did not know he did it. Q. Do you know that he served a term in the county jail for it?

"Mr. McGowan: I object to that as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial and assign the question on the part of the district attorney as misconduct * * *

"The Court: * * * The objection is overruled.

"A. Yes, I do."

[3] It is conceded that the court erred in overruling the objections mentioned. The question then is whether such rulings were prejudicial. Counsel for the defendant, in the cross-examination of Mrs. James, developed the fact that the defendant had beaten her up, and in the cross-examination of the defendant's wife it was shown, without objection, that he had "knocked her (Mrs. James) out of the house." After the defendant had thus proved the commission of the offense, it is highly improbable that his rights were prejudiced by the further proof that he was imprisoned as punishment therefor. It is the fact that he beat up a woman which probably weighed against him with the jury rather than his imprisonment. Having proved that fact himself, he is not in a position to complain of its effect on the jury.

[4] The offense was committed February 24, 1929. The prosecution introduced in evidence blood-stained bloomers which the prosecutrix testified she was wearing at the time of the offense. The defendant attempted to prove that on or about the 15th of the following April blood was observed on bloomers she was wearing at that time, and that she then "disappeared in the house and returned shortly thereafter with bloomers on free from blood." The court sustained objections to such proof. The evidence offered would have had no tendency to prove or disprove any issue in the case.

[5] There is ample evidence in the record to support a verdict for either party. Under such circumstances the determination of where the truth lies is exclusively within the province of the jury and the trial court. The erroneous ruling of the trial court is not deemed a sufficient ground for reversal.

The judgment is affirmed.

BOTHUM v. KREIS et al.
District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 6, 1929.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 2, 1930.

Mechanics' Liens ⇨ 136(2)—Description in lien claim giving wrong street number, omitting number of tract block, and referring to wrong record, was sufficient for identification (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1187, 1203).

Description in claim of lien giving wrong street number, and omitting to give number of tract block, and referring to book of maps instead of to book of miscellaneous records, was nevertheless sufficient for identification within Code of Civ. Proc. § 1187, as enabling a party familiar with locality to identify premises intended to be described with reasonable certainty to exclusion of others, in accordance with test embodied in section 1203.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action to foreclose mechanic's lien by L. J. Bothum against Charles W. Kreis, Isadore Reese, Ida Reese, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the last two named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

D. Howard Painter and Glen Behymer, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Nathan M. Dicker and Sidney Sampson, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. Plaintiff obtained a judgment and decree of foreclosure of a materialman's mechanic lien against the property of the appellants.

The sole contention on appeal is that the plaintiff's claim of lien is invalid because of its many faults of description of the appellants' property against which the lien is claimed.

The appellants' said property is correctly described as follows: Lot 5, block 12, Brooklyn Heights Ganahl tract, as per map thereof recorded in Book 22, p. 17, of miscellaneous records of Los Angeles county, Cal., said premises being known as 2436 Folsom street, Los Angeles, Cal.

The description in the claim of lien gave the street number wrong, omitted to give the number of the tract block, omitted the word Ganahl in the name of the tract, and referred to Book 22 of maps instead of to Book 22 of miscellaneous records. It read as follows: "2546 Folsom street, Los Angeles, California, and which premises claimant is informed and believes to be described as lot five, Brooklyn Heights Tract, as per map thereof recorded in book 22, page 17 of maps, records of Los Angeles County, California."

The other statements required by law to be incorporated in the claim of lien are not said to be in any way lacking.

Appellants claim the lien does not contain a description of the property "sufficient for identification," as is required by the terms of the Code of Civil Procedure, § 1187. Appellants cite several decisions upon the sufficiency of the description, but these decisions were rendered before the adoption of Code of Civil Procedure, § 1203a in 1907 (St. 1907, p. 858). The law of that section was moved into section 1203 in 1911 (St. 1911, p. 1319) and has since remained there. The intent of Code of Civil Procedure, § 1203, is expressed in Ogram v. Welchoff, 40 Cal. App. 301, 180 P. 631, 632, as follows: "Some of the earlier constructions of these sections, although purporting to follow the rule of construction laid down in section 4, Code of Civil Procedure, were still somewhat technical, and the Legislature showed its disapproval of the method followed by adding to the law on the subject section 1203, which directs that certain kinds of mistakes in claims of lien which theretofore had been held sufficient to invalidate them should not be given that effect, thus emphasizing the legislative intent that the greatest liberality consistent with the attainment of the object of the sections should be exercised in their construction." This section, so far as it applies to this case, reads as follows: "No mistake or errors in the statement * * * nor in the description of the property against which the claim is filed, shall invalidate the lien, unless the court finds. * * *" The remainder of the section either does not relate to defects in description or relates to facts which do not enter into this case; but it shows that the legislative intent was that the greatest liberality should be extended towards the other named defects in claims of lien. It reads: "Unless the court finds that such mistake or error in the statement of the demand, credits and offsets, or of the balance due, was made with the intent to defraud, or the court shall find that an innocent third party, without notice, direct or constructive, has since the claim was filed, become the bona fide owner of the property lienied upon, and that the notice of claim was so deficient that it did not put the party upon further inquiry in any manner."

With such liberality as the closing part of the section indicates shall be exercised in favor of the lien as against an innocent third party purchaser, there can be no doubt of the intention to exercise the greatest liberality in favor of the lien as against the owner who is not even mentioned among the two exceptions named in the section following the words "unless the court finds."

The good faith of the attempt to describe the property is not gainsaid, and it cannot be said that the property description in the claim of lien is so deficient as to describe no property at all. That is certain which can be made certain. We cannot say as a matter of law that the defects which admittedly exist in the description are such as not to enable "a party familiar with the locality to identify the premises intended to be described with reasonable certainty to the exclusion of others." Such was said to be the test even before the law now embodied in Code of Civil Procedure, § 1203, was enacted. Willetta S. M. Co. v. Kremer, 94 Cal. 205, 209, 29 P. 633. That section must mean that such a party shall ignore mistakes and errors and make a sincere attempt to ascertain what property is intended to be described. We are unable to say from the record that the word "Ganahl" is an indispensable word in naming the tract map; that there are other blocks in the tract besides block 12, and, if so, that any of them contain a lot 5; that a reference to the recordation of the map was necessary, and, if so, whether the reference to book of maps could lead any one searching in the recorder's office to any other record than that which contained the record of the tract map intended; nor that the erroneous street number designated any actual street number or building on Folsom street. The record of the proceedings in the trial court is very brief, having been made almost entirely by stipulation with respect to this particular claim of lien. It indicates that the parties submitted the case to the court to decide as a question of law whether the claim of lien contained a sufficient description of the appellants' property. We cannot say that the court erred in not holding the claim to be invalid.

The judgment and decree appealed from are therefore affirmed.

1. Fraud ⚡22(1)—One actually relying on representations is not precluded from suing on ground of fraud merely because independent investigation would have shown representations were untrue.

In case one actually relies upon misrepresentations, he is not precluded from maintaining action on ground of fraud merely because, if he had made an independent investigation, he would have ascertained that the representations made were untrue.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⚡85—Owner's acceptance of withdrawal of offer of purchase operated as rescission so as to entitle proposed purchaser to recover deposit with brokers.

Consent of owner of confectionary store to withdrawal of offer of purchase made to selling agents operated as a rescission by mutual consent of contract of purchase and sale so as to entitle proposed purchaser to recover back his deposit, since in no event would brokers be entitled to keep deposit as and for their own property.

3. Money received ⚡6(6)—Action was maintainable against brokers for recovery of deposit by proposed purchaser after rescission of contract by mutual consent.

Action for money had and received was maintainable by proposed purchaser after mutual rescission of contract against brokers with whom he made deposit, and who were holding the money in legal effect as agent of depositor by reason of lack of authority to make a binding contract of sale on behalf of owner.

4. Money received ⚡1—Action for money had and received lies against one in possession of funds payable to plaintiff in equity and good conscience.

An action for money had and received lies against any person who is in possession of funds which in equity and good conscience he should pay to plaintiff.

5. Money received ⚡1—Common count for money received lies for any circumstances requiring money be paid in equity and good conscience, regardless of rights as for fraud.

Common count for money had and received would lie for any set of facts and circumstances existing between parties which required that money held by defendants should be paid to plaintiff in equity and good conscience, regardless of right to judgment for particular fraud alleged in different cause of action.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. Moncur, Judge.

Action by E. H. Anderson against B. Berger and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Reisner & Deming, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. Plaintiff obtained judgment for $1,040, which was the amount of a deposit he made with the defendants when signing and leaving with them a proposal to purchase a confectionery store belonging to T. N. Smiley. The complaint was in three counts. The court made findings in favor of plaintiff on the first and third counts. The first was a common count for money had and received, and the third was based upon rescission for alleged fraudulent misrepresentations. The defendants are real estate brokers, with whom Smiley, the owner of the store, listed it for sale. In doing so he made written representations concerning the character and quality of the store. The brokers' alleged fraud consisted in communicating these representations to plaintiff, thereby inducing him to make the deposit and proposal of purchase. The proposal was signed by plaintiff alone. It read, in substance and effect, I hereby deposit with defendants the sum of $1,040 as part payment of the purchase price of Smiley's confectionery listed by the owner thereof with the defendants as agents for the sale thereof, and I hereby agree to buy said property upon the following terms and conditions. The proposal also said, "As the said agent is negotiating the sale of said personal property only, this offer to purchase * * * shall not be binding on the undersigned, unless the owner thereof will also assign to me the existing lease on said premises," etc. The court found that, on the day the said proposal was executed, plaintiff deposited the said sum with the defendants, "which sum said copartnership agreed to hold for plaintiff until the contract of sale of said confectionery should be executed between said plaintiff and the said Smiley; also until a certain lease on the said premises should be assigned to the plaintiff." After making the deposit, plaintiff became dissatisfied and visited Smiley, the owner, in company with one of the defendants. In the conversation between plaintiff and the owner, plaintiff expressed his dissatisfaction and charged misrepresentation upon the part of the agents. The owner replied to the effect that the plaintiff might do as he pleased, and, if he was dissatisfied, he should feel at liberty to take back from the agents the deposit made and be freed from the proposal. Thereafter plaintiff served notice of rescission upon the defendants and commenced this action against the brokers alone without making Smiley a party defendant. Appellants urge as one point on appeal that the action is against the wrong parties; that it should have been against Smiley instead of these defendants. We find in the record, however, a statement of the trial judge regarding the absence of Smiley as a party defendant. It is: "Smiley is not a necessary party to the action and as the defendants strenuously oppose a reopening of the case for the purpose of bringing in Smiley, I have reached the conclusion that plaintiff's motion for that purpose should be denied."

[1] On this appeal appellants attack practically every finding of fact supporting plaintiff's allegations of fraud. In every point, however, the record presents evidence in support of the findings, as well as the evidence pointed out by appellants which tends to prove contrary to the findings. We have examined the evidence in the record, and find that the findings of fraud made by the court are supported by substantial evidence. The appellants also claim that respondent did not avail himself of the means and opportunities to discover the untruthfulness of the representations made, and that such failure on the part of respondent bars his recovery. It is now settled that, if one actually relies upon misrepresentations, he is not precluded from maintaining an action on the grounds of fraud merely because, if he had made an independent investigation, he would have ascertained that the representations made were untrue. French v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 579, 217 P. 515.

[2] Respondent contends that, irrespective of the charge of fraud, the judgment is supported under the evidence and by the findings which find in favor of the plaintiff upon the common count for money had and received. The evidence relied upon is that which indicates the consent of Smiley, the owner, to the withdrawal of plaintiff from his proposal. This attitude upon the part of the owner would amount to a rescission by mutual consent if a contract of purchase and sale had been executed between plaintiff and Smiley. For like reasons in this case, there never having been an acceptance of plaintiff's proposal of purchase by the owner, the consent of Smiley to the withdrawal of the offer by plaintiff operated in the same way. In either case plaintiff would be entitled to recover back his deposit, since in no event would the brokers be entitled to keep the deposit as and for their own property. They held the deposit either as the agents of the plaintiff or of the owner.

[3, 4] Appellants claim that the action should be confined to one against Smiley, the owner, for the reason that Smiley was not an undisclosed principal. In receiving the deposit from plaintiff, the defendants were holding the money in legal effect as the agent of the depositor. This is so because of the wording of the written proposal and because defendants had no authority to make a binding contract of sale on behalf of Smiley. Lubeck's Investment Co. v. Voris, 68 Cal. App. 653, 229 P. 1025; Gold v. Phelan, 58 Cal. App. 471, 208 P. 1001; Reyntiens v. Treadwell Realty Co., 22 Cal. App. 314, 134 P. 333; Coover v. Cox (Cal. App.) 272 P. 343. The foregoing authorities seem to be directly in point for this case. The authorities cited by appellants to the general proposition that an action may be commenced against the principal on account of the acts of his agent do not go to the length of holding that the agent may not be sued in an action for money had and received where his principal never obtained title to the money nor even claimed it. An action for money had and received lies against any person who is in the possession of funds which in equity and good conscience he should pay to the plaintiff. The weight of authority is to the effect that an agent still holding possession of funds is the one against whom judgment should be given in an action for money had and received. Simmonds v. Long, 80 Kan. 155, 101 P. 1070, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 553; Alexander v. Coyne, 143 Ga. 696, 85 S. E. 831, L. R. A. 1916D, 1041; 41 C. J. 54. See, also, Gray v. Ellis, 164 Cal. 481, 129 P. 791. In Bogart v. Crosby & Van Haren, 80 Cal. 195, 22 P. 84, relied on by appellants, the title to the deposit had passed to the vendor for whom the agents were acting by the acceptance of the proposal made. The agents therefore had ceased to be, if ever they were in that case, agents of the vendee with respect to the deposit. Had Smiley been made a party defendant together with the brokers in this action for money had and received, it could scarcely be contended that judgment should go against Smiley and not against the brokers, as the evidence shows that the money is still in the hands of the brokers under conditions which do not entitle Smiley to receive it nor the brokers to retain it.

[5] There is no merit in the contention that plaintiff may have judgment on the common count in this action only in the event that he is also entitled to judgment for the particular fraud alleged in this third cause of action. The common count for money had and received will lie for any set of facts and circumstances existing between the parties to this action which require that the money held by defendants should be paid to the plaintiff in equity and good conscience. It is supported by evidence of a mutual rescission or by evidence of an unaccepted proposal, as well as by evidence of a rescission for fraud.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by the Zurich General Accident & Liability Insurance Company, Limited, against the Metropolitan Casualty Insurance Company of New York. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lawler & Degnan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Leonard E. Thomas, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff had judgment in the court below upon an undertaking given by defendant to release an attachment, and defendant appeals.

Appellant's sole point upon appeal is that the writ of attachment to release which the undertaking was given was a nullity because, it is claimed, the clerk who issued the writ did not receive an affidavit prior to the issuance of the writ of attachment as required by section 538 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] Appellant contends, and we think correctly, that the provision of section 538 that "the clerk of the court must issue the writ of attachment upon receiving an affidavit" is equivalent to a provision for filing the affidavit with the clerk. This construction is in accordance with the long-settled practice and comports with common sense.

The original affidavit, according to the testimony, was never marked with the file stamp by the clerk or placed by him in the file of papers in the case. Instead a carbon copy of the affidavit, unexecuted, was found regularly stamped, among the papers in the clerk's office. An original affidavit was produced in court without the filing stamp of the clerk. As to this affidavit Mr. Mayo Thomas, called as a witness for respondent, testified that he was the attorney who procured the issuance of the writ of attachment, and that before the writ was issued he presented to the clerk for filing this original affidavit together with the other necessary papers, and that the clerk "looked it over and the other papers in the case and kept what papers he desired to file. He issued the writ and gave the writ with the other papers back to me."

[2] The court found that prior to the issuance of the writ of attachment "the said plaintiff delivered to and filed with the clerk of the Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles * * * and the aforesaid clerk * * * received from the said plaintiff an affidavit for attachment. * * *"

Under the authorities, we are satisfied that this finding is supported by the evidence of Mr. Thomas above summarized. In view of its clear applicability it is only necessary to cite Estate of Carroll, 190 Cal. 105, 210 P. 817. In that case pursuant to an order of the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District a written release was mailed to the clerk of that court for filing. Through a misconception of the effect of the court's order the clerk mailed the document back to the attorney, with direction to file it in the superior court. In its opinion in Estate of Carroll, supra, the Supreme Court, after holding that the release should have been filed with the District Court of Appeal, said at page 111 of 190 Cal., 210 P. 819: "All of the circumstances attending the forwarding of the release to the clerk of the appellate court indicate that it was the intention of the counsel for plaintiffs to have the release filed with the records of the appellate court, and a paper is filed of record, in contemplation of law, when it is delivered to the proper official, with the intention that it shall become part of an official record, and the filing thus made is not impaired by the clerk's failure or refusal, without good cause, to receive and record the same as filed in the records of his office."

[3] Appellant complains of a finding that the clerk "through mistake and inadvertence, and without the knowledge of the plaintiff herein, returned and handed back to the plaintiff the original affidavit." While there is no direct evidence to support this finding, we think that it was an inference that might properly be drawn from the evidence before the court. In any event, this finding is not necessary to support the judgment and hence, even if erroneous, would not justify a reversal.

Judgment affirmed.

Rush & Beirne, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

George S. Hupp, Ben F. Gray, and James S. Jarrott, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. Plaintiff recovered judgment for damages in this action for fraud and deceit practiced upon him by the defendants inducing him to buy twenty-five cemetery lots (called sections) for speculation at the price of $165 per lot. The measure of damages applied by the court was the difference in actual value of the property at the time this action was commenced and what it would have been worth at that time had the defendants' false representations been true and had the fraudulent promises been performed. No question is raised as to the measure of damage applied, and no question is, or was, made as to the sufficiency of the evidence to show that the property would have been worth at least $165 per lot at the time suit was commenced if the representations and promises had been true and performed. In fact, this was a stipulated fact at the trial. Appellants' sole point upon this appeal is that there was no substantial evidence to support the court's finding that the actual value of the lots at the time suit was commenced was but $10, making the total damage awarded plaintiff $155 for each of the twenty-five lots.

Upon this question the defendants produced several witnesses who fixed the actual value at $300 or $400 per lot as against the sole testimony of the plaintiff who fixed it at $10. It is claimed that plaintiff did not show himself sufficiently qualified as an expert on the question to justify the court in admitting in evidence his testimony on value and in finding accordingly.

This point on appeal is not well taken. The plaintiff bought the lots July, 1923; the suit was commenced in October, 1925; and the trial was in February, 1927. Plaintiff was, therefore, the owner of the land. The evidence also showed that he owned other land in the vicinity of the cemetery; that he was a licensed real estate broker, having engaged in the real estate business in Los Angeles for 20 years (though not dealing as such in this kind of property); that he had made numerous efforts to sell the lots himself without response; that he had discussed the values with other owners and with defendants' employees; that he had urged and authorized the defendants to sell the lots as they had promised to do; and that in December, 1923, the whole scheme of selling the cemetery lots to the public for speculation was subjected to very unfavorable publicity, after which it was practically impossible to sell any of the lots either for speculation or for burials.

[1, 2] Deciding upon the qualification of a witness to testify as an expert is a matter which lies in the sound discretion of the trial court. 10 Cal. Juris. 963 and 1022. In California a property owner is ordinarily, if not uniformly, permitted to give his opinion of the value of his own property. 10 Cal. Juris. 1023. With these principles in mind, it is plain that the court did not err in admitting the testimony of the plaintiff.

[3] It is well settled that the jury or a judge is not concluded by the testimony of experts. The province of such testimony is only to aid in coming to a conclusion, and it does not exclude consideration of other evidence which is pertinent to the issue involved. 10 Cal. Juris. 972. There were in the evidence many facts showing the manner of the illotation of this cemetery scheme by its promoters, the defendants, and the fact that the whole scheme collapsed under public criticism. This evidence, as well as all the evidence in the case, was necessary to be considered by the court in arriving at its decision, and the evidence is such as to justify the finding that the lots did not exceed the value of $10 each at that time. The court was not bound by the expert testimony of defendants' witnesses, if the other facts in the case reasonably convinced him that their opinions were colored and exaggerated.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action by H. S. Downs against the National Bank of Bakersfield, a corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. E. Borton and James Petrini, both of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Emmons & Aldrich, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover a judgment. The defendant answered, and a trial was had before the court sitting without a jury. The trial court made findings in favor of the defendant, and from a judgment entered thereon the plaintiff has appealed and has brought up a typewritten record.

[1] Heretofore, L. D. Hill and F. E. Hill, copartners, owned a tract of land in Kern county known as the Hill Ranch. Later J. T. Hill and J. L. Hill joined L. D. Hill and F. E. Hill, forming a larger partnership, for the purpose of managing and operating the ranch. During the season of 1923 and 1924 the Hills planted the land to wheat and barley. January 18, 1924, the Hills mortgaged their crops to the defendant and the mortgage was recorded on that date. On February 19, 1924, the owners of the ranch entered into an executory contract, by the terms of which they agreed to exchange their lands in Kern county for lands in the state of Kansas owned by William Wonn. That executory contract was not recorded. On April 15, 1924, the deed by which the Hills conveyed their lands to Wonn was recorded in Kern county. On June 9, 1924, one of the partners, L. D. Hill, signed and delivered a bill of sale purporting to convey the pasturage on the lands in Kern county. That document was delivered nearly two months after the Hills had parted with their title to the lands. On or about June 23d it had transpired that the year was dry. The crops in spots had not matured. Some of the crop was so short that it could not be mowed for hay nor headed for grain. The Hills left the ranch, and the defendant as mortgagee entered into the peaceable possession for the purpose of protecting itself by harvesting and marketing the crop. As to the portion of the crop that could neither be mowed nor headed, the defendant sold the pasturage rights, and its vendees proceeded to pasture sheep on said spots. In the present action the plaintiff contends that the Hills retained rights to the pasturage by reason of certain covenants contained in the executory agreement theretofore executed by themselves and William Wonn. The defendant contends that said instrument merged in the deed from the Hills to William Wonn. It was so held in Bryan v. Swain, 56 Cal. 616; Fraser v. Bentel, 161 Cal. 390, 392, 119 P. 509, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1062. As between the vendor and the vendee, a transfer of the growing crop was a part of the realty. Wilson v. White, 161 Cal. 453, 119 P. 895. When the vendors sold the realty they sold all interest in the crop standing thereon. As to what this defendant thereafter did, the vendee might complain, but the vendor could not. Assuming, but not deciding, that the plaintiff under his bill of sale is the assignee of the vendor, he has no greater rights than his assignor. We have thus disposed of the question which the appellant states is the simple issue involved in the case.

[2] The plaintiff alleged that Hill brothers transferred the pasture privilege to plaintiff. The defendant denied the allegation. The plaintiff complains that the trial court did not make a finding directly responsive to the issue. The finding as made directly followed the issues as modified by the evidence. Moreover, if it had been directly responsive to the issue as made, it must necessarily have been against the plaintiff. As stated above, the pasturage was an interest in the realty. That interest could have been conveyed by a grant joined in by all the holders of the legal title. 20 Cal. Jur. 725. But there is no evidence whatever that such a grant was executed. As we understand the brief of the plaintiff, we have answered every point contained therein.

We find no error in the record.
The judgment is affirmed.

1. Appeal and error ☞757(1)—Appellant, bringing up record by typewritten transcript, must print enough properly to present questions raised.

It is duty of appellant, bringing up record under alternative method by typewritten transcript, to print enough of record properly to present questions raised by him.

2. Appeal and error ☞931(1)—Appellate court must accept evidence most favorable to trial court's finding.

On appeal from judgment for defendants on court's finding that negligence of both parties proximately contributed to collision causing damages sued for, the Court of Appeal must accept the evidence most favorable to such finding.

3. Automobiles ☞244(42)—Evidence held to support court's finding of contributory negligence either in continuing to approach truck on plaintiff automobilist's side of highway after seeing it in time to avoid collision, or in falling asleep and failing to see it.

In action for damages caused by collision between defendant's truck and automobile driven by plaintiff, evidence held sufficient to support court's finding of contributory negligence either on hypothesis that plaintiff, after seeing truck on his side of highway in time to avoid collision, continued to approach it in manner making collision inevitable, or that he was asleep and did not see truck.

Action by Sam Bailin against Harry E. Phoenix and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Culver & Nourse, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem. In this action for damages arising out of a collision between a truck and trailer driven by defendant's servant and an automobile driven by plaintiff, the trial court, sitting without a jury, found that the negligence of both parties proximately contributed to the collision. From the judgment for defendants entered upon these findings, plaintiff appeals.

Appellant makes only one point on appeal, the insufficiency of the evidence to support the finding that he was guilty of contributory negligence proximately contributing to the collision.

[1] As respondents point out, appellant has printed in his brief only the most meager excerpts from the testimony, although the record is brought up under the alternative method by typewritten transcript. Out of a transcript of testimony of over 100 pages appellant has printed testimony occupying less than 3 pages of his brief. Appellate courts should not be compelled to reiterate that it is the duty of appellants proceeding under this method to print enough of the typewritten record to properly present the questions raised by them to the court on appeal. However, since respondent has printed in his brief testimony amply supporting the finding of contributory negligence, we prefer to place our affirmance of the judgment on that ground.

[2, 3] According to appellant's own testimony, when he was 500 feet away from the truck and trailer, which was approaching him slowly up grade from the opposite direction, he saw it start to turn to his side of the road. It continued in the same direction and crossed the center of the highway when it was 200 feet away, and continued toward its left of the highway at all times until the collision occurred. Appellant applied his brakes lightly when the truck crossed the center of the highway about 200 feet from him, but proceeded toward it at about 25 miles per hour until he was only a few feet away. He then turned sharply to his left in an attempt to pass the truck, but failed to clear it, and the collision occurred. A doctor who saw and treated appellant after the collision testified that appellant stated, when the doctor asked him how the collision happened: "I went to sleep."

We must accept the evidence most favorable to the finding of the court. From this evidence the court may have believed that appellant, in spite of the fact that he saw the truck on his side of the highway in time to avoid a collision, continued to approach it in such a manner as to make the collision inevitable, or that appellant was asleep and did not see the truck at all. On either hypothesis, the evidence is sufficient to support the finding of contributory negligence.

Judgment affirmed.

BRUNSWIG DRUG CO. v. SCHLYEN et al.
(Civ. 5710.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 19, 1929.

Pleading  345(1)—Plaintiff suing on note was entitled to judgment on pleadings, where answer failed to contain positive denial of any material allegation.

Where answer in action to recover on note admitted execution of notes by copartnership and denied nonpayment or execution of notes for value by reason of lack of information and belief based on certain other information without one positive denial of material allegation, plaintiff was entitled to judgment on pleadings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Action by the Brunswig Drug Company against Joseph Schlyen and another, copartners doing business under the fictitious firm name and style of Palm Drug Company. Judgment for plaintiff against defendant first named, and such defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ben M. Goldman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Mott, Vallee & Grant, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. By complaint in the usual form the respondent in this action alleged that Joseph Schlyen and Michael H. Brodsky were copartners doing business under the firm name of Palm Drug Company; that individually and in the name of the company they executed two promissory notes, payable to the plaintiff, for the amounts of which, less certain deductions, judgment was prayed. The defendant Schlyen having answered, a motion for judgment upon the pleadings was interposed by the plaintiff, which was granted, from which said judgment defendant appeals.

It is at first contended that appellant's answer joined issues upon material allegations of the complaint by way of denials and affirmative defense, upon the merits. A second ground assigned for reversal restates the first, by urging that the pleadings show that the defendant has created an issue entitling him to his day in court upon a good and legal defense.

As already observed, the plaintiff alleged the existence of the copartnership, the execution of the notes, which were set forth in full, the nonpayment of one, and the payment of $334.32 and interest to a date specified, upon another in the principal sum of $480.57, which bore interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum. There was a provision in each note, and the complaint alleged that attorney's fees should be paid upon certain contingencies. Each note was signed: "Palm Drug Co. Joseph Schlyen. Michael H. Brodsky." The notes were pleaded in separate causes of action.

In answering the first cause of action appellant alleged that Brodsky was in sole and exclusive charge of the business, made all purchases without appellant's knowledge, and had all dealings with the plaintiff regarding the consideration for the note in suit; that since the execution of the note, and prior to the commencement of the action, the partnership was dissolved. Appellant then alleged that his copartner had not accounted to him with respect to the consideration for the notes, that he was informed and believed that a portion of the goods, wares, and merchandise for which it was given were not delivered; that since there had been no accounting, and having no information or belief sufficient to enable him to answer, he places his denial upon that ground, and alleges upon information and belief that there was no consideration, or if there was a consideration, that it failed. Appellant avers that he is informed and believes that because of the foregoing he is entitled to certain credits, and having no information or belief, denies nonpayment upon that ground, or any amount due, and having no information or belief upon the subject, denies that the notes were executed or delivered for value. By a second paragraph, it is alleged as to the second note that, "because of the reason set forth in paragraph I of the amended answer," the defendant has no information or belief upon the subject, "places his denial on said grounds; that the said promissory note * * * was made or executed or delivered to plaintiff for value received, and alleges in this connection upon information and belief that there was no consideration," or if there was a consideration that it failed; that because of the reason set forth in the last-mentioned paragraph, he alleges upon information and belief that he has no information or belief, and therefore denies that any amount remains due upon the second note.

The defendant Schlyen admits the existence of the copartnership at the time of the execution of the notes, and the execution of them by it and by himself as a copartner, and affirmatively alleges that they were given for goods, wares, and merchandise. Giving full effect to his answer, if supported by evidence, his copartner has had full charge of the business, and has failed to account in this instance; the defendant has no knowledge or information upon the subject, but believes that a portion of the goods were not delivered, hence he denies that the consideration was furnished. In a single allegation he states that he is informed and believes because of certain other information and belief that he has no information or belief, and upon that ground denies nonpayment or execution of the notes for value. The answer does not contain one positive denial of a material allegation, but is indeed unique and evasive. Even under the liberal rules of pleading in this state, it has been repeatedly held that in such a case the plaintiff is entitled to judgment upon the pleadings. Hemme v. Hays, 55 Cal. 337; Loveland v. Garner, 74 Cal. 301, 15 P. 845; Zany v. Rawhide G. M. Co., 15 Cal. App. 373, 114 P. 1026; Reigel v. Wollenshlager, 49 Cal. App. 300, 193 P. 160.

MARSHALL v. SWAIM. (Civ. 5647.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 20, 1929.

1. Exchange of property ⇨7—Under exchange contract providing grantee of house should have rental beginning following day, grantor had no title to rentals thereafter.

Under exchange contract, providing that grantee of house exchanged for other property should have right to rental commencing on day following agreement, with right of reimbursement should they have been paid otherwise, grantor had no title to rentals or any right to receive them thereafter.

2. Exchange of property ⇨8(1)—One entitled to rentals after exchange could maintain action for money had and received though there was agreement relating to rentals.

One entitled to rentals from house as grantee after exchange could maintain action for money had and received though exchange agreement provided that rentals to become due thereafter should belong to grantee, since law would have supplied provision had it been omitted and therefore contract was not special.

3. Exchange of property ⇨8(1)—One entitled to rentals after exchange could sue grantor's wife receiving rentals for money had and received aside from contractual relation.

One entitled to rentals from house after exchange could maintain action against grantor's wife cashing draft sent to grantor for rentals after exchange, entirely aside from contractual relation.

4. Exchange of property ⇨7—Right to recover rentals after exchange was not affected by question whether defendant could recover against another.

In action by grantee entitled to rentals, after exchange of property, against grantor's wife, who cashed draft for rentals after exchange, plaintiff's right to recover against defendant was not affected by question whether defendant had right to recover against her husband.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Robert H. Scott, Judge.

Action for money had and received by Marcus M. Marshall against Lena K. Swaim. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Davis & Thorne, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, Paul Fussell, and Albert Parker, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J. The defendant was the wife of Dr. Clement Swaim, who owned a residence in Mexico City which he had been endeavoring to sell for two or three years prior to July 9, 1925. On the date mentioned, the negotiations had reached the point where he and his wife, the defendant, signed a special power of attorney authorizing one Charles F. Pettijohn to sign and carry into effect a contract for the exchange of the dwelling for an orange grove in California. The exchange was actually consummated in Mexico on August 7, 1925. The Mexico City property was leased, and on August 12 the tenant purchased a draft in the sum of $1,500, to cover the rental due for the six months' period commencing on August 15, 1925, and forwarded it to the residence of Dr. Swaim. It arrived at its destination on August 17, 1925, and the defendant indorsed the draft and used the proceeds for various purposes. The agreement for exchange of properties contains the following paragraph: "Third: Both deponents declare that the price of residence number 47 of Marsella Street is that of thirty thousand dollars and that the lands and shares together also are valued at thirty thousand dollars and consequently through the permutation (exchange) of the lands and shares for the house, the respective owners are fully compensated, and there being no claim for any reason whatsoever, they mutually acknowledge payment observing (the fact) that the rent for said residence covering rental of Mr. Conway until today belongs to Mr. Swaim and that commencing tomorrow to Mr. Marshall with right of reimbursement should they have been paid otherwise." The plaintiff commenced this action; the one count being for money had and received and the other being based upon an assignment from Dr. Clement Swaim to the plaintiff of his claim against the defendant. The trial court rendered its judgment in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $1,500, and this appeal is from that judgment.

It is the appellant's contention that, by the terms of the agreement, the material portion of which we have already quoted, the respondent's right of action was one for reimbursement from Dr. Clement Swaim; he being the owner in fact of the residence as his separate property. Let us observe, however, at the outset, that the language of the agreement is such as to refer to the reimbursement to Marshall of rentals which might have been paid to him prior to the execution of the agreement, a very logical and wise precaution under the circumstance of its execution by an attorney in fact separated by a considerable distance from his principal. The words employed are "with right of reimbursement should they have been paid otherwise." Or, to put the promise in other words, it reads: "Swaim covenants that he will return to Marshall any rentals which have heretofore been paid and covering any period after the execution of the agreement." The promise did not relate to rentals which might thereafter be paid. Future unpaid rentals were comprehended by the clause "the rent for said residence covering rental of Mr. Conway until today belongs to Mr. Swaim and that commencing tomorrow to Mr. Marshall."

[1, 2] It becomes apparent, therefore, that by contract the parties had agreed upon the title to the rentals. In Jackson v. Creek, 47 Ind. App. 541, 94 N. E. 416, 418, it is said that "the rents belong to the person who holds the title, in the absence of a contract providing otherwise." To the same effect is Garber v. Gianella, 98 Cal. 527, 33 P. 458, and Diepenbrock v. Luiz, 159 Cal. 716, 115 P. 743, L. R. A. 1915C, 234, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1084, the latter of the two cited cases going to the extent of holding that the grantee is entitled to collect an installment of rent earned at the time of the transfer, but not payable until thereafter.

It is obvious, therefore, that Dr. Swaim had no title to the rentals or any right to receive them. Had he received the draft and cashed it, there can be no doubt but that an action for money had and received would have been maintainable against him. London, etc., Fire Ins. Co. v. Liebes, 105 Cal. 203, 38 P. 691; Fontaine v. Lacassie, 36 Cal. App. 175, 171 P. 812. It is no objection to the maintenance of the action that the parties by the agreement provided that the rentals to become due thereafter should belong to the grantee. As we have observed, the law would have supplied the provision had it been omitted. The contract was therefore not special, and there is no reason why the plaintiff could not avail himself of the action of money had and received. Jackson v. Creek, supra.

[3] However, the right to this form of action is not dependent upon an express contract. It arises "whenever one man has in his hands the money of another, which he ought to pay over, he is liable to the action of money had and received, although he has never seen or heard of the party who has the right. When the fact is proved that he has the money, if he cannot show that he has a legal or equitable ground for retaining it, the law creates the privity and the promise." Chung Kee v. Davidson, 102 Cal. 188, 196, 36 P. 519, 521. Entirely aside, then, from the contractual relation, the action was the proper one to pursue as against the appellant. Nor does it become the less effective by reason of the fact that she is the wife of Dr. Swaim, against whom, as we have seen, a similar action might have been brought had he received and used the proceeds of the draft. It is of no moment that Dr. Swaim had on previous occasions authorized the appellant to indorse and cash similar drafts. In this instance he not only had no right to give such authority, but also it is not suggested that he did in fact issue such instructions.

[4] It becomes unimportant than for us to probe the question of whether the court failed to find upon affirmative allegations by the defendant to the effect that she had a right to set-off against her husband, Dr. Swaim. The right of action resting in the plaintiff to recover his money could not in this instance be affected by the right of the appellant to recover against Dr. Swaim, if she had such right.

Judgment affirmed.

HAMBERGER-POLHEMUS CO. v. LEWIN.
(Civ. 6674.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 7, 1929.

1. Sales $\S$ 200(3)—Title to coffee, sold under contract making sale absolute subject to quality requirements to be determined by third party, passed when third party determined quality, complied with contract.

Under contract for sale of coffee providing sale was to be absolute and coffee taken by buyer if average grading was within $\frac{1}{2}$ cent. per pound of sample or description and providing for final decision of quality by third party, title to coffee passed to buyer when quality thereof was ascertained by the third party to be in accordance with the terms of the contract.

2. Sales $\S$ 108—Vendor's resale of goods after vendee's repudiation does not work rescission.

Resale of goods sold by vendor after repudiation of contract by vendee does not work rescission.

3. Sales $\S$ 384(7)—Amount which coffee brought on resale in open market was evidence of market value, in action by seller for damages for buyer's repudiation.

In action by seller for damages on buyer's repudiation of contract for purchase of coffee which seller thereafter resold in open market, amount which coffee brought on resale was evidence of its market value at that time.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 931(1)—Facts supporting judgment inferable from facts found will be deemed inferred by trial court, especially where appeal is upon judgment roll.

Where facts supporting judgment may be inferred from the facts found by the trial court, such inference will be deemed to have been made, especially where appeal is upon judgment roll.

5. Sales $\S$ 384(7)—Seller's damages on resale of goods without auction, after buyer's repudiation, held difference between contract and market value (Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 3005, 3310, 3311, 3337, 3353).

Where seller of coffee, after buyer's repudiation, resold coffee in open market without complying with provisions of Civ. Code, $\S$ 3005, requiring sale of pledged property at auction, measure of seller's recovery against buyer under Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 3311, 3353, or under $\S\S$ 3310 or 3337, relative to conversion, was difference between contract price and market value of property.

6. Appeal and error $\S$ 1071(6)—Judgment for seller for difference between contract and net resale price after buyer's repudiation should be affirmed, notwithstanding absence of finding as to market value, where there was no claim coffee was resold under market value (Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 3005, 3310, 3311, 3337, 3353).

Judgment for seller of coffee against buyer repudiating contract for difference between contract price of coffee and price realized by seller on resale in the open market, less brokerage fee and demurrage, should not be reversed notwithstanding seller's failure to comply with Civ. Code, $\S$ 3005, providing for auction and notwithstanding absence of finding as to market value of coffee, where there was no claim that the coffee was resold for less than its market value; difference between contract price and market value determining plaintiff's recovery under Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 3311, 3353, and under $\S\S$ 3310, 3337, relative to conversion.

7. Appeal and error $\S$ 1071(6)—Omission of finding does not warrant reversal, where more complete finding would have been adverse to appellant.

Failure of trial court to make finding is no ground for reversal of judgment, where it may fairly be inferred from facts found by the record that had more complete findings been made they would have been adverse to the appellant.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Action by the Hamberger-Polhemus Company against John Leon Lewin. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Philip S. Ehrlich, of San Francisco (Albert A. Axelrod, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Oliver Dibble, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. An appeal by the defendant from a judgment entered in an action to recover the damage due to his refusal to accept and pay for certain coffee purchased by him. The appeal is presented on the judgment roll. As grounds therefor it is contended that the title to the coffee passed to the defendant; that after his refusal to accept and pay the agreed price therefor the plaintiff, without complying with the provisions of section 3005 of the Civil Code, resold the coffee in the open market and was consequently entitled to no relief in the action.

The complaint, to which was annexed a written contract executed by the parties, alleged that, pursuant to the terms thereof, the "plaintiff agreed to sell to defendant 500 bags of Columbian Coffee Aripe brand at the agreed price of 27 $\frac{1}{4}$ ¢ per pound, ex dock San Francisco, net weight actual tare." These allegations were admitted by the answer. The contract also contained the following provisions: "Quality: To be based upon Columbian Coffee—Aripe Brand—usual quality. * * * Payment: Cash less 2%. Full payment in exchange for delivery order on day after presentation of invoice with weight tags attached. Terms: Sale to be absolute and coffee is to be taken by buyer if average grading within one-half ($\frac{1}{2}$) cent per pound of the sample or description sold on at the graded allowance. * * * Decision of quality to be final and binding upon both buyer and seller, to be determined by C. E. Bickford & Co." The complaint further alleged that upon the arrival of the coffee in San Francisco the same was examined by C. E. Bickford & Co. and by them determined not to be more than one-half cent per pound below usual quality; that on October 14, 1926, the same was weighed by a public weighmaster and certified to be of the gross weight of 76,691 pounds; that on the same day an invoice of the coffee with the weight tag attached was delivered to the defendant; and on October 16, 1926, a delivery order therefor was tendered, the net weight of the coffee being 75,941 pounds. Demand for the agreed net price, namely, \$19,907.94, and a refusal by the defendant to accept the coffee or pay therefor, was alleged, and that thereafter, on October 18, 1926, defendant was notified that the plaintiff intended to sell the coffee in the open market and hold him for any damage due to his refusal. It was further alleged that on October 19, 1926, the coffee was sold for the total sum of \$18,789.13, from which plaintiff paid a brokerage fee for selling amounting to \$187.89 and the sum of \$9.75 for demurrage, and that plaintiff had suffered damage in an amount equal to the difference between the agreed net price and the net amount for which the coffee was sold.

The answer averred that the coffee tendered was between $1\frac{1}{2}$ and 2 cents per pound below the usual quality of said aripe brand at the graded allowance, and also that the decision of C. E. Bickford & Co. as to its quality was due to a mistake on their part and constituted a fraud on the rights of the defendant. According to the findings, which recited that oral and documentary evidence was introduced at the trial by the respective parties, the plaintiff agreed to sell to defendant and defendant agreed to buy from plaintiff the coffee in question. The other findings were in accordance with the allegations of the complaint and against the defenses pleaded by the defendant. Judgment was entered thereon for \$1,316.45 with interest.

[1, 2] According to the contract, the sale was to be absolute and the coffee taken by the buyer if the average grading proved to be within one-half cent per pound of the sample or description sold on at the graded allowance, and the determination of the fact by C. E. Bickford & Co. was to be final. Payment therefor in cash, less 2 per cent., was to be made in exchange for delivery order on the day after the presentation of the invoice with the weight tags attached. The language of the instrument clearly indicates an intention that title should pass when the quality of the coffee was ascertained by Bickford & Co. to be in accordance with the terms of the contract. Under this interpretation the defendant, relying on Bennett v. Potter, 16 Cal. App. 183, 116 P. 681, and Madison v. Weyl-Zuckerman & Co., 48 Cal. App. 308, 192 P. 110, claims that no recovery could be had. The rule is well settled that a resale by a vendor whose vendee has repudiated the contract does not work a rescission. Tomboy Gold, etc., Co. v. Marks, 185 Cal. 336, 197 P. 94; Phillips v. Stark, 186 Cal. 369, 199 P. 509, 511. In the latter case the court, referring to Bennett v. Potter, supra, said: "It was a case where a vendor, left with property on his hands the title to which had passed to the vendee, resold the property, but not in the manner required for the enforcement of a vendor's lien, and brought suit for the difference between the contract price and the amount obtained on the resale. * * * The trial court had allowed the plaintiff judgment for the difference between the contract price and the amount realized on the resale. This was reversed on appeal, but not on the ground that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover anything. It was reversed on the ground that, since the resale had not been made in the manner prescribed for the enforcement of a vendor's lien, the defendant was not bound by it that as a result the plaintiff had been guilty of a conversion of the property for which he was liable to the defendant, and that the amount received by the plaintiff on the resale could not be taken as the defendant's measure of damages for this conversion. It is not said in so many words, but the plain implication from the opinion is that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the contract price offset by the amount of damages done the defendant by the conversion worked by the resale."

Such, also, was the effect of the decision in Madison v. Weyl-Zuckerman Co., supra. Phillips v. Stark, supra, was a case wherein the vendees of personal property, the title to which had vested in them, abandoned the property and refused to pay the price. The vendor retook possession and resold the property, but without giving the notice required by the code for a sale in enforcement of a vendor's lien. Civil Code, §§ 3049, 3002. The court held that the vendor, notwithstanding the above, still had the right to recover in damages for the vendee's breach, and in discussing the measure of damages said: "The measure provided by section 3310, Civil Code, in cases where title has passed to the vendee, is the full purchase price. * * * The vendor may not have both the full purchase price and the property. It is quite immaterial in the present case upon what theory this is worked out, whether upon that suggested by us, that by repudiating the contract and thrusting the property back on the plaintiff the defendants put him in the situation of a vendor under an executory contract, in which case the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and market value of the property (Civil Code, §§ 3311, 3353), or upon that suggested by Bennett v. Potter [supra], that the vendee is responsible for the full purchase price under section 3310, Civil Code, but the vendor is liable to the vendee in damages for a conversion. The result is the same in either case, since the measure of damages for a conversion is the market value of the property (Civil Code, § 3337)."

[3-6] So far as appears from the pleadings or otherwise, the defendant made no claim that the coffee was sold for less than its market value or that he was damaged as the result of the resale. While the complaint did not allege the market value of the property, but only the amount for which it sold on the resale, and the court found in accordance with this allegation, and not as to the ultimate fact of the market value, nevertheless the amount for which the coffee sold was evidence of its market value (Phillips v. Stark, supra; Meyer v. McAllister, 24 Cal. App. 16, 140 P. 42); and whenever from facts found other facts may be inferred which will support the judgment, such inference will be deemed to have been made. And this rule has a special application where the appeal is upon the judgment roll. Breeze v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 72, 31 P. 742, 22 L. R. A. 257; Anglo-California Trust Co. v. Oakland Railways, 193 Cal. 451, 225 P. 452.

[7] Moreover, it may fairly be inferred from the facts shown by the record that had more complete findings been made they would have been adverse to the defendant, and under such circumstances a failure to find is not a ground for a reversal of the judgment. Hulen v. Stuart, 191 Cal. 562, 217 P. 750. The findings were sufficient to support the judgment and the record discloses no error which would justify a reversal.

The judgment is affirmed.

MURPHY v. WHITE et ux. (Civ. 20.)

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California. Nov. 7, 1929.

1. Bills and notes ⚡94(1)—Contract to take automobile, credit value on buyer's notes, and take new note for balance, held not without consideration.

Contract to take automobile, credit agreed value thereof on buyer's notes, and take new note for balance due on old indebtedness, held not without consideration; new contract not merely modifying, but entirely superseding, original contract.

2. Novation ⚡12—Agreement to substitute new contract for old one may be shown by parties' acts.

An agreement to substitute a new contract for an old one may be shown by the acts of the parties.

3. Novation ⚡9—Nonperformance of substituted contract does not revive old contract.

Failure to perform the terms of a new contract substituted for an old one does not revive or give life to the latter.

4. Husband and wife ⚡85(6)—Spouses' note for balance due on husband's notes for price of automobile held supported by valuable consideration as to wife as well as husband (Civ. Code, §§ 3106, 3110).

Note executed by husband and wife for balance due on husband's notes for price of automobile under conditional sale contract held supported by valuable consideration as to wife as well as husband, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 3106, 3110, though she did not sign original notes or contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by E. B. Murphy against B. F. White and wife. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

James A. Hall, of Hemet, for appellant.

E. John Eriksson, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

MARKS, J. This is an action brought by appellant against respondents as makers of a promissory note dated January 14, 1922, due three years after date, in the sum of $500. A trial was had by the court, without a jury, and judgment was rendered in favor of respondents.

The answer admits the execution of the note, pleads the statute of limitations, which plea was afterwards abandoned, and sets up the defense of failure of consideration based upon the allegations that the note was given by respondents to appellant to permit him to borrow money thereon, and for his accommodation, and upon his express promise that respondents would never be called upon to pay the note or any part thereof.

From the findings of fact and the bill of exceptions, it appears that appellant sold an automobile to B. F. White on the 28th day of July, 1920, for the sum of $1,790, payable as follows: $700 as a down payment in the form of an automobile traded in, and two promissory notes in the sum of $545 each, due on October 28, 1920, and January 28, 1921, respectively. In addition to the two notes, a conditional sales contract was executed whereby title to the automobile was reserved in appellant, and possession given to purchaser. L. H. White did not sign the notes or the contract. The contract provided that, in case the purchaser should make default in any payments to become due thereunder, the seller might terminate the contract and the rights of the purchaser thereunder, and to the automobile, and take possession of the same.

The findings of the trial court material to this appeal are as follows:

"It is true that the defendant B. F. White defaulted on this contract in the following particulars: That the defendant B. F. White did not pay or cause to be paid on his behalf the sum of $545.00 due on October 28, 1920, and the sum of $545.00 due on the 28th day of January, 1921.

"It is true that on the 14th day of January, 1922, the plaintiff made a demand upon the defendant B. F. White for the possession of the automobile, and did take possession of said automobile on the said 14th day of January, 1922. That on the 14th day of January, 1922, there remained due to plaintiff upon the contract the sum of $1,090.00 as principal and $25.00 interest or a total of the sum of $1,115.00. That the value of the automobile on the 14th day of January, 1922, the date upon which the plaintiff retook possession of the same, was $615.00. That there was a balance due upon said contract of the sum of $500.00 after deducting the value of the repossessed automobile for which amount the defendants B. F. White and L. H. White gave the note in question.

"It is true that said note was given for the balance due under the terms of the contract.

"It is true that the defendants have not paid the same or any part of said note.

"It is true that there was no consideration to the defendants B. F. White and L. H. White or to either of them for the giving of the note sued upon."

From the bill of exceptions, the evidence, which must support these findings, if they are supported, may be summarized as follows: That no part of the principal or interest on the two promissory notes for $545 was paid; that White offered to return the car several times during the year 1921, which offers were refused by appellant, who attempted to collect the money due; that on January 14, 1922, he demanded payment of White, who had no money for appellant; that the two parties thereupon entered into negotiations in an endeavor to settle the indebtedness. It was agreed that there was $1,115 principal and accrued interest due on the two notes; that the automobile was worth $615; that appellant would take the car and give White credit for $615 on the two notes; and that respondents would execute a new note in the sum of $500 for the balance due on the old indebtedness. Appellant took the car, and respondents executed and delivered to him the new note, which is the subject-matter of this action.

[1-3] Appellant urges in his briefs that the finding of the trial court to the effect that the note in question was given without consideration is not supported by the evidence. In meeting this argument, respondents rely upon the cases of Johnson v. Kaeser, 196 Cal. 686, 239 P. 324; Boas v. Knewing, 175 Cal. 226, 185 P. 690, L. R. A. 1917F, 462; and various text-writers in harmony with the same. The case of Johnson v. Kaeser turns on the point of a verbal extension of the time of paying installments under the terms of a conditional sales contract, and holds the action prematurely brought. In the case of Boas v. Knewing, the action was brought on promissory notes given the seller by the purchaser for the unpaid portion of the purchase price of an automobile sold under a conditional sales contract and repossessed by the seller. The court held that the seller could not have both the car and the purchase price under the circumstances of that case and the conditions of the sales contract. There are many other cases in the books announcing this well-recognized principle of law.

In the instant case we have a state of facts that bring it without the rule laid down in Boas v. Knewing, supra. Here we have a new contract between appellant and respondents that was not a modification of the original contract, but entirely superseded it. Beckwith v. Sheldon, 165 Cal. 319, 131 P. 1049. Before appellant repossessed this car he agreed with B. F. White upon the manner of the complete liquidation of the original indebtedness, which agreement was carried out in detail by the parties. While there was no direct testimony that there was any definite agreement to substitute the later contract for the former, this may be shown by the acts of the parties (Simmons v. Sweeney, 13 Cal. App. 283, 109 P. 265), and a failure to perform the terms of the new contract does not revive or give life to the old (Hieatt v. Gassen, 41 Cal. App. 620, 183 P. 227; Producers' Fruit Co. v. Goddard, 75 Cal. App. 737, 243 P. 686).

The case of Harpold v. Slocum, 46 Cal. App. 51, 188 P. 824, presents facts somewhat similar to the one at bar. The plaintiff and defendants owned real property in Los Angeles. The plaintiff had a $1,000 personal interest in it, and one-third of the remainder in common with the defendants. For convenience, the record title was placed in the name of one of the defendants, and a written agreement executed setting forth the respective interests of the parties, and providing for a division of the purchase money in case of sale. About a year after the property was acquired, plaintiff wanted his money, and agreed to accept the defendants' note in the sum of $1,750 in full payment of his interest in the property. The note was given, but plaintiff did not surrender his copy of the written agreement referred to, nor did he execute any conveyance of his interest in the property to defendants, or either of them. In an action to collect the promissory note, the court held that a novation was effected by plaintiff's accepting the promissory note, which canceled any interest he had in the property or in the proceeds from the sale thereof, and that it was not necessary for him to surrender the written agreement setting forth his interest in the property, as it was canceled by the new contract.

[4] Respondents further contend, that if this court should hold that the note in question was supported by a valid consideration, as to the defendant B. F. White, still there would be no consideration as to the defendant L. H. White, she not being obligated by the original notes or conditional sales contract. Section 3106, Civil Code, provides that a pre-existing debt constitutes a consideration for a new contract. Section 3110, Civil Code, provides as follows: "Liability of accommodation party. 'An accommodation party is one who has signed the instrument as maker, drawer, acceptor, or indorser, without receiving value therefor, and for the purpose of lending his name to some other person. Such a person is liable on the instrument to a holder for value, notwithstanding such holder at the time of taking the instrument knew him to be only an accommodation party.'" We therefore hold that the note was supported by a valuable consideration as to both respondents. Judgment reversed.

We concur: SLOANE, P. J.; BARNARD, J.

ORR v. FORDE. (Civ. 3901.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 6, 1929.

1. Stipulations ⇨14(1)—Stipulation during trial of case not reduced to writing should be limited so as not to extend beyond what parties intended.

A stipulation, particularly one loosely made during trial of a case and not reduced to writing, should be limited so as not to extend beyond what parties thereto clearly intended.

2. Appeal and error ⇨931(8)—It may be inferred that court considered two findings together as necessary in order to hold finding warranted by stipulation.

Where finding may be considered as warranted by stipulation of parties when construed in connection with and as dependent on next preceding finding, it may be inferred that court intended the two findings to be so considered together.

3. Contracts ⇨198(6)—Hole drilled below certain depth containing broken casing and containing sand and gravel was no part of completed well within drilling contract.

Hole below certain depth containing broken casing and filled with sand and gravel and cable and drill constituted no part of completed well within contract for drilling to certain minimum depth and for additional depth in consideration of additional compensation.

4. Contracts ⇨322(1)—Owner to defeat recovery for incompleting part of well had no duty of proving negligence on part of driller.

Under contract for drilling well authorizing driller to stop drilling any depth beyond 300 feet, owner, in order to defeat recovery for incompleting part of well, had no duty of proving negligence on part of driller.

5. Contracts ⇨322(2)—Evidence in action on contract for drilling well established that owner accepted only portion of well.

Evidence in action to recover under contract for drilling well held to establish that defendant accepted only portion of well excluding that part of hole below certain depth containing broken casing and filled with sand and gravel.

6. Contracts ⇨231(1)—Well-drilling contract held to provide for increase of 50 cents per foot for each additional 100 feet after reaching 300 foot depth.

Contract for drilling well providing for compensation at the rate of $3.25 per foot for the first 300 feet, and for additional depth an increased price of 50 cents per foot for each additional 100 feet, held, when viewed in light of practical experience, to provide compensation at the rate of $3.75 per foot for the next 100 feet after the first 300 feet rather than at the rate of 50 cents per foot with an increase of 50 cents for each succeeding 100 feet.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Action by T. B. Orr against W. J. Forde, wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

William P. Boland and Bernard G. Hiss, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Irwin & Laird, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The complaint contains two counts. In the first it is alleged that, pursuant to the terms of a contract between the parties, "plaintiff drilled a well to the depth of 940 feet, and that said well was drilled in a proper and skillful manner and was fully completed; * * * that said well * * * was received and accepted by said defendant"; that the defendant became indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $400 "for the moving of the well-drilling rig onto said property and in the further sum of $367.50 "for the perforating and finishing up of said well." In the second count it is alleged that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $2,364.72 for "work and labor done, * * * for material furnished, * * * and for money advanced."

The answer denies, among other things, that the well was drilled in a proper and skillful manner, or that the same was ever completed or accepted. The defendant also filed a cross-complaint for damages alleged to have been caused by the plaintiff's negligence in drilling the well.

The court gave the plaintiff judgment on the first count for the full contract price for a well 940 feet in depth, and also for the amount proved on the second count, and the defendant has appealed. The contract contains the following:

"The first party agrees to drill a well for second party on that certain land (describing it) at the place thereon to be designated by second party, and to sink such well thereon at least to a minimum depth of 300 feet, * * * such well to be started as 16 inch well and the same to be continued down of the same size as near as can be practically put down considering the exigencies that may arise, it being understood that in case the casing becomes stuck the size may be reduced so as to permit the putting in of casing the next regular size smaller; all upon the terms and conditions following:

"The sum of \$3.25 per foot to be paid by second party for the first 300 feet and for further depths as hereafter stated; $\frac{1}{2}$ of said \$3.25 per foot to be paid upon the attaining of 300 feet, and the other $\frac{1}{2}$ upon completion of said well.

"In consideration thereof second party agrees to pay first party * * * the sum of \$400 for moving of rig into said property. Receipt of $\frac{1}{2}$ is hereby acknowledged, and the other half thereof upon completion of said well; and the further sum of 50 cents per foot for each foot of the first 100 feet that said well may be drilled in excess of said minimum, and for additional depth, second party agrees to pay a price per foot in each succeeding one hundred feet increased by 50 cents per foot over the per foot price of that next preceding 100 feet (that is the per foot price in each additional 100 feet shall be 50 cents greater than the per foot price of the next preceding 100 feet; on the completion of each of said 100 feet one-half of the amount to be paid therefor shall be paid * * * and the balance thereof * * * on the completion of the well.

"After said minimum depth has been attained first party may refuse to put it down any deeper, and must cease to put it down any deeper if requested by second party. * * * First party agrees to perforate the casing at each and all water strata, and to bail and sand pump said well at the price of $35 per day * * * while engaged thereon, and second party agrees to pay first party therefor at said rate. * * * All work done hereunder by first party shall be done in good and workmanlike manner."

The court found:

"That pursuant to and under the terms and conditions of said contract, plaintiff drilled a well upon the lands of defendant, in accordance with said contract, to a depth of 940 feet, and in a proper and skillful manner, and that said well, after being so drilled, was accepted by defendant.

"That at the trial of said action, it was expressly stipulated by and between counsel for the respective parties, that there was due and owing from defendant to plaintiff the sum of $2,589.72, together with reasonable attorney's fees, subject to proof of the counterclaim set forth in defendant's cross-complaint.

"That plaintiff drilled said well in a careful, proper and workmanlike manner."

The court found that the allegations of the cross-complaint to the effect that the defendant was damaged by the negligence of the plaintiff in drilling the well are not true.

Appellant contends that the record does not support the finding as to the stipulation between counsel for the respective parties. Shortly after the commencement of the trial the plaintiff admitted that the defendant had made payments for which he had not been given credit. After a consultation between the attorneys for the parties, Mr. Laird, counsel for plaintiff, stated that there was a balance of $2,589.72 due from the defendant to the plaintiff. Thereupon the following occurred:

"Mr. Boland (counsel for defendant): It will be stipulated that that amount is the amount now between us; that that represents only what is due on the well, not for any material.

"Mr. Laird: That represents the total amount due on the entire transaction, $2,589.72.

"Mr. Boland: That * * * is to be understood is subject to all offsets we have pleaded, * * * and the further objection to certain items rendered by Mr. Orr which we claim should have been supplied by Mr. Orr under the contract, and not charged to us; and the general objection or offset for damages for failure to complete the well."

After the foregoing colloquy the plaintiff was examined at considerable length relative to various disputed items in his account, at the conclusion of which examination the plaintiff rested. The defendant then moved for a nonsuit, and the following took place:

"Mr. Boland: Plaintiff has made absolutely no proof of the drilling of a well at all.

"The Court: I think your stipulation covers that. * * * The stipulation was that $2,589.70 was still due for the work at that time, less certain credits for materials furnished * * * and subject to your claim for damages.

"Mr. Boland: That wasn't the intention of the stipulation by any means. My idea of the stipulation was to avoid any further evidence on the question of accounts. * * *

"The Court: I will deny the motion for a nonsuit. * * *

"Mr. Boland: We want the question of that stipulation cleared up. * * *

"Mr. Laird: What is the idea of the stipulation? I don't think it makes any difference. * * * It is conceded we made a prima facie case. * * *

"Mr. Boland: We don't admit you drilled a well. We don't stipulate that at all. * * * The contract provided he should drill a well.

We allege that he drilled a hole, if you want to call it that; he didn't complete a well. He was under his contract to drill a well in a good and workmanlike manner. * * * We don't stipulate that amount is due. * * *

"Mr. Laird: If there is anything due, it is $2,589.72 plus attorney's fees?"

"Mr. Boland: Yes, provided the court finds that he drilled and completed a well to the depth of 950 feet.

"Mr. Laird: In other words, there is that much due subject to your counterclaim of $10,500?"

"Mr. Boland: Yes. * * * We maintain that * * * the plaintiff has not shown that he has delivered a completed well under the contract.

"The Court: My ruling was on your motion for nonsuit and does not go to the merits of the case. * * * Under the allegations of your cross-complaint, * * * coupled with the stipulation you have just entered into, and the statements of the plaintiff on the stand, I think there has been sufficient testimony adduced to justify the court in denying a motion for nonsuit."

[1] From the foregoing it appears that counsel for the defendant consistently contended that the plaintiff had not finished a completed well. To give the stipulation the effect contended for by respondent would be to deprive the appellant of an important defense interposed by him. A stipulation made for the purpose of expediting the trial of an action "ought not to be used as a pit-fall." Carnegie Steel Co. v. Cambria Iron Co., 185 U. S. 403, 22 S. Ct. 698, 46 L. Ed. 968. "The stipulation is to be interpreted with reference to its subject-matter, in the light of the surrounding circumstances, including the state of the pleadings, the allegations therein, and the attitude of the parties in respect of the issues." People v. Nolan, 33 Cal. App. 493, 496, 165 P. 715, 716. A stipulation, particularly one loosely made during the trial of a case in court and not reduced to writing, "should be limited so as not to extend beyond what the parties thereto clearly intended." 25 R. C. L. 1105.

[2] If the finding that the defendant stipulated that "there was due and owing from defendant to plaintiff the sum of $2,589.72," subject to proof of the cross-complaint, be construed in connection with and as dependent upon the next preceding finding that the well was drilled in accordance with the terms of the contract to a depth of 940 feet, then it may be conceded that the finding is warranted by the stipulation, and it may be inferred that the court intended the two findings to be so considered together, otherwise the first of such findings was unnecessary.

It appears from the evidence that the well was started with a diameter of 16 inches. Casing of that diameter was used for the first 312 feet, then 12-inch casing to a depth of about 400 feet, and then 8¼-inch casing to the final depth of 940 feet. It thus appears that when the work of drilling ceased the well contained 940 feet of 8¼-inch casing, 400 feet of 12-inch and 312 feet of 16-inch. Water was first struck at a depth of between 131 and 133 feet, and there was "water-bearing gravel nearly all the way from there to 400 feet." By mutual consent the plaintiff "kept on going to see what there was below," with the hope of finding artesian water. When the drill had reached a depth of about 700 feet there was a break of some character in the 8¼-inch casing some 300 feet above the lower end thereof. Plaintiff's driller informed the defendant that "the pipe (casing) wasn't in very good shape." "The pipe was good pipe, 8¼ standard pipe. There happened to be a faulty weld." The driller told the defendant "that 8¼ casing wouldn't go over 800 feet." The defendant said "to keep on going down, see what there was * * * as long as things went all right." Shortly before the drilling ceased the defendant, who was inexperienced in the use of drilling machinery, called the driller's attention to the cable and said he "thought it looked crystallized and worn out, very insecure for a depth of 940 feet lift, and asked him if it * * * wouldn't be wise, where there was so much involved, to buy a new rope." The driller replied that "it wouldn't break." The cable was spliced "a day or two" thereafter, and it finally broke about 40 feet below the splice. The driller testified that when the casing was down to a depth of 940 feet and the drill had reached a depth of 5 feet lower, "I was trying to loosen the pipe up to go ahead. We had been working several hours, when the cable broke," about 250 feet below the surface. Four or five weeks were spent in an endeavor to remove the remainder of the cable, nearly 700 feet in length, and the tools attached thereto. The driller further testified: "We tried several times with our different fishing tools. The gravel came in (presumably from a break in the casing) and bothered us. The gravel coming in made it very difficult. When we didn't get it with the mill, we cleared everything away and went down after an impression, and the casing parted. That is the last we done on that well." An expert witness for the defendant testified that the course pursued by the plaintiff's driller in attempting to remove the cable and the tools attached thereto from the well was not "good practice." After abandoning the idea of removing the cable and tools from the well, the plaintiff, pursuant to an understanding with the defendant, cut and removed the overlapping 8¼ and 12 inch casings and perforated the 12 and 16 inch casings remaining in the well and "cleaned the sand out of the well * * * down so that the 12-inch was clear."

the well below a depth of about 400 feet. The hole drilled below that depth, containing the broken casing and filled with sand and gravel and plaintiff's cable and drill, constituted no part of the completed well. Respondent attempts to justify the findings and judgment on the ground that there is no proof of negligence in the drilling of the well.

[4] Whatever the rule to be applied to the cross-complaint for damages may be, it was not necessary for the defendant to prove negligence in order to defeat recovery by the plaintiff for the uncompleted part of the well, but it was a sufficient defense that such part of the well was not completed. Chico Well Drilling Co. v. Givens (Cal. Sup.) 274 P. 966. Under the express terms of the contract, the plaintiff had the right to stop drilling at any depth below 300 feet. Wilson v. Fuller, 37 Cal. App. 355, 174 P. 671. Under the same terms, however, he was entitled to payment of the deferred installments of one-half the contract price only "on the completion of the well" to the depth for which he claimed compensation. Regardless of any question of negligence, plaintiff's inability to complete the well to a depth of 940 feet was due to his own operations and not to any fault of the defendant. "One who has acted by virtue of a written contract has no right of recovery, unless he can show that he had completed the contract on his part or that completion had been waived or excused." Herdal v. Sheehy, 173 Cal. 163, 165, 159 P. 422, 423; Ahlgren v. Walsh, 173 Cal. 27, 31, 158 P. 748, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 751; Carlson v. Sheehan, 157 Cal. 692, 696, 109 P. 29. See, also, Gray v. Bekins, 186 Cal. 389, 394, 199 P. 767; Law v. San Francisco Gas, etc., Co., 168 Cal. 112, 118, 142 P. 52, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 842; annotations 53 A. L. R. 103, L. R. A. 1916F, 10, and 13 C. J. 639. "Mere difficulty, or unusual or unexpected expense, would not excuse him." Snow Mountain W. & P. Co. v. Kraner, 191 Cal. 312, 325, 216 P. 589, 594; Mineral Park Land Co. v. Howard, 172 Cal. 289, 291, 156 P. 458, L. R. A. 1916F, 1; Metzler v. Thye, 163 Cal. 95, 98, 124 P. 721. "An unforeseen contingency or event, not considered by the parties at the time they entered into their agreement, can in no manner affect the same." San Pedro, etc., Co. v. Atchison, etc., Co., 183 Cal. 342, 347, 191 P. 536, 538.

[5] The court found that the defendant accepted the well. The evidence bearing upon this question was given by the defendant, who testified:

"Mr. Orr and Mr. Arnot told me they had dropped some stuff in the well and couldn't go any further. We talked it over. I asked what could be done. Mr. Orr said, 'You have got a well; we couldn't go any further; the tools stuck. There is nothing to do but sand-pump and develop the upper well.' * * * I accepted their information that they couldn't go any further.

"Q. You told them to * * * perforate the casing that remained in the well? A. Yes. * * * They told me that they had made a failure of the well. * * *

"Q. Didn't you have a pump actually installed? A. The mail carrier sent me up a windmill, and he used it for his own purposes. * * *

"Q. When you told them to perforate the casing, what casing did you mean? A. The casing connected with the water strata, 240 feet of water bearing strata."

The defendant sold and received payment for the overlapping casing which was removed from the well. All the casing used in drilling the well was purchased by the plaintiff, who charged the cost thereof to the defendant, and it appears that the defendant had paid the plaintiff the cost of the 16-inch and 12-inch casing before the action was commenced.

The evidence shows that the defendant accepted only "the upper well," extending to a depth of some 400 feet. The conversation between the parties can be given no other meaning. It has been held that such an acceptance as here shown is not a waiver by the owner of even an action for damages. Stephens v. Weyl-Zuckerman & Co., 33 Cal. App. 566, 569, 165 P. 975; Machinery & Electrical Co. v. Y. M. C. A., 22 Cal. App. 416, 419, 134 P. 724. Plaintiff not only failed to complete the well to a lower depth than about 400 feet, but he left his drill and drilling cable fast in the uncompleted part in such manner as to prevent the defendant from drilling to a lower level for the purpose of developing artesian water.

There seems to be no substantial conflict in the evidence as to the amount properly chargeable to the defendant for casing and other materials, but it does not appear what part of the payments made by the defendant should be credited on the cost of such materials. It seems necessary, therefore, to reverse the entire judgment.

[6] Appellant contends that the contract fixes the compensation for drilling beyond the minimum of 300 feet at 50 cents a foot for the first 100 feet and for each succeeding 100 feet 50 cents a foot above the compensation for the next preceding 100 feet. Viewing the contract in the light of practical experience, it is clear that the plaintiff was to receive $3.25 a foot for the first 300 feet, $3.75 a foot for the next 100 feet, and for each succeeding 100 feet 50 cents a foot above the compensation for the next preceding 100 feet.

The judgment is reversed.

GREENWOOD v. GREENWOOD.★
(Civ. 3916.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 9, 1929.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 6, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨882(5)—Defendant, on appeal from order refusing to vacate final divorce decree on cross-complaint, could not complain for first time that her own amendment to cross-complaint was not reduced to writing and filed.

Where, during course of trial in divorce action, court at instance of defendant, without objection from plaintiff, permitted cross-complaint to be amended so as to pray for divorce, and all subsequent testimony and proceedings were upon theory that amendment had been actually made, defendant, on appeal from order refusing to vacate final decree of divorce rendered on cross-complaint, could not for first time raise objection that prayer of cross-complaint was not formally amended, especially since defendant obtained permission to make amendment and it was her own neglect that such amendment was not reduced to writing and filed with clerk.

2. Divorce ⇨154—Court in contested divorce case may grant any particular relief authorized by facts proved or admitted.

Where divorce action is contested, court has jurisdiction to grant any particular relief authorized by facts and alleged and proved or admitted, and is not limited to relief demanded in prayer of cross-complaint, since in such cases jurisdiction to grant any particular relief does not depend on prayer of complaint or cross-complaint but upon issues made by pleadings.

3. Divorce ⇨165(1)—Trial court, after expiration of period for attacking interlocutory divorce decree, held without jurisdiction to set aside decree (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

After expiration of period within which interlocutory decree of divorce may be attacked on appeal in proceedings in which it was entered, or six months after entry of interlocutory decree, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, trial court is without jurisdiction to alter or set aside interlocutory decree.

4. Divorce ⇨156—Husband, after wife's interlocutory divorce decree became final and one year elapsed after entry, had absolute right to final decree without notice (Civ. Code, § 132).

Where wife obtaining interlocutory decree of divorce on cross-complaint permitted such decree to become final, and one year elapsed after its entry, husband had absolute right, under Civ. Code, § 132, to have final decree entered, and no notice of entry of same was required to be given wife.

5. Appeal and error ⇨876—Divorce ⇨184(1)—Contentions reviewable on appeal from interlocutory divorce decree cannot be reviewed upon appeal from final decree or order refusing to set it aside (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 473, 956).

Contentions on appeal from order refusing to vacate final decree of divorce, all relating to matter occurring prior to entry of interlocutory decree and subject to review on appeal from such decree had appeal been taken, cannot be made subject of review upon appeal from final decree or from order denying motion to set aside final decree, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, in view of section 956, providing that provisions of section do not authorize review of any decision or order from which an appeal might have been taken.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action for divorce by S. J. Greenwood against Victoria R. Greenwood, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint. From an order denying the motion to set aside the final decree of divorce on cross-complaint, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Newby & Newby, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Andreani & Haines, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendant, Victoria R. Greenwood, from an order denying her motion to set aside a final decree of divorce entered in her favor.

The record reveals the following facts: S. J. Greenwood, the respondent, and Victoria R. Greenwood, the appellant, were formerly husband and wife. On July 29, 1922, they settled their property rights and separated. On March 4, 1924, the respondent filed a complaint in divorce in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, against appellant, charging her with desertion, and further alleging that there was no community property. Appellant answered, denying desertion on her part, and alleging that there was community property amounting to more than $200,000, and also filed a cross-complaint alleging desertion on the part of respondent. The prayer of the cross-complaint reads: "Wherefore, defendant and cross-complainant prays that she be awarded reasonable attorney's fees, court costs and support pendente lite, and that the court, in granting permanent support, shall make disposition of the community property the same as though the marriage were dissolved."

Thereafter, and on June 16, 1924, appellant filed a supplemental cross-complaint, charging respondent with adultery, and again alleging there was community property, and concluding with the identical prayer as in the original cross-complaint. In neither the cross-complaint nor the supplemental cross-complaint, as originally filed, did appellant pray for a divorce. The respondent filed answers denying the matters alleged in both cross-complaints, and the case came on regularly for trial on July 1, 1925, upon the issues raised by the foregoing pleadings.

During the progress of the trial, and before the taking of testimony was concluded, the following proceedings occurred in open court and in the presence of appellant and respondent: "Mr. Greer (who was the attorney for defendant and cross-complainant in the trial court): We ask leave to amend the prayer of our first cross-complaint in this manner only, that where we pray for separate maintenance we pray for a decree dissolving the bonds of matrimony and an interlocutory decree of divorce. The rest of the prayer with reference to the division of the property we do not care to amend. The Court: That amendment may be made. Mr. Bisher (the attorney for plaintiff and respondent): Yes, I have no objection."

The trial was then resumed and proceeded to final conclusion upon the pleadings as amended and upon the issues joined therein, without objection from appellant, but no written amendment or interlineation was actually made to the complaint or filed with the clerk.

During the progress of the trial, the appellant attempted to show that the property settlement entered into between the parties was unjust and inequitable as to her, but the court made findings, which are supported by ample evidence, contrary to her contention. The court also found that the allegation of adultery was not true, and that appellant did not desert respondent, but, on the contrary, found that appellant's allegation of desertion on the part of respondent was true, and granted her an interlocutory decree of divorce upon that ground. The findings and decree were signed and entered on October 27, 1925. No appeal was taken, or attempted to be taken, from the interlocutory decree of divorce; neither was any motion made to set aside or modify the same.

On November 1, 1926, on motion of respondent, S. J. Greenwood, the final decree of divorce, following the terms of the interlocutory decree, was entered. Thereafter, and on April 26, 1927, appellant filed a notice of motion to vacate said final decree of divorce upon the following grounds: "Said motion will be made on the ground that said decree was entered without notice to the defendant and because of excusable neglect of defendant, and the fraud of plaintiff in causing said final decree to be entered before the defendant's case had been fully presented to the judge for decision, and will be made in pursuance of the terms of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the State of California, and will be based upon the annexed affidavits and judgment roll, files and records in the above entitled action."

This motion was made on April 29, 1927, and submitted upon affidavits made in support and in opposition to the motion. The trial court, after fully considering the matter, denied the motion on July 7, 1927, and this appeal is prosecuted from the order denying said motion.

Appellant first contends that the trial court had no power to grant her an interlocutory decree of divorce on her cross-complaint, for the reason that the prayer of the cross-complaint only asked for separate maintenance and a division of the community property, and not for divorce, and that no amendment to the prayer of the cross-complaint was ever made or filed with the clerk of the court.

[1] There is no merit in this contention. It is true that the change in the prayer of the cross-complaint was not actually reduced to writing and filed with the clerk, but it was ordered by the court at the request of appellant's attorney and stipulated to by respondent's attorney, and all subsequent testimony and proceedings were taken and had upon the theory that the amendment had been actually made. Under such circumstances, it is now too late for appellant to raise the objection in this court for the first time that the prayer of the cross-complaint was never formally amended as ordered by the court. Murphy v. Stelling, 8 Cal. App. 706, 97 P. 672; Shaw v. Union Escrow, etc., Co., 53 Cal. App. 71, 200 P. 25. Certainly, appellant cannot be heard to complain that no written amendment was actually made to the prayer of her cross-complaint, in view of the fact that she obtained permission from the court to make the amendment, and it was her own neglect that such amendment was not reduced to writing and filed with the clerk.

[2] Furthermore, the case at bar, being a contested case, the court had jurisdiction to grant any particular relief authorized by the facts and alleged and proved or admitted, and was not limited to the relief demanded in the prayer of the cross-complaint. Murphy v. Stelling, supra; D'Arcy v. D'Arcy, 89 Cal. App. 90, 264 P. 497; 14 Cal. Juris. 986; Goetting v. Goetting, 80 Cal. App. 369, 252 P. 656; Woods C. I. Ditch Co. v. Porter S. Ditch Co., 173 Cal. 153, 159 P. 427; Nathan v. Dierssen, 164 Cal. 611, 130 P. 12. In such cases, the jurisdiction of the court to grant any particular relief does not depend on the prayer of the complaint or cross-complaint, but upon the issues made by the pleadings.

[3] It is well settled that an interlocutory decree of divorce is only subject to attack in the proceedings in which it is entered upon appeal, or by proceedings under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, within six months after the entry of such decree, and that, after the expiration of the period within which either of these forms of attack may be made, the trial court is without jurisdiction to alter or set aside its interlocutory decree. Gould v. Superior Court, 47 Cal. App. 200, 191 P. 56; Suttman v. Superior Court, 174 Cal. 243, 162 P. 1032; Bancroft v. Bancroft, 178 Cal. 368, 173 P. 582; Abbott v. Superior Court, 69 Cal. App. 660, 232 P. 154; Bacigalupi v. Bacigalupi, 72 Cal. App. 658, 238 P. 93; Gillespie v. Andrews, 78 Cal. App. 598, 248 P. 715; Claudius v. Melvin, 146 Cal. 257, 79 P. 897; Reed v. Reed, 9 Cal. App. 748, 100

[4] Therefore, appellant having permitted the interlocutory decree of divorce to become final and one year having elapsed after its entry, the respondent had an absolute right to have the final decree entered, and no notice of the entry of the same was required to be given appellant. Section 132, Civ. Code; Claudius v. Melvin, supra; Suttman v. Superior Court, supra.

[5] Other contentions are made by appellant for a reversal of the order appealed from, but they all relate to matter which occurred prior to the entry of the interlocutory decree of divorce, and were therefore the subject of review on appeal from the interlocutory decree, had such appeal been taken, and hence cannot be made the subject of review upon an appeal from a final decree of divorce, or an appeal from an order denying a motion to set aside the final decree of divorce, made under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Bancroft v. Bancroft, 178 Cal. 366, 173 P. 585; section 956, Code Civ. Proc.; Suttman v. Superior Court, supra; Newell v. Superior Court, supra; Reed v. Reed, supra; Claudius v. Melvin, supra.

We have, however, considered all the points discussed upon this appeal, and find that none of them possesses sufficient merit to have warranted a reversal had an appeal been properly taken from the interlocutory decree.

We find no merit whatever in the appeal. The order is therefore affirmed.

R. Parrott, attempted to sell to a corporation known as the Lone Wolf Oil Company, in which said corporation defendants were interested as officers or stockholders, a property at Signal Hill, California, known as Thompson Well No. 5; that in connection with and incident to the said attempt of plaintiff, as the representative of said Parrott, to sell to said corporation said Thompson Well No. 5, the said plaintiff made a number of trips from Riverside, California, to Orange, California, to Long Beach, California, and to Los Angeles, California; that said trips were not made for or in behalf of these defendants, or any of them, or for or in behalf of said corporation; that on the 16th day of January, 1924, and immediately prior to the execution of said promissory note, the said plaintiff stated to defendants that he considered $50.00 a trip a reasonable charge for said trips and that his total charge for such trips, together with incidental expenses, aggregated about $1,400.00 and that if the defendants would execute and deliver to him their note for that amount he would not hold defendants liable on said note and would not collect said promissory note unless it could be collected as additional damages which he alleged he could collect from the said Fisher, Parrott, and Fleming; that thereupon the defendant G. G. Beckmann stated that if the plaintiff would agree not to collect said promissory note from defendants and would agree to not collect said note at all unless it could be collected as damages from said Fisher, Parrott and Fleming out of a settlement which plaintiff then and there stated he was about to effect in behalf of defendants of their claim against said Fisher, Parrott and Fleming, or out of a suit which he stated he was about to prosecute against said Fisher, Parrott and Fleming on said claim, if a settlement and adjustment could not otherwise be procured, that then the defendants would agree to give to plaintiff a promissory note not merely for the said $1,400.00, but for $1,500.00; that thereupon the said plaintiff and all of said defendants agreed and assented to said proposal and the defendants then and there executed and delivered to plaintiff said promissory note and the said plaintiff received said promissory note under and pursuant to the said understanding and agreement, and not otherwise."

Want of consideration is pleaded as a second further and separate answer and defense to plaintiff's complaint, in which it is alleged that none of the defendants received any consideration or anything of value for the promissory notes set out in the first paragraph of plaintiff's said complaint, or for the execution or delivery thereof, and that no other person with the consent of defendants or of any of them, received any consideration or anything of value from said plaintiff for the said promissory note or for the execution and delivery thereof; that there was and is an entire absence and want of consideration for the said promissory note and for the execution and delivery thereof; and that, at the time defendants executed and delivered to plaintiff said promissory note, none of said defendants was indebted to plaintiff in any sum.

On the presentation of the issues raised by the pleadings to the jury, counsel for plaintiff objected to the separate answer and defense, setting up the alleged contemporaneous promise and agreement of plaintiff that he would not hold the makers of said note obligated to its payment, but would collect it from the third parties named, on the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and contains matters evidentiary in nature, and furthermore does not constitute a defense.

The objection was presented and argued before the court, in the absence of the jury, on the ground that the alleged defense was an attempt to vary the terms of the written contract and that the execution of a contract in writing supersedes all the negotiations or stipulations concerning it, which preceded or accompanied the execution of the instrument, and that a contract in writing may be altered only by a contract in writing, or by an executed oral agreement. The court overruled the objection, and permitted the issue so raised by the answer to be presented to the jury, and evidence to be given in support thereof.

[1] This ruling was apparently made by the trial court on the theory that the facts alleged were such as might properly be considered as going to the defense of want of consideration for the note. It is apparent that the principal question involved in this appeal arises upon this special defense of a contemporaneous oral agreement to relieve defendants from liability on the note and the admission, over plaintiff's objection, of testimony in support thereof. The rule is too well settled to admit of controversy or require citation of authorities, that the terms of a written contract cannot be altered by any such oral agreement of the parties, whether made prior to, contemporaneously with, or subsequent to, the execution of the writing, unless the agreement has been fully executed. In this case the defendants entered into a specific agreement to pay to the plaintiff the sum of $1,500, for a consideration which is expressly stated, and which is presumed from the nature of the instrument. There is no contention that this agreement was reached through any fraud or mistake or undue influence. The defendants pleaded and presented the defense of a failure of consideration, which they had a right to do, and, if the verdict of the jury was arrived at from competent evidence showing a want of consideration for the promise of defendants alone, and was not influenced by testimony given of the contemporaneous oral promise not to enforce payment of the note against them, but to look to third parties for payment, the verdict can be properly sustained. On the other hand, if the parol evidence of this agreement to release the defendants from liability was such as to affect the minds and decision of the jury as an independent agreement, irrespective of the question of a valuable consideration for the promise to pay, the admission of such evidence was palpably reversible error.

[2] The question as to the consideration for which the note was given, was properly presented to the jury, and, while there is some evidence, though of an unsatisfactory nature, to indicate that the professional services rendered by the plaintiff, which form the alleged consideration for the note, were rendered pursuant to an understanding with plaintiff that they were not to be paid for by defendants, but were his own contributions to a mutual enterprise in which they were all engaged, such evidence is far from conclusive against the plaintiff. All of the defendants, makers of the note, testified in categorical denial, that they or either of them at any time employed plaintiff for the services rendered, or that he was to be paid for the services rendered, but, in the face of these declarations, it was conclusively shown, not only by the testimony of the plaintiff himself, but that of each of the defendants, that plaintiff, during a considerable period of time, rendered legal services to the defendants in the organization of a corporation of which defendants were officers and directors and prospective stockholders, and the negotiation of a contract for the purchase by this corporation of an oil well known as Thompson well No. 5, at Signal Hill. While it is claimed by defendants that plaintiff was acting for the owners of this well, with the expectation of receiving a generous commission in case the sale was perfected, and not with the expectation of compensation from defendants, it does appear conclusively from the evidence that he was acting and accepted by defendants as their legal advisor in these matters, and that he was employed by them to effect the organization of this corporation, known as the Lone Wolf Oil Company. They had advanced him $400 to meet the expenses of the incorporation, and had met with him repeatedly in consultation as to the carrying out of the enterprise.

[3] It appears without dispute that the principal sum contracted for under this promissory note was made up in conference with the defendants, as the reasonable charges for services rendered, including some twenty or thirty trips from Riverside to Orange, Santa Ana, and Los Angeles, in pursuance of this business, and that the amount arrived at, included in the note, was agreed to as the reasonable compensation for such services; the only controversy between the parties being as to who was to pay the bill. It was conceded by all parties in their testimony that the proposed oil well purchase fell through by reason of default on the part of the owners to make a good title to the property, and the agreement arrived at between plaintiff and defendants was that an action should be brought against the owners of the property, in the superior court of Los Angeles county, to recover damages for the failure to make good on their agreement of sale, and it is the theory testified to by the defendants, that the amount of compensation to plaintiff incorporated in this promissory note, and which they had obligated themselves to pay, was part of the damages to be recovered in this suit. If the defendants' own theory of the case is correct, they were attempting to recover the principal sum of this note from the owners of the oil well property, on the theory that it was part of the obligations they had contracted, in attempting to carry out the purchase of the oil well. If, as a matter of fact, they had not incurred this obligation to the plaintiff for his services, this scheme to charge the amount of liability they had thus incurred to the people with whom they were dealing, as part of their damages, was clearly an attempted fraud on their part, and ought, in good conscience, to estop them from claiming want of consideration for the note in question. However that may be, we cannot escape the conclusion that the admission of testimony on the part of defendants showing an express oral agreement on the part of plaintiff to relieve and exonerate the defendants from liability on this note, materially influenced the jury in arriving at its verdict, and that the admission of the same was reversible error, especially in view of the very questionable weight of the testimony as to failure of consideration.

It is true that the case was submitted to the jury on this issue of want of consideration alone, and the instructions given, so far as they went, were appropriate to that issue; but the jury was not instructed to disregard any evidence of the parol agreement of the plaintiff, to relieve defendants from liability and look to the third parties named for his pay. And, even had such an instruction been given, it is doubtful if it would have removed from the minds of the jury the influence of such parol agreement, if they believed it had been actually entered into and relied upon by defendants.

The judgment is reversed, and a new trial granted.

MacGREGOR v. KNOWLDEN et al. ★
(Civ. 7058.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 16, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 16, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 13, 1930.

1. Deeds ⇨93—Intention of parties to deeds must be ascertained and carried out.

Primary rule of interpretation of deeds is to ascertain and carry out the intention of parties thereto.

2. Deeds ⇨115—False call will be disregarded, to make description harmonize with actual facts and conditions.

A false call in a deed will be disregarded, in order to make description harmonize with actual facts and conditions.

3. Deeds ⇨115—Deed referring to previous conveyances excluding right of way excepted only 40-foot strip in accordance with previous conveyance, regardless of reference to 60-foot strip.

Deed conveying property with the exception of right of way consisting of a 40-foot strip in accordance with reference to previous conveyance conveyed all the property with the exception of right of way strip, regardless of reference therein to right of way as a 60-foot strip, which must be disregarded as a false call.

4. Deeds ⇨114(4)—Amount of acreage as to right of way excepted in deed would not control outstanding intention to except that theretofore conveyed.

Amount of acreage stated in deed as excepted for right of way would not control outstanding intention of deed to except that which had been theretofore conveyed, and consequently not owned by grantor, particularly in view of words "more or less," indicating that exact amount of acreage should not be controlling factor, and should yield to other more definite parts of description.

5. Deeds ⇨140—Location of right of way fences was immaterial, in determining width of strip excepted in deed, without claim of railroad thereto.

Location of fences on railroad right of way was immaterial, in determining width of strip excepted in deed excluding right of way in accordance with conveyance theretofore made, in view of fact that there was no claim of railroad involved, and no question of estoppel nor of adverse possession.

6. Boundaries ⇨3(3)—True boundary line, used as monument, controls distance call.

A known boundary line may be a monument as well as a physical object on the ground, and, when such boundary line is used as a monument, the true boundary line is indicated rather than the conventional one, and as such controls distance call.

7. Boundaries ⇨3(3)—True right of way controlled over distance call in deed conveying land bounded by right of way.

Under deed conveying land to right of way boundary, the true boundary, including 10-foot strip inclosed by right of way fence, controlled distance call in deed, in absence of intention on part of grantor to reserve to himself any land between true right of way and land conveyed by deed.

8. Appeal and error ⇨901—Appellants have burden of showing error on appeal, regardless of burden of proof at trial.

Burden of showing error on appeal is on appellants, regardless of rule as to burden of proof at trial.

9. Evidence ⇨265(5)—Deeds, maps, and other evidence, constituting declarations against interest, were not conclusive in action to quiet title, but merely presented question of fact.

Deeds, maps, and other evidence, constituting declarations against interest by predecessors of plaintiffs in action to quiet title, were not conclusive, but merely presented question of fact for court.

10. Quieting title ⚡43—Plaintiff in action to quiet title was not prevented from introducing deeds other than those mentioned in amended complaint.

Amended complaint in action to quiet title, alleging conveyances and concluding by allegation that both plaintiff and defendant claimed title from a common source, did not prevent plaintiff, in proof of title, from introducing other deeds in evidence than those mentioned in amended complaint.

11. Quieting title ⚡51—Defendants were not entitled to judgment quieting title merely because of plaintiff's failure to prove title to property.

Defendants in action to quiet title were not entitled to judgment quieting title to property by reason of failure of plaintiff to prove title to certain portion of property involved, where evidence showed title to be outstanding in third person.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Action by C. M. MacGregor against Bertha McKenzie Knowlden and another, wherein defendants filed a cross-complaint. From the judgment, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Robert E. Knowlden, of Oakland (John C. Stirrat, of Oakland, of counsel), for appellants.

Robert B. Gaylord, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. This is an action to quiet title to certain long strips of land 10 feet wide adjoining the two sides of the 40-foot right of way of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company, hereinafter called the Santa Fé. The strips of land are in Albany, Alameda county, and are bisected by Main street where it crosses the railroad track, thus making the strips of land into four separate parcels; each parcel being the subject of a separate cause of action in the complaint. The plaintiff obtained judgment quieting his title to the three parcels of land described in the first three of the four causes of action of his complaint. Defendants, who are also cross-complainants, obtained judgment quieting their title to the fourth parcel. Defendants appeal from the judgment in favor of the plaintiff upon the first three causes.

Appellants claim title to the land described in the complaint under a quitclaim deed executed to them in September, 1925, by George Sterling. The deed conveyed to them whatever interest the said grantor may have had in the said strips of land at that time. The said George Sterling is the common predecessor of the parties to this action. Respondent claims title under a chain of conveyances, the first being two conveyances by the said Sterling in 1906.

Going back of Sterling in the chain of title, to explain the origin of the right of way, we find that in February, 1884, the Pacific Improvement Company, owner of two-thirds, and Maria Hall, owner of one-third, by separate instruments, conveyed to the California & Nevada Railroad Company the railroad right of way hereinabove referred to. These deeds, in granting the right of way, described it by metes and bounds. It was 40 feet in width (not 60 feet). The deeds stated that the strip contained 5.73 acres of land. Afterwards, on the 12th of October, 1906, Pacific Improvement Company conveyed to George Sterling, and on the 27th day of November, 1906, H. W. Carpentier conveyed to George Sterling a large tract of land surrounding the said right of way. The descriptions in these two deeds were identical. They contained a number of exceptions. One of these exceptions was the railroad right of way. It read: "Saving and excepting therefrom the following tracts or parcels of land heretofore conveyed, viz.: * * * 5.73 acres for right of way to the California & Nevada Railroad Company February 23, 1884."

Very shortly thereafter the said Sterling made the two conveyances which start the chain of title to the respondent. These deeds were, first, Sterling to North Berkeley Land Company, dated October 13, 1906, which relates only to the third cause of action herein; and, second, Sterling to Spring, dated December 7, 1906, which relates to the first and second causes of action herein. The deed from Sterling to Spring conveyed that part of Sterling's property which lay north of Main street. It included and conveyed the strips of land described in the first and second causes of action unless the said deed, in excepting from its description the railroad strip, had the legal effect of excepting a 60-foot strip instead of a 40-foot strip of land. The exception in this deed reads as follows: "Excepting therefrom a strip of land 60 feet in width heretofore conveyed by the Pacific Improvement Company to the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad Company, containing 4.32 acres, more or less, and being within the boundaries of the above described tract." It appears, therefore, that Sterling received title to the land surrounding and including that described in the first and second causes of action by deeds which clearly excepted the identical 40-foot right of way which had theretofore been conveyed, whereas in the conveyance by which he parted with his title he excepted a right of way which he referred to as a 60-foot strip of land theretofore conveyed. From this discrepancy arises the litigation with respect to the first and second causes of action.

It was stipulated at the trial that the California & Nevada Railroad Company, to which company the right of way was conveyed in 1884, was a predecessor of the Santa Fé, that the latter company succeeded to the rights of the former prior to 1905, that it used and occupied the right of way ever since the last-named date, and that the railroad tracks were then and now within the 40-foot strip. It was also stipulated that there was no record of any conveyance which transferred the 10-foot strips in controversy to the Santa Fé. Testimony was stipulated to the effect that the Santa Fé Railway Company claimed no more than a 40-foot right of way, and that it claimed the same only under the deeds of 1884 hereinabove described.

Respondent claims that the exception in this deed operated to except only the 40 feet theretofore conveyed, or it excepted nothing at all on account of its ambiguity. If it excepted nothing at all, or if it excepted only 40 feet, the title to the 10-foot strips in either case passed by Sterling's deeds to respondent's predecessors, and was not retained by Sterling after the execution of said deeds until 1925, when he executed a quitclaim deed to the appellants.

[1-3] The primary rule of interpretation of deeds is to ascertain and carry out the intention of the parties. It does not seem reasonable that Sterling intended to except a 60-foot strip of land when he executed to respondent's predecessors the deed above mentioned. The language of the exception refers to a strip of land theretofore conveyed by the Pacific Improvement Company to the Santa Fé Railway Company. This description is not satisfied by a 60-foot strip, because no 60-foot strip had ever been so conveyed. Of course, it would be quite possible for Sterling to have reserved to himself for some purpose a 10-foot strip on either side of the Santa Fé 40-foot right of way. The deed does not show this intention, however, for he reserves nothing to himself, and excepts only that which had been theretofore conveyed away to the Santa Fé Railway by his (Sterling's) predecessors. The strip of land intended to be excepted by Sterling must necessarily have been the right of way conveyed in 1884, for that was the only right of way in existence and the only strip theretofore conveyed. This was the rule applied in Grennan v. McGregor, 78 Cal. 258, 262, 20 P. 559. On the other hand, if the only right of way in existence was of such a nature that it could not possibly have been in the minds of the parties using the language found in the deed, then it was no exception whatsoever, and in that case the said deed of Sterling would have operated to convey all the title that he had within the exterior boundaries of the property described. Lange v. Waters, 156 Cal. 142, 146, 103 P. 889, 19 Ann. Cas. 1207.

Under this construction the title to the land in the 60-foot strip outside the 40-foot strip would have passed by the deed. If the exception is an exception at all, it is so because of the application of the rule that a false call will be disregarded, in order to make the description harmonize with actual facts and conditions. Irving v. Cunningham, 66 Cal. 15, 16, 4 P. 766; Los Angeles, etc., Land Co. v. Marr, 178 Cal. 243, 173 P. 83. The exception referred to a previous conveyance. That conveyance once found is the most definite description. It speaks for itself. When once found, the incorrect particulars of the description of that conveyance will give way. The particulars are given to describe and identify a previous conveyance, and, when that conveyance is ascertained from the fact that it is the only one in existence, the false particulars are discarded as useless. Under this rule the expression 60 feet must be disregarded as a false call, with the result that only a 40-foot strip is excluded by this exception from the major description. This we hold to be the correct interpretation of this exception in the Sterling-Spring deed.

[4] The amount of acreage of the railroad strip excepted is stated in the Sterling to Spring deed to be "4.32 acres more or less." Appellants state that this acreage corresponds with a 60-foot strip, instead of a 40-foot strip. The amount of acreage would not control the outstanding intention of the deed to except that which had been theretofore conveyed, and consequently not owned by the grantor. The acreage, following mathematically from the statement of 60 feet, is a false call in the same way that the 60 feet is a false call. The words "more or less" also indicate that the exact amount of acreage should not be the controlling factor, and should yield to other more definite parts of the description.

[5] Appellants assert that at the time of the Sterling-Spring deed there were fences standing upon the ground which inclosed a 60-foot strip of land, through the middle of which ran the railroad 40-foot strip. The evidence does not disclose who built these fences, but appellants assume they were built by the railroad company, which would exclude any of the predecessors in interest of the parties hereto. Neither does the evidence show when the fences were built, but Mr. Prather testified that they were there in the year 1906—exact date not stated. The existence of fences as stated might be of considerable importance in a controversy between adjoining landowners, as if the railroad claimed the strip as fenced.

In this controversy there is no question of estoppel, nor of adverse possession. Presumably the fences remained, and were there when appellants obtained their deed, as well as when respondent's predecessors obtained and made their deeds. If the fences were there a few days prior to the time Sterling deeded to Spring, then they were also there when the property was deeded to Sterling. The parties hereto are litigating the title as it may be established by the conveyances in evidence. The existence of fences is not to be denied its evidentiary value, but that value in this case is small. The fences were not mentioned in the conveyances, but the original conveyance of the right of way was mentioned. Here Sterling conveyed all his land within the exterior boundaries given on both sides of the railroad track, and purported to except only a strip theretofore conveyed to the railroad, and exhibited no intention to reserve anything for himself, his heirs, or assigns. No reason exists to believe that he intended to convey only to the fence, and reserve for himself and assigns whatever he owned beyond the fence and adjoining the 40-foot right of way.

We now take up the third cause of action of the complaint. Sterling obtained title to this land at the same time and by the same two deeds by which he acquired title to the land described in the first and second causes of action. He conveyed this land by his deed to North Berkeley Land Company October 13, 1906. If the eastern boundary line of the land conveyed by this deed was a 40-foot right of way of the Santa Fé, then the 10-foot strip of land described in the third cause of action of the complaint herein passed by that deed from Sterling and by other succeeding conveyances to the respondent herein. But if the said eastern boundary line of the land conveyed by said deed was a 60-foot right of way of the Santa Fé, then Sterling retained for himself, and did not convey at that time, the said 10-foot strip, in which case he retained it until 1925, and conveyed it by the quitclaim deed which he executed to the appellants herein. The deed, so far as material on this point, describes the property conveyed as follows:

"Bounded on the west by San Pablo avenue, on the south by Cordonices creek, on the east by the right of way of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé R. R. and on the north by the county road, and more particularly described as follows:

"Beginning at a point formed by the intersection of the center line of Cordonices creek and the easterly line of San Pablo avenue, thence north 14 degrees 11' west 2,519.65 feet to a point on the south line of the county road, forming the northwest corner hereof, thence north 86 degrees 3' east 1,554.91 feet to a point on the west line of the right of way of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé R. R. which point forms the northeast corner hereof, thence along the west line of said right of way south 14 degrees 11' east," etc.

[6, 7] As already shown herein, the evidence establishes that the only right of way in existence was that which was more accurately described in the deeds by which the right of way was originally created. Appellants claim that the evidence conclusively establishes that the distance call for the north boundary is 10 feet less than the actual distance from the northwest corner of the tract conveyed to the Santa Fé 40-foot right of way. Conceding this claim, nevertheless the right of way was a monument and as such it controlled the distance call of 1,554.91 feet. A known boundary line may be a monument as well as a physical object upon the ground (Bartlett Land Co. v. Saunders, 103 U. S. 316, 26 L. Ed. 546), and when such boundary line is used as a monument, the true boundary line is indicated rather than the conventional line (Umberger v. Chaboya, 49 Cal. 525, 538). In fact, the property is first described as bounded by four monuments and the distances and calls are given afterwards as particulars of the general description. For this reason also the true right of way, and not the length of the north boundary of the tract, should control. It is like conveying a tract by name. Haley v. Amestoy, 44 Cal. 132. As in the case of the deed from Sterling to Spring, we see in this deed no intention of the grantor to reserve to himself any land between the true right of way and the land conveyed by this deed. For these reasons, the deed should be interpreted as conveying, and not reserving, the 10-foot strip described in the third cause of action.

The remaining points to be considered relate to one or more of the first three causes of action indiscriminately.

[8] Some of the deeds in the respondent's chain of title contain exceptions of certain parcels of land. Appellants assert that the burden of proof was upon the respondent to identify and lay out said exceptions upon the ground in such a way as to prove that none of them excepted any part of the parcels of land in litigation here. Whatever may be the rule about the burden of proof at the trial on this point, the burden of showing error upon this appeal is upon the appellants. To assume this latter burden, appellants should either assert or show that the descriptions in the deeds show upon their face that the exceptions complained of do cut into the respondent's title, or at least show that it cannot be ascertained from the face of the deeds whether the exceptions do or do not cut into it. They have done neither.

Nevertheless, by plotting out the descriptions and exceptions concerning which no parol testimony was given, we find that, from the face of the instruments in which they appear, each exception is a considerable distance away from any of the three strips of land involved on this appeal. Regarding the exception of a 400-foot strip in the Sterling-Spring deed, parol testimony was given for the purpose of locating it with respect to the strips here in litigation. Appellants' only point in respect to this exception is that respondent "only vaguely located" it. Respondent, however, has pointed out testimony of civil engineer E. C. Prather to the effect that this exception neither lies within nor overlaps any of the strips of land described in the complaint. No sufficient reason is urged by appellants to justify this court in rejecting this testimony which evidently the trial court believed and followed.

This disposes of all the exceptions enumerated by the appellants.

[9] Scattered through appellants' briefs are many references to deeds, maps and other parts of the evidence which it is stated constitute declarations against interest by the respondent's predecessors. Appellants have not definitely stated what point they make of this matter. It is stated that these things were admissible evidence; but this evidence was not excluded. It was admitted by the court. This evidence was not conclusive, but presented a question of fact for the court. Respondent has also pointed out declarations and admissions against appellants' interest to the effect that the Santa Fé right of way was and is only 40 feet wide and which declarations were admissible against the appellants. On this subject the comments of the parties hereto lead nowhere. Neither party hereto has any advantage upon this score except as the court may have weighed this evidence. At most these things tend to prove that the discrepancies and errors in conveyancing were not discovered by any interested party until shortly before this litigation was commenced.

[10] In the amended complaint respondent alleged title generally, then alleged the conveyances to and from Sterling and concluded the paragraph by alleging that both respondent and appellants claimed title from a common source of title. This, of course, did not prevent respondent in his proof of title from introducing other deeds in evidence than those mentioned in the amended complaint. The allegations only purported to indicate how the source of title of both parties was the same. It was proper for respondent to introduce in evidence all of the conveyances in his chain of title and any additional conveyances necessary to explain references in those in his direct chain.

[11] It developed in the evidence that the respondent's deed from Spring Estate Company did not convey that part of parcel No. 1 which lies north of Brighton avenue. The court, therefore, quieted respondent's title to only the remainder of the parcel described in count No. 1, namely, that part lying south of said Brighton avenue. The part to the north was awarded to neither party. The appellants herein contend that, because respondent failed to prove title to this portion of parcel No. 1, the judgment should have decreed that the same belonged to the appellants, even though the evidence showed no better title in appellants than in respondent. This contention is based upon the rule that in a quiet title action the plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title and, not upon the weakness of the defendants' title. From this rule it, of course, follows that respondent was not entitled to judgment to this part of parcel No. 1.

If this were the only property involved in the action, appellants would be entitled to judgment for costs; but the appellants, simply upon the failure of proof of respondent's title were not entitled to affirmative relief in the form of a decree declaring them to be the owners, when the evidence showed the title to be outstanding in the Spring Estate Company, and not in the appellants. The finding and judgment with respect to this part of parcel No. 1 was correct under the evidence. It determined the title as between the parties in accordance with the facts in evidence.

This disposes of all the points urged by appellants as grounds for reversal.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

pliance with the terms of said order of appointment.

Appellant was appointed administrator upon the nomination of the widow of said decedent. He had previously filed in this proceeding an alleged will bearing date of March 17, 1926, which failed of probate because of defective execution, and there had also been called to the attention of the court an instrument designated a "marriage contract," purporting to be testamentary in character. The court, however, after consideration of these documents, granted appellant's petition for letters. Thereafter one of decedent's sons, George E. Heuler, in another proceeding, presented, with his petition for its probate, said so-called "marriage contract," the validity of which as the last will of the deceased is established by our recent decision affirming the judgment admitting it to probate. Heuler's Estate (Cal. Sup.) 278 P. 1031. Said son likewise filed his petition herein seeking revocation of the letters issued to appellant upon the ground that the deceased did not die intestate, but left a will, then being propounded for probate, which said widow and said administrator had failed and refused to present. After trial of the contest instituted by the widow against the probate of said document and upon overruling of the demurrer filed on behalf of said administrator, without giving him opportunity to file further pleadings, the court made said order here appealed from, revoking the letters of administration theretofore issued to him.

The nomination of the widow remaining unrevoked, in the absence of any ground for his disqualification, appellant is clearly entitled to administer the estate in preference and priority to any child of decedent or any other person. In this behalf, section 1350a of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "If no executor is named in the will * * * letters of administration with the will annexed must be issued as designated and provided for in granting of letters in case of intestacy." Section 1365 of said Code provides: "Administration of the estate of a person dying intestate must be granted to some one or more of the persons hereinafter mentioned, * * * and they are, respectively, entitled thereto in the following order: 1. The surviving husband or wife, or some competent person whom he or she may request to have appointed; 2. The children; 3. * * *" Many cases announce this rule: Estate of Garber, 74 Cal. 338, 16 P. 233; Estate of McDonald, 118 Cal. 277, 50 P. 399; Estate of Crites, 155 Cal. 392, 101 P. 316; Estate of Winbiger, 166 Cal. 434, 137 P. 1; Estate of Wyman, 182 Cal. 645, 189 P. 267; Estate of Rees, 60 Cal. App. 92, 96, 97, 212 P. 234.

The record fails to offer any support whatsoever for the allegation in the petition for revocation that appellant and said widow failed and refused to present said will for probate. Indeed, the document was not in their possession. Furthermore, the fact that said widow contested the action of said son to test the validity of the instrument as a will is immaterial. Upon the hearing, appellant repeatedly stated that, if the instrument were admitted to probate, he, as nominee of the widow, was entitled to letters of administration with the will annexed. The court, having admitted the document to probate, had no discretion to determine to whom letters should issue. It could not add to the statutory disqualifications prescribed by sections 1350 and 1369 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, being qualified thereunder, said widow or her nominee, as above stated, had the absolute right to letters. Estate of Brundage, 141 Cal. 538, 75 P. 175; Estate of Randall, 177 Cal. 363, 170 P. 835; Estate of Rees, supra.

Upon the above grounds we base our conclusion first herein announced.

Supreme Court of California Nov. 20, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 19, 1929.

Municipal corporations §63(1)—Determination by legislative body of city as to sufficiency of petition for consolidation of municipalities is conclusive, in absence of fraud (St. 1913, p. 577, § 2).

Determination by board of trustees or city council as to sufficiency of petition under St. 1913, p. 577, § 2, relating to consolidation of municipalities, is final and conclusive, and not subject to review by courts, in absence of any allegation that legislative body acted fraudulently in matter.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Proceeding by Henry L. Fresholtz and others for writ of mandate to be directed to the Board of Trustees of the City of Culver City and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Superseding opinion in 276 P. 416.

John J. Dillon, of Culver City, and M. Telferson, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

L. V. Meloy, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LANGDON, J. Petitioners asked for a writ of mandate compelling the defendants to call a special election and submit to the electors of the city of Culver City the question of whether such municipal corporation should be consolidated with the city of Los Angeles.

The petition alleged that on May 14, 1928, the petitioners, who are qualified electors in the city of Culver City, filed a petition signed by not less than one-fourth in number of the qualified electors of the city of Culver City, as shown by the registration of electors of the county of Los Angeles with the legislative body of the city of Culver City, asking that said city and the city of Los Angeles, a city of greater population and contiguous with the city of Culver City, be consolidated.

The respondents filed a demurrer, which was overruled, and they then filed an answer in which it was alleged, among other things, that "these respondents admit that on or about the 14th day of May, 1928, a petition was filed with the said Council of the said City of Culver City, but allege that said petition contained less than one-fourth of the number of qualified electors for the said City of Culver City as shown by the registration of the qualified electors for the county of Los Angeles."

The trial court heard some evidence, but rejected certain other evidence regarding the written withdrawal of the names of a number of the signers of the original petition and also rejected evidence offered to the effect that a number of persons signing the said petition were not at the time of signing registered voters, but had registered as voters later in the day upon which the petition was signed.

The trial court held that the petition was sufficient to invoke the action of the city council and ordered that body to call the special election.

From this judgment defendants and respondents appeal, urging that the rulings of the trial court with reference to the rejection of evidence offered by them were erroneous, and particularly urging, as decisive of the appeal, the point that the determination by the board of trustees or city council as to the sufficiency of the petition filed with them is final and that it is beyond the power of the court to inquire into the validity of the action of said city council in determining the sufficiency of said petition, in the absence of any allegation that the said council acted fraudulently in the matter. This position is supported by the following authorities: People v. Town of Loyalton, 147 Cal. 774, 82 P. 620, 622; People v. Los Angeles, 133 Cal. 338, 65 P. 749; People v. Town of Ontario, 148 Cal. 625, 84 P. 205; People v. San Diego, 71 Cal. App. 421, 236 P. 377.

The statute governing proceedings for the consolidation of cities requires that: "Whenever a petition, signed by not less than one-fourth in number of the qualified electors of any municipal corporation, as shown by the registration of electors of the county in which such municipal corporation is situated, is filed with the legislative body thereof, asking that such municipal corporation and any other municipal corporation contiguous thereto, designated in such petition, and having a greater population, be consolidated, such legislative body must, without delay call a special election and submit to the electors of such municipal corporation the question whether such municipal corporations shall be consolidated." St. 1913, p. 577, § 2.

In the case of People v. Los Angeles, supra, quo warranto proceedings were instituted to test the legality of certain annexation proceedings. The provision of the statute governing annexation proceedings with reference to the filing of the petition therefor was substantially the same as the above-quoted provision of the statute relative to consolidation proceedings. In that case, this court said: "The jurisdiction of the city council to order an election depends upon the presentation to it of such petition, signed by the requisite number of electors. Whether it was so signed was a question of fact, submitted by the statute to the decision of the council; and the question arising upon this branch of the case is, whether the adjudication of that question of fact by the city council is conclusive." The court, in that decision, goes on to say: "All such adjudications are conclusive against collateral attack, and as the statute has not, in the case at bar, given any appeal or review by a higher tribunal, it follows that it can be vacated only in the manner and upon the grounds that would justify the vacation of a judgment rendered by a court of record, and a mere error in the adjudication of a question of fact, nor procured by fraud extrinsic or collateral to such question, is not a ground upon which it may be vacated."

In the case of People v. Town of Loyalton, supra, where proceedings for the incorporation of a town were attacked on the ground of the insufficiency of the petition, this court said: "Under what appears to be the settled law of this state, the decision of the board of supervisors upon both these questions of fact must be held to be conclusive here. There was no allegation to the effect that the decision was induced by any extrinsic or collateral fraud, and in the absence of any right of appeal or review by a higher tribunal such decision could be vacated only upon grounds which would justify the vacating of a judgment rendered by a court of record."

A similar question arose in People v. Town of Ontario, supra, and the ruling in the case of People v. Los Angeles, supra, was followed, as it must be followed in the instant case.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

BROWNING v. BROWNING. (L. A. 11627.)★
 Supreme Court of California. Nov. 29, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 26, 1929.

1. Divorce ☞178—Accepting money in accordance with divorce judgment, to which wife is entitled irrespective of her appeal, does not bar right of appeal.

Where wife would have been entitled to receive from husband monthly sums of money even if her appeal from divorce judgment should be unavailing, accepting sums in accordance with terms of judgment held not to bar right of appeal, since it is only where appellant receives and accepts advantages from judgment to which such appellant would not be entitled in event of reversal of judgment that acceptance thereof operates to defeat right of appeal.

2. Divorce ☞312—Wife's retaining custody of child does not bar her right to appeal from judgment awarding husband custody for limited periods.

Where wife has custody of child at times prior to institution of divorce action and during pendency thereof, retaining custody after court has awarded husband custody for limited periods, does not bar wife's right to appeal from such award.

3. Divorce ☞312—Supreme Court will not require wife to deliver custody of child to husband for periods specified in judgment from which wife has appealed.

Where wife has appealed from judgment awarding husband custody of child for limited periods, Supreme Court will not require wife to deliver child to husband during times specified in judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clair S. Tappan, Judge.

Divorce action by Theresa Browning against George L. Browning. From the portion of the judgment enforcing prior property settlement and awarding defendant custody of minor child during certain periods, plaintiff appeals. On defendant's motion to dismiss appeal and motion to enforce judgment regarding custody of child. Motions denied.

A. W. Sorenson, Margaret E. Faires, and Hubert T. Morrow, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. I. Gilbert and O'Melveny, Tuller & Myers, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The respondent herein moved the court for an order dismissing the appeal in this case upon the ground that the plaintiff and appellant had voluntarily accepted and received the benefits of the judgment and orders appealed from, and having done so cannot challenge any portion of the judgment and orders upon this appeal. The respondent also, in the event of the denial of said motion, presents certain other alternative motions, the grounds for which will be hereafter stated.

This action was instituted by the plaintiff to obtain a divorce from the defendant upon certain enumerated grounds of cruelty as set forth in her complaint. She alleged that there was an issue of said marriage one child of the age of six years, which was in her custody. As an incident to the action for divorce the plaintiff sets forth in her complaint the fact of the existence of a large amount of community property consisting of both real and personal property. She then proceeds to allege that on or about June 30, 1927, about three months before the commencement of her action for divorce, an agreement had been entered into between herself and the defendant for the settlement of the property interests of the parties, and which included an agreement regarding the custody of their minor child, and that in pursuance of said agreement the defendant executed to the plaintiff a promissory note for the sum of $50,000 and also gave to plaintiff the sum of $5,000 in cash, and which said document and money she agreed to accept and take as her sole and separate estate and in consideration thereof to release and surrender her community interest in the remaining properties of the parties. In a contemporaneous writing it was agreed that the custody of the minor child should be and remain with the wife during its minority, except that the husband might at stated times have the temporary custody of said child. The plaintiff alleges that the foregoing property settlement between the parties was procured by the defendant through fraud, undue influence, and menace, and through the withholding by the defendant of certain facts with relation to the amount and value of the community property and other certain alleged false representations with regard to the same. The plaintiff alleges that she has rescinded said agreement and offered to restore whatever she has received thereunder, and she prays that the marriage between the parties be dissolved, that the plaintiff be awarded the custody of the minor child, and that the court shall set aside and declare null and void the foregoing agreements, and that it determine the property rights of the parties in and to the community property, that the plaintiff be allowed alimony in the sum of $600 a month for the support of herself and the minor child, together with attorney's fees and costs of suit. The defendant filed his answer, admitting the marriage between the parties, but denying specifically the averments of plaintiff's complaint with respect to her alleged cause of divorce. The defendant also admits the making and existence of said marriage settlement, but denies that the same was procured through any fraud, over-reaching, or misrepresentations upon his part, or of any misunderstanding on the part of the plaintiff as to the scope and effect of the agreement. He prays in his answer that plaintiff take nothing by her complaint. He also, however, presents and files a cross-complaint alleging cruelty on the part of the plaintiff, and further alleging that the plaintiff is not a fit and proper person to have the custody of the minor child, but that the cross-complainant is such a fit and proper person. He therefore prays that the bonds of matrimony existing between the parties be dissolved, that he be awarded the care, custody, and control of the minor child, and that otherwise the property settlement between the parties be confirmed. The plaintiff responded with an answer to said cross-complaint, denying the averments thereof and praying that the relief asked for by the cross-complainant be refused. Thereafter the plaintiff filed a supplemental complaint setting forth averments of the alleged improper acts occurring between the defendant and another woman subsequent to the filing of her original complaint and constituting additional grounds of cruelty. To this supplemental complaint the defendant filed an answer denying the averments thereof. The cause came on for trial before the court sitting without a jury upon the issues as thus framed, and the cause having been submitted for decision the court made its findings of fact and conclusions of law wherein it found in the plaintiff's favor upon her alleged grounds of divorce and against the defendant upon his cross-complaint for divorce. Upon the incidental issues as to the existence of the property settlement agreement between the parties the trial court made its findings against the plaintiff and upheld the agreement. Upon the issue as to the custody and best interests of the minor child the trial court found that neither of the parties was an unfit person to have the custody of said child, but that the best interests of the child would be subserved by having the custody of the child remain with the mother, with the right of visitation and temporary custody from time to time preserved to the father. As conclusions of law from the foregoing findings of fact the trial court found that the plaintiff was entitled to an interlocutory decree of divorce upon the grounds stated in her complaint and directed the entry of an interlocutory decree in her favor. As to the custody of the minor child the court by a supplementary decree directed that the plaintiff should have the custody of the minor child until further order of the court, with the exception that the defendant at certain stated times and periods was to have the exclusive custody of said child. With respect to the support of the plaintiff and the minor child subsequent to the granting of said decree, the trial court upheld the provisions of the property settlement between the parties in these respects. Finally, the trial court directed that the defendant pay to the plaintiff, or her attorneys, counsel fees in said action in the sum of $2,000 payable at the rate of $250 per month until the whole amount thereof should be paid. By a later order the trial court modified in some respects its prior orders respecting the custody and care of the minor child. The foregoing interlocutory decree was made and entered on the 20th of June, 1928.

Thereafter and in due time the plaintiff moved the court for a new trial upon the issues in said action other than those relating to the right of the plaintiff to a judgment of divorce, and also in connection therewith applied for leave to file an amended complaint touching the issues affecting the validity of the property settlement between the parties and the custody of the minor child. The trial court granted the plaintiff's motion for a new trial upon the foregoing restricted issues and permitted the amended complaint to be filed, and the defendant having thereafter filed his answer denying the allegations thereof, the cause was again submitted to the court for decision, whereupon, on January 24, 1929, the trial court made and entered its further findings of fact and conclusions of law wherein and whereby it confirmed its prior judgment awarding the plaintiff a divorce and also reaffirming its former decision upholding the property settlement between the parties, and also in the main upholding its former judgment and orders with relation to the custody of the minor child. With respect to the matter of costs and counsel fees the trial court modified its former judgment and order so as to provide that the plaintiff should have and recover her costs expended in said action in the sum of $150, and should be allowed attorney's fees in the sum of $1,250, payable at the rate of $175 per month, and that the plaintiff should be further allowed the sum of $25 per month to be used exclusively for the support of the minor child. The court entered its judgment accordingly, on January 24, 1929.

The plaintiff took the present appeal from said latter judgment and from the whole thereof excepting the portion relating to the interlocutory decree of divorce made and entered in her favor in said action. The respondent on June 27, 1929, filed and served a notice of motion to dismiss the plaintiff's foregoing appeal upon the grounds stated in the motion as hereinabove set forth, and in support thereof presented his affidavit setting forth that since the entry of the judgment from a portion whereof the plaintiff has taken this appeal, she has received from the defendant from time to time the sums of money, the monthly payment of which was provided for in the property settlement agreement, the validity of which she assailed in her several complaints filed herein, praying for the cancellation thereof, and which property settlement and the judgment of the trial court upholding the same she is still assailing upon this appeal. The respondent's affidavit further sets forth that the plaintiff has received and accepted the sum of $150 directed by the judgment to be paid to her on account of costs, and that the respondent has further paid to the plaintiff, or to her attorneys, the sums specified in said judgment to be paid monthly on account of attorney's fees. In response to said motion the plaintiff has filed a counter affidavit setting forth that as to the interlocutory decree in said action in so far as she was thereby granted a divorce from the defendant no appeal has been taken therefrom, and that the time for taking said appeal or for making any attack upon said interlocutory decree has expired.

The plaintiff further deposes that during the pendency of said action in the trial court and prior to the trial and determination thereof, the defendant, upon an order to show cause, was directed to pay to the plaintiff for the support of herself and of said minor child the sum of $350 per month until further order of the court, and that whatever sums were received from the defendant either prior to or subsequent to the making and entry of the interlocutory judgment herein have been necessary for and have been used by the plaintiff for the support and maintenance of herself and of said minor child, and that during all of said time she has had no other means of support, and the plaintiff further avers that whether upon the present appeal the portion of the judgment appealed from shall be reversed, modified, or affirmed, she would have been entitled to all moneys received by her from the defendant as necessary for her support and for the maintenance of said minor child, and hence that the acceptance of whatever sums of money which she has been paid by the defendant and which have been by her devoted to the support of herself and her minor child cannot be held to constitute any sufficient reason for the dismissal of her present appeal. The plaintiff further in her affidavit sets forth that whatever sums of money she has received from the defendant for her costs in said action or for her attorney's fees therein have been such sums as defendant would have been required to pay upon the granting of the decree of divorce in her favor and whether or not the portion of the judgment herein appealed from should be affirmed, modified, or reversed upon this appeal. To the plaintiff's foregoing affidavit the respondent has presented a counter affidavit setting up with more of detail the monthly payments and the amount thereof which the respondent claims to have made in accordance with the property settlement and the judgment approving the same which are assailed by the plaintiff upon this appeal.

[1] With respect to the respondent's motion to dismiss this appeal upon the foregoing grounds, we are of the opinion that it is without merit and that the same should be denied. It is true, as the respondent sets forth and sufficiently shows upon his said motion, that the respondent has made to the plaintiff certain monthly payments in accordance with the terms of the property settlement between the parties, and also in accordance with the terms of the judgment of the trial court upholding the same and from the portion of which judgment so doing the plaintiff is prosecuting this appeal. But it is also true that the parties to this action were, prior to the entry of the interlocutory decree of the trial court dissolving their union, husband and wife. It is also admittedly true that that portion of the judgment of the trial court dissolving their union was in the plaintiff's favor, and that she was thereby granted a divorce from the defendant upon the ground of extreme cruelty, and that said judgment, no appeal having been taken therefrom, has become final. It follows that at all times both before and after the entry of the said interlocutory decree the plaintiff was entitled to receive as the monthly sums for her support and maintenance, and for the support and maintenance of the minor child so long as the same remained in her custody, an adequate amount of money corresponding to the financial condition of the parties to this action. The fact that the parties prior to the institution of the plaintiff's action for divorce saw fit to enter into a property agreement intended to define the amount and value of the community estate and to determine what portion thereof the wife would thereafter be entitled to receive and hold as her separate property and to devote to the support and maintenance of herself and her minor child could not be held, whether valid or invalid, to take away from the wife her primary right to be supported out of the community estate of the parties whether rightly or wrongfully defined by the terms of said property settlement.

This being so, it would seem to follow that the receipt by the wife of whatever sums of money she is shown to have received under the terms of said judgment cannot be held to defeat her right to maintain this her appeal from such portions of the judgment as she is dissatisfied with, since even if her appeal should be unavailing she would still have been entitled to receive from the defendant the monthly sums of money which she is shown to have received and to have devoted to the support of herself and her minor child.

It is only in cases where an appellant is shown to have received and accepted advantages from a judgment to which such appellant would not be entitled in the event of a reversal of the judgment that her acceptance thereof has been held to operate to defeat the appeal. This case in some of its aspects is similar to that of Locke Paddon v. Locke Paddon, 194 Cal. 73, 227 P. 715, wherein the right of a wife to maintain an action to rescind a property settlement upon the ground of fraud was held not to have been defeated by the fact that she had received under said agreement certain sums of money which she had applied to her living expenses, and which under the law relating to husband and wife she would have been entitled to so receive and so apply notwithstanding said agreement. The cases of Storke v. Storke, 132 Cal. 349, 64 P. 578, and McCaleb v. McCaleb, 32 Cal. App. 648, 163 P. 1045, upon which the respondent relies in support of his motion, have no application to the facts of the case at bar, since in each of these cases the very question at issue upon the appeal was as to whether or not the appellant was entitled to a divorce at all, and hence, of course, entitled to the sums of money which had been paid her, but to which she would have no right in the event of a denial of a divorce. In so far as the respondent's motion is made to rest upon his payments to the appellant of the amounts respectively awarded for costs and counsel fees upon the successful issue of her action for divorce, it would seem clear that the payment of these sums of money to the appellant could have no bearing upon her right to appeal from that portion of the judgment which denied her equitable relief from the property settlement, since as to that portion of the judgment the allowance of counsel fees and costs has no relation. Having been granted a divorce, the plaintiff was entitled to an award of her counsel fees and costs and to the collection thereof, since the judgment in that regard has not been appealed from and has become a finality. It is obvious that in making the award of counsel fees and costs to the plaintiff the trial court was confining the same to that portion of its judgment which was in the plaintiff's favor and in respect to which such allowances might be lawfully made, and that the trial court was making no allowance, and could have made none, to the plaintiff or her counsel for the maintenance of that incidental portion of said action with respect to which it denied the plaintiff any relief. We therefore find no merit in the respondent's motion to dismiss said appeal upon the foregoing grounds, and it is hereby denied.

[2] Respondent has made what he has chosen to call an alternative motion for an order dismissing the appeal of the plaintiff herein in so far as said appeal relates in any manner to the custody of the minor child upon the ground that the plaintiff has accepted the benefits of the judgment and order of the trial court in so far as they purport to award the custody of the minor child to her during the major portion of the time, and that therefore her purported appeal from that portion of the judgment and order which awards to the defendant the custody of the minor child for a limited portion of time should be dismissed. We perceive no merit in the respondent's motion to dismiss the plaintiff's appeal upon the ground last above set forth. The plaintiff had the custody of the minor child at all times prior to the institution of said action, during the pendency thereof, during the trial and since the trial and during the time thus far occupied by the appeal. It is conceded that she is a proper person to have the custody of the child, and, in fact, the custody thereof was for the major period awarded to her by the judgment and order of the trial court. By said judgment and order the respondent was permitted to have the custody of the child for limited and precisely defined periods. It is that portion of the judgment and order which the plaintiff has seen fit to include in this appeal. The fact that she has in the meantime retained the child's custody could furnish no reason why this court should, upon the respondent's motion, dismiss plaintiff's main appeal. The effect of her taking the appeal from the foregoing part of said judgment and order was to stay all proceedings thereon and hence was to leave in the custody of the plaintiff the minor child, in whose custody the child had ever been. Whether the respondent would have any remedy in the trial court for the situation of which he complains we do not deem it necessary to decide, although upon this motion the respondent frankly concedes that the application for relief should properly have been made in the trial court. But the fact that the trial court disagreed with the respondent in this regard can furnish no reason for seeking relief in this court in the form of a motion to dismiss the plaintiff's appeal, and his motion upon that ground should also be and the same is denied.

[3] The respondent has presented another so-called alternative motion in the form of a direct application to this court for an order directing and requiring the plaintiff to turn over and deliver the custody of said minor child to the respondent during the times and periods specified in the judgment and order of the trial court and pending the determination of this appeal. It is perfectly apparent, however, that this court could make no such order in advance of the determination of this portion of the plaintiff's appeal upon the merits thereof, since the very relief which the respondent is seeking to have the court apply is the relief to which the respondent shall be entitled only upon the affirmance of the judgment as to that portion thereof affecting the custody of the minor child, the correctness of which is involved in the hearing and determination upon its merits of this branch of the appellant's said appeal. It follows that the respondent's motion for this form of alternative relief should also be and the same is denied.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 21, 1929.

As Modified, on Denial of Rehearing, Dec. 20, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 20, 1930.

1. Pleading $\S$ 225(2)—Where leave to amend pleading had been granted, and amendment was sham and ineffectual, court properly refused leave to further amend.

Where leave to amend complaint had been granted and amendment was sham and ineffectual, trial court did not abuse discretion in refusing leave to further amend.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 901—Pleading $\S$ 339—As regards demurrer, failure to defend pleading would be treated as abandonment, since burden is always on appellant to show error.

In regard to general demurrer, failure of plaintiffs-appellants to defend could be treated as abandonment, since burden is always on appellant to show error.

3. Pleading $\S$ 238(1)—Motion for leave to amend on ground judge was biased held properly denied, where no proposed amendment was presented and attack was without merit (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 170, 473).

Motion for leave to amend complaint on theory that trial judge was biased at time of hearing on demurrer, a complaint which should be raised and heard under Code of Civil Procedure, $\S$ 170, held properly denied, where defendants did not present with motion a proposed amendment to complaint, as they are required to do under section 473, and their attack on judge was without merit.

Appeals from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; C. J. Goodell and Daniel C. Deasy, Judges.

Action for damages, for mismanagement of the affairs of a corporation, by Annie L. Ellerhorst and others against L. V. Blankman and others. From a judgment for defendant and from an order denying leave to amend, plaintiffs appeal. Judgment and order affirmed.

W. A. Andrews and F. W. Sawyer, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Reuben G. Hunt, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiffs sued for damages on a complaint charging mismanagement of the affairs of a corporation in which they were stockholders. But two of the defendants—Curry and McKannay—were served with process. Their demurrer to the complaint was sustained. An amended complaint was filed. Their demurrer to this complaint was also sustained. A second amended complaint was then filed. Their demurrer was sustained without leave to amend, and judgment was entered for these defendants. Thereafter plaintiffs moved under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, for leave to further amend. Their motion was denied. Two appeals were taken, and are presented here on the same record—one from the judgment and one from the order denying leave to amend.

[1] The opening brief of appellants consists of a reprint of their second amended complaint, the demurrer of the two defendants, an affidavit of counsel used on the motion for leave to amend, and some of the oral testimony taken on that hearing. The appellants do not, either by argument or citation of authority, make any effort to support their pleading. All they say is that it is sufficient against the demurrer, "and if not it could be amended." The pleading is a jumble of innuendoes and legal conclusions, with unverified allegations of conspiracy and fraud, but without any allegations of facts from which these conclusions are drawn. The demurrers to all the complaints were both general and special. The special demurrers pointed out the uncertainty of these charges of fraud which were not based upon any verified allegation of fact. The amendments were manifestly sham, and not made in good faith. Ample opportunity having been given appellants to amend in these particulars, there was no abuse of discretion in refusing leave to further amend.

[2] We are not unmindful of the authorities holding that ordinarily leave to amend should be granted when the demurrer is special and an amendment can readily be made. But, when leave has been granted and the amendment is sham and ineffectual, the trial court should not be required to grant further indulgence. Loeffler v. Wright, 13 Cal. App. 224, 232, 109 P. 269, citing Stewart v. Douglass, 148 Cal. 511, 83 P. 699, Dukes v. Kellogg, 127 Cal. 563, 60 P. 44 and other cases. So far as the general demurrer is concerned, the failure of appellant to defend the pleading may be treated as an abandonment, as the burden is always on the appellant to show error. Etienne v. Kendall, 202 Cal. 251, 257, 259 P. 752.

[3] The appeal from the order denying leave to amend requires little comment. The demurrer to the original complaint was heard by Judge L. H. Ward. The demurrers to the amended and second amended complaints were heard by Judge Daniel C. Deasy. The motion for leave to amend was heard by Judge C. J. Goodell. On this hearing the appellants sought to show that on a previous occasion one of their counsel had approached Judge Deasy and had asked him if he would voluntarily take from another department of the superior court a divorce case in which one of the defendants herein was a party. The judge declined on the ground that the husband and wife were both friends of his and of his family. From this it was argued that the judge was prejudiced against the appellants herein when he sustained the demurrer to their second amended complaint. The appellants did not present with their motion a proposed amendment to the complaint, as they are required to do under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, and they made no effort to show that an amendment could be made which would meet the objections to the former pleading. The theory of their motion is that the trial judge was biased at the time of the hearing, a complaint which is to be raised and heard under section 170, Code of Civil Procedure. Counsel for appellants failed to show that the trial judge abused his discretion in refusing leave to amend, but they affirmatively demonstrated by their conduct that such leave was properly denied.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

BARONI (CONTINENTAL CASUALTY CO., Intervener) v. ROSENBERG et al.
(Civ. 6803.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 9, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 9, 1929. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Jan. 8, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨301—Insufficiency of evidence cannot be urged in support of order granting new trial unless specified as one of grounds therefor (Code Civ. Proc. § 657).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, the insufficiency of evidence cannot be urged in support of order granting motion for new trial when not specified as one of the grounds therefor.

2. New trial ⇨31—Misconduct cannot be asserted in support of order granting new trial unless assigned during trial.

Misconduct of counsel cannot be asserted in support of order granting new trial unless assigned as such at time of trial.

3. Trial ⇨133(6)—Any prejudice by reason of counsel's discussion as to compensation payments was removed by court's voluntary instruction to disregard opinion.

Any prejudice by reason of misconduct of counsel in discussion relative to compensation payments provided under St. 1917, p. 836, § 9, subd. (b)2(5), as amended by St. 1925, p. 642, § 1, was removed by virtue of court's voluntary instruction to disregard opinions of both counsel.

4. Automobiles ⇨246(60)—Instruction that recovery for personal injuries required showing that plaintiff was not guilty of negligence did not erroneously place burden of proof.

Instruction that, in order to recover damages for personal injuries, it must appear from the whole evidence in the case that plaintiff was not guilty of negligence, was not erroneous as throwing on plaintiff the burden of proving that he was not guilty of contributory negligence, in that it merely stated rule that plaintiff cannot recover if evidence shows contributory negligence.

5. Automobiles ⇨246(2)—Instruction that automobile driver obeying law could not be found negligent was not erroneous as requiring favorable finding if driving on right side of highway (California Vehicle Act, § 122).

Instruction in action to recover damages for personal injuries relating to California Vehicle Act, § 122 (St. 1923, p. 557), to effect that defendant could not be found guilty of negligence in case he was obeying law at time of accident, was not erroneous as requiring finding for defendant driving on right side of highway, notwithstanding any carelessness in manner of driving.

6. Appeal and error ⇨977(3)—Order granting new trial without legal ground to sustain it must be reversed on appeal.

Where there is a failure to show any legal ground upon which order granting a new trial can be sustained, and there is no error to sustain such order, it must be reversed on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by Oriente Baroni against B. Rosenberg and another, wherein the Continental Casualty Company joined as intervening plaintiff and lien claimant. Verdict for defendant, and, from an order granting a new trial, defendant Rosenberg appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Louis V. Crowley and Cooley, Crowley & Gallagher, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Daniel A. Ryan, of San Francisco (George F. Snyder, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued the defendant Rosenberg for damages for personal injuries. The Continental Casualty Company, the carrier through which the plaintiff's employer was insured under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended), joined as intervener plaintiff and lien claimant. The cause was tried before a jury and resulted in a verdict for defendant. Upon plaintiff's motion a new trial was ordered and the defendant has appealed on typewritten transcripts.

[1] The grounds urged on the motion for a new trial were that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence, and that the defendant was guilty of prejudicial misconduct. In the order granting the motion the insufficiency of the evidence was not specified as one of the grounds, and that point cannot, therefore, be urged in support of the order. Code Civ. Proc. § 657.

[2] The claim of misconduct arises from the colloquy of counsel for plaintiff and defendant during the examination of the plaintiff as a witness. Defendant's counsel asked the witness if he was receiving "workmen's compensation" at the time of the trial. Plaintiff's counsel said he would object to the question unless the jury was instructed that such compensation would have to be paid back out of any verdict obtained. The jury was so instructed and the witness answered in the affirmative, and then volunteered the information that he was receiving $20.83 a week. So far in the examination of this witness everything was done with the consent of plaintiff's counsel. He joined in the discussion with the court and defendant's counsel of the legal questions arising under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act and of the liabilities of the plaintiff and the intervener toward each other under that act. So far no misconduct was assigned and none can be asserted at this late date. Mohn v. Tingley, 191 Cal. 470, 490, 217 P. 733.

[3] After the plaintiff had volunteered the information as to the amount of compensation (and this is all that is declared inadmissible in evidence by the act) the counsel continued their discussion, each expressing different views as to how long these payments would continue. Counsel for plaintiff disagreed with the opinion expressed by his adversary, assigned it as misconduct, but did not ask the court to instruct the jury to disregard it. The trial judge voluntarily instructed the jury to disregard the opinions of both counsel. The position of counsel for plaintiff is not easy to understand. In his complaint and in his proof he insisted that plaintiff's injuries were permanent and would result in permanent disability. The insurance carrier took the same position. The Compensation Act, § 9, subd. (b) 2, (5), St. 1917, p. 836, as amended by St. 1925, p. 642, § 1, provides that the employee shall receive the compensation payments during the remainder of life if the injuries result in 70 per cent. or more of total disability. During the controversy counsel for plaintiff stated that these payments would not be permanent, and when his adversary said they would continue to the plaintiff "as long as he lives" this was assigned as misconduct. There is nothing in the briefs to indicate upon what this claim of misconduct is based, but if it were misconduct it was certainly all invited by plaintiff and any prejudice was removed by the court's instruction. Murphy v. Zwieg (Cal. App.) 279 P. 1062, where cases are cited.

[4] In respondent's brief on this appeal he has, for the first time, raised the point that the new trial should have been granted because of errors in instructions given or refused. Criticism is made of the instruction given reading in part: "It must further appear to you from the whole evidence in the case that the plaintiff was not guilty of negligence, etc." It is argued that this instruction threw upon the plaintiff the burden of proving that he was not guilty of contributory negligence. This instruction did not relate to the matter of the burden of proof; it merely gave to the jury the settled rule of law that a plaintiff may not recover if on "the whole evidence in the case" the plaintiff was shown to have been guilty of contributory negligence.

[5] Further criticism is made of the instruction given relating to section 122 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 557). After reading a portion of the section the jury was told that, if they found that the defendant was obeying the law at the time of the accident, it could not find him guilty of negligence "by reason thereof." It is argued that this instruction required the jury to find for the defendant if he was driving on the right side of the highway notwithstanding any carelessness in his manner of driving. The instruction is not open to this criticism. It merely advised the jury that the defendant was not guilty of negligence merely by following the law. The question of negligence generally was fully covered in other instructions.

Complaint is also made of the refusal to give certain instructions requested by the jury. We find no error in the action of the trial judge. The instructions requested were either instructions on the very issues of fact which the jury was to determine or were fully covered by other instructions.

[6] The respondent has failed to show any legal ground upon which the order granting him a new trial can be sustained. The record discloses a case which was fully and fairly tried before the jury. The jury brought in its verdict in favor of the defendant, and the trial judge, by his order granting the new trial, approved the verdict so far as the evidence was concerned. With no error to sustain the order granting a new trial, that order must be reversed.

Order reversed, with directions to enter judgment for defendant on the verdict.

CAMPBELL CHEVROLET CO. v. WALSH.
(Civ. 58.)

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California. Nov. 19, 1929.

- 4. Sales ⇨467—Risk of loss under conditional sales contract falls on vendor only where vendee is without fault and there is no agreement to contrary.

Risk of loss of property sold under conditional sales contract is on vendor only when loss or destruction occurs without fault of vendee and there is no agreement between the parties to the contrary.

- 2. Sales ⇨467—Buyer of automobile under conditional sales contract containing stipulation against illegal use must use reasonable care to prevent such use.

One buying automobile under conditional sales contract containing his agreement that automobile should not be illegally used was under duty to use at least reasonable care to prevent illegal use thereof.

- 3. Sales ⇨467—Buyer, who under conditional sales contract was not relieved by loss of car, could not avoid payment because of forfeiture for transporting liquor without buyer's knowledge.

Forfeiture of automobile to government for use in transporting liquor without knowledge or consent of buyer thereof held not to relieve buyer from liability for purchase price where buyer did not show himself free from negligence in permitting such use, and conditional sales contract provided that loss of automobile from any cause should not relieve buyer.

- 4. Sales ⇨477(1)—Conditional seller of automobile was not precluded from recovering price by failure to exercise contract right to retake car for unlawful use.

Provision in conditional sales contract covering automobile that seller could take immediate possession of car in case of use thereof in violation of law held not to prevent seller from recovering balance due on the contract without asserting its right to forfeiture, in view of provisions that waiver of breach of covenant by purchaser should not be held a waiver of any other or subsequent breach and of provision giving seller election to retake property or sue for price; contract being taken together and reconciled according to general intent thereof, under Civ. Code, §§ 1641, 1650, 1652.

- 5. Sales ⇨477(1)—Seller could waive provision in conditional sales contract for termination of contract for unlawful use of automobile.

Seller under conditional sales contract covering automobile which was forfeited for use in violation of law had right to waive provision of contract that such use of car should terminate the agreement, especially where contract specifically provided that waiver by seller of any breach on purchaser's part should not be deemed a waiver of any other or subsequent breach of covenant.

- 6. Sales ⇨477(4)—Seller of automobile, by instituting suit for balance due after forfeiture to government, waived provision for termination of contract for unlawful use.

Seller of automobile under conditional sales contract, providing that use of car in violation of law should terminate contract, waived provisions of such forfeiture clause by filing suit to recover balance due on contract after automobile had been forfeited for use in transporting liquor, and no other notice of election to waive the forfeiture provision was necessary.

- 7. Sales ⇨479(1)—Conditional seller's recovery of balance due on automobile forfeited to government was not objectionable as double recovery of property and price.

Seller of automobile under conditional sales contract could recover balance due, though car had been forfeited to government for use in unlawful transportation of liquor, since seller was not attempting to get both the property and the purchase price, and was not required to take proceedings against the government, and there was therefore no double recovery.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by the Campbell Chevrolet Company against Paul Walsh. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Honnold & Hubbell, of Escondido, for appellant.

S. G. North (H. B. Daniel, of San Diego, of counsel), for respondent.

BARNARD, J. This is an action to recover the balance due on a contract for the sale of an automobile from plaintiff to defendant.

The complaint sets up a conditional sales contract, reserving title in the vendee, alleges the default of the defendant in making several monthly payments, and asks judgment for the remainder of the purchase price. The answer admits practically all of the allegations of the complaint, but denies that any sum is due, and as a separate defense sets up one paragraph of the agreement between the parties, which reads as follows:

"It is distinctly understood and agreed that during the term of this contract, the automobile herein agreed to be sold shall not be used for the transportation of intoxicating liquors, drugs or narcotics, and shall not be used in or about the violation of any United States, state or municipal statute law or ordinance. Any violation of this provision shall forthwith terminate this contract and any and all rights of the purchaser in or to said automobile and the possession thereof, and without notice or demand of any character, the owner shall take immediate possession of said automobile and all accessories, using all necessary force so to do, and any and all rights of the purchaser in or to said automobile or the possession thereof shall thereupon be immediately forfeited and the owner shall be and become the sole owner of the same and each and every part thereof and right and interest therein and shall be alone and solely entitled to the possession thereof, and all payments previously made by the purchaser shall be retained for depreciation in value and for the use of said automobile, and the purchaser hereby waives all rights to the moneys so paid and all rights against the owner for taking possession of said automobile."

It is then alleged that the automobile in question was seized by officers of the United States of America, while the same was, without the knowledge or consent of defendant, transporting intoxicating liquor in violation of a United States law, and that the said automobile is now held under a libel filed against it by federal authorities.

A general demurrer was filed to this answer, as was also a motion to strike the separate defense and for judgment on the pleadings. The motion for judgment on the pleadings was granted, and this is an appeal by the defendant from the judgment that followed. Appellant insists that by reason of the facts set forth in his separate defense, as above referred to, the contract for the purchase of the automobile has been terminated, is of no force and effect, and that he is exonerated from further liability thereon.

[1] It is first urged that this is true, because the rule, as followed in California, places the risk of loss upon the vendor, where property sold under conditional sale contract is lost or destroyed without the fault of the vendee in possession. See Potts Drug Co. v. Benedict, 156 Cal. 322, 104 P. 432, 437, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 609; Waltz v. Silveria, 25 Cal. App. 717, 145 P. 169. This rule is applied, not only in the cases just named, but generally, to instances where the subject-matter of the contract was destroyed or so damaged as to be unfit for use, as, for instance, by fire. Whether it would apply to such a loss as here existed, where the article involved is neither lost, destroyed or damaged, but taken under process of law, we seriously question. However that may be, two considerations prevent the rule from being of assistance to appellant here. The rule applies only when it appears the loss or destruction occurred without fault on the part of the vendee; and then only "in the absence of special agreement to the contrary." Potts Drug Co. v. Benedict, supra; Waltz v. Silveria, supra.

[2, 3] In the first sentence of the quoted paragraph, appellant agrees that the automobile intrusted to his care shall not be illegally used, in the sense referred to. Under his contract it was therefore incumbent upon him to at least use reasonable care to prevent such use. While he says its use for that purpose was without his knowledge or consent, no facts are set up to excuse his breach of contract in the respect mentioned, and none to show that he was free from negligence, gross or otherwise. In any event, the parties here have themselves agreed to the contrary of the rule relied on and have provided where the loss shall fall. The contract contained the following provision: "The loss or destruction or theft of, or damage to, said automobile, from any cause, are at purchaser's risk, and shall not relieve the purchaser from his obligation to make all payments herein specified." (Italics ours.) Appellant has in writing agreed that he should not be relieved from making payments because of any loss of the automobile, from any cause whatever.

[4, 5] It is next argued that, under its own terms, the contract has been terminated; that the only right of respondent under the provision of the contract, as above quoted, was to retake possession of the machine if he could; and that appellant is exonerated from further liability. This contention is based on the assumption that the one paragraph of the contract, set up in the special defense, governs the entire contract, and is controlling in this case. This argument is without merit. The law abhors a forfeiture, and it would be strange indeed if the law could be invoked to compel a party to accept a forfeiture, without his seeking it, especially when, so far as appears, he does not even know of the existence of facts which might entitle him to one, until after he has exercised his election to stand on the contract and sue for the purchase price.

In the case of Knarston v. Manhattan Ins. Co., 140 Cal. 57, 73 P. 740, 741, it is said: "It [an insurance policy] is more in analogy to a lease or vendor's contract with condition of forfeiture contained therein, with reference to which it has invariably been held that the right to declare a forfeiture, being a matter entirely for the benefit of a lessor or vendor, can be, even by parol, effectually waived by either. * * * The law will not compel a man to insist upon any benefit or advantage secured to him individually." Appellant claims the provision in question could not be waived because it provides that, in the event this provision is broken, the contract shall terminate; but the case last cited held that, although a policy of insurance provided that it should be void in a certain event, this provision could be waived. The respondent had the right, under the law, to waive the provision relied upon, even had the right to do so not been specifically given in the contract. Johnson v. Kaeser, 196 Cal. 686, 239 P. 324.

[6] But, again, the contract in question specifically covers that point. The last clause of the agreement reads as follows: "The waiver by the owner of any breach of any covenant or agreement herein contained on the part of the purchaser shall not be deemed or held to be a waiver of any subsequent or other breach of said covenant or agreement, nor a waiver of any other covenant or agreement herein contained." As appears from the pleadings, the respondent waived the provisions of the clause relied on by appellant, by filing this suit. No other notice of his election to so do was necessary. Johnson v. Kaeser, supra.

The contract in question is quite lengthy, and effect cannot be given to one clause alone, without consideration of the remainder of the agreement.

"The whole of a contract is to be taken together, so as to give effect to every part, if reasonably practicable, each clause helping to interpret the other." Civ. Code, § 1641.

"Particular clauses of a contract are subordinate to its general intent." Civ. Code, § 1650.

"Repugnancy in a contract must be reconciled, if possible, by such an interpretation as will give some effect to the repugnant clauses, subordinate to the general intent and purpose of the whole contract." Civ. Code, § 1652.

The agreement, in addition to the provisions already quoted, also contained the following:

"If said purchaser defaults in any of the above payments, when due, or defaults in any provision of this contract, or if said automobile is attached or levied upon under any writ or process of any court, or if said purchaser is declared a bankrupt, said owner may, at his option, without previous demand or notice, first, retake possession of said automobile and all its new and old equipment and accessories, with or without process of law; and all payments theretofore paid hereunder shall thereupon be forfeited to said owner for the use, wear, tear and depreciation of said automobile, and this contract shall thereupon terminate and all rights of purchaser in this contract and said automobile shall thereupon cease, and are hereby waived; or, second, said owner may declare the whole of the sums then remaining unpaid to be immediately due and payable, and sue therefor. * * *

Viewing the contract as a whole, it contains definite provisions that the clause relied upon by appellant might be waived by respondent; that any loss or destruction of the machine from any cause, should not relieve the purchaser from making the agreed payments; and that respondent, upon the violation of any provision in the agreement, might elect either to retake the property or sue for the balance of the purchase price. It is plain that the general intent and purpose of the whole agreement is, not that the paragraph relied on by appellant shall control and govern all other provisions of the contract, but that this provision shall itself be modified and governed by the other provisions referred to.

[7] It is argued that the vendor cannot have both the property and the purchase price. He neither has nor is seeking both, nor is there any obligation upon him to seek to get the property back from the government. Under his contract, appellant assumed the very risk from which he here attempts to escape, and he should have guarded against the use of the automobile in the illegal manner described.

The judgment is affirmed.

VALLEY LUMBER CO. v. DAVIS, Director General of Railroads. (Civ. 54.)

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California. Nov. 20, 1929.

1. Railroads ⇨5½(23)—Director General proceeded against as defendant in action arising from government operation of railroads must be named (Transportation Act 1920, § 206 (a); 49 USCA § 74(a).

Director General of Railroads designated by President must be named as defendant in action arising out of government operation of railroads, and not merely designated in his official capacity, under Transportation Act 1920 § 206(a), 41 Stat. 461, 49 USCA § 74(a).

2. Railroads ⇨5½(24)—Right to substitute newly named Director General in action arising from government's operation of railroads is dependent on proper commencement of action (Transportation Act 1920 § 206(h), 49 USCA § 74(h).

In action against Director General of Railroads based on cause of action arising out of operation during period of government control, right to substitute new Director General as defendant under Transportation Act 1920 § 206 (h), 42 Stat. 1443, 49 USCA § 74(h), is dependent upon action against former Director General having been properly commenced.

3. Limitation of actions ⇨125—Filing of amended complaint naming present Director General of railroads defendant constituted new action as regards limitation, where Director General named in original complaint had previously resigned (Transportation Act 1920 §§ 206(a), 206(h), 49 USCA §§ 74(a), 74(h).

Where Director General of Railroads named as defendant in suit arising out of operation of railroads during period of government control under Transportation Act 1920 § 206(a), 41 Stat. 461, 49 USCA § 74(a), had resigned at time of institution of suit, original complaint did not amount to commencement of action against the United States, and filing of amended complaint seeking to substitute present Director General as sole defendant under Transportation Act 1920 § 206(h), 42 Stat. 1443, 49 USCA § 74(h), was attempt to institute new action as regards statute of limitation imposed by the act itself.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Marvin W. Conkling, Judge.

Action by the Valley Lumber Company against James C. Davis, Director General of Railroads. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. Stewart Ross and R. B. Whitelaw, both of El Centro, for appellant.

Hickcox & Trude, of El Centro, for respondent.

SLOANE, P. J. This appeal, originally taken to the Supreme Court from a judgment of the superior court of Imperial county in favor of the defendant, has been transferred to this court for decision.

The action was brought by the plaintiff, Valley Lumber Company, to recover damages for the destruction of a Ford automobile valued at $600, through a collision with a train of the Southern Pacific Company, while said railroad company was being operated under the control of the government of the United States.

The federal control of this railroad was terminated by act of Congress on March 1, 1920, before the original complaint herein was filed. The Transportation Act approved February 28, 1920, was, however, then in effect, and authorized the maintenance of such an action under and within the time prescribed by section 206(a) of said act (41 Stat. 461, 49 USCA § 74(a), as follows: "Actions at law, suits in equity and proceedings in admiralty, based on causes of action arising out of the possession, use, or operation by the President of the railroad or system of transportation of any carrier (under the provisions of the Federal Control Act, or the Act of August 29, 1916) of such character as prior to Federal control could have been brought against such carrier, may, after the termination of Federal control, be brought against an agent designated by the President for such purpose, which agent shall be designated by the President within thirty days after the passage of this Act. Such actions, suits, or proceedings may, within the periods of limitation now prescribed by State or Federal statutes but not later than two years from the date of the passage of this Act, be brought in any court which but for Federal control would have had jurisdiction of the cause of action had it arisen against such carrier."

The original complaint thus filed, if it was sufficient to give jurisdiction of the cause of action against the United States through its duly constituted agent, was instituted within the period prescribed. This original complaint named as defendants the Southern Pacific Company and Walker D. Hines, as the regularly appointed and duly acting Director General of Railroads. At the time the accident happened Walker D. Hines was the Director General and Presidential Agent in charge of this railroad, but he had resigned

May 18, 1920, and was not, at the time of instituting the suit, the Director General or Agent of the federal government in the control of this railroad.

A demurrer to this original complaint was sustained by the trial court on September 14, 1923, and on April 2, 1925, an amended complaint was filed making James C. Davis, the then Director General of Railroads and Presidential Agent, the sole defendant. This amended complaint was filed more than two years after the accident complained of, and more than two years after the passage of the Transportation Act and statute of limitations thereon on March 1, 1920. It is the contention of respondent that no cause of action was stated, and that jurisdiction was not obtained against the United States under the original complaint, for the reason that it was not brought against the official designated under the act as the agent of the government. Appellants take the position that such suit was authorized to be brought in the name of the office, and that it is immaterial that there was a failure to designate and make a party defendant to the suit the identical Director General and Agent then in control.

The amended complaint was demurred to (1) on the ground that the complaint did not state a cause of action against the defendant; (2) that the court acquired no jurisdiction of the defendant in the action; and for further grounds of demurrer that the cause of action was barred under the specific provisions of the federal statutes and the laws of the state of California. The demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiff failing and refusing to amend, a judgment of dismissal was granted by the trial court, and a judgment for costs made and entered in favor of the defendant James C. Davis, Director General of Railroads. The appeal is from this judgment.

The correctness of the judgment turns on the question of whether or not the filing of the original complaint against Walker D. Hines, who at the time had resigned as Director General of Railroads, and who no longer represented the federal government, established a cause of action against the United States. If it did not, it clearly appears that such action could not be vitalized by the amended complaint, naming the then qualified officer of the government as the defendant, after the period of the statute of limitations had elapsed. Had the suit been originally commenced against the then incumbent Director General of Railroads, it is not questioned that upon the appointment of a successor, the latter could have been substituted as party defendant and the action continued in force.

[1, 2] It is suggested that the manifest purpose of the action was to procure a judgment which should be enforceable against the funds of the railroad administration, and that the individual name of the agent to be sued was of no real consequence. This suggestion is answered by the fact that the Transportation Act provides explicitly that after the termination of federal control, an action of this character, could be brought only against the agent designated by the President for that purpose. The authorities cited seem to indicate that in each instance the agent, and not his official title alone, must be named as defendant. While it is provided by the Transportation Act that "actions, suits, proceedings, and reparation claims * * * properly commenced within the period of limitation prescribed, and pending at the time this subdivision takes effect, shall not abate by reason of the death, expiration of term of office, retirement, resignation, or removal from office of the Director General of Railroads or the agent designated under subdivision (a), but may * * * be prosecuted to final judgment, * * * substituting at any time before * * * final judgment * * * the agent designated by the President then in office" (42 Stat. 1443, 49 USCA § 74(h), yet it will be observed that this right of substitution is predicated upon the action having been properly commenced within the period of limitations prescribed, and the proper commencement of such action would seem to require that it should be instituted against the individual and then acting Director General or Agent of the government.

[3] In Davis v. Griffith, 103 Okl. 137, 229 P. 499, the Supreme Court of Oklahoma had before it a similar substitution of defendants. It was there held that an action based upon matters occurring during federal control of railroads against John Barton Payne, a former presidential agent, did not make the United States government a party defendant to such action, and an attempted substitution of James C. Davis, the then duly appointed and acting presidential agent, for John Barton Payne, resigned, did not confer jurisdiction over the United States government, and that such jurisdiction could be acquired only by proper service of process against the then incumbent of the office, and that the United States had a right to prescribe the exact manner in which it could be sued, and that a strict compliance with its terms was necessary, whether the same was considered reasonable or unreasonable.

The case of Natoli v. Davis, 75 Cal. App. 309, 242 P. 895, 896, in an opinion by Plummer, J., goes quite exhaustively into a review of decisions bearing upon the manner of acquiring jurisdiction in this class of actions. That action was begun on the 1st of November, 1921, naming as defendants Southern Pacific Company and John Barton Payne, as Agent, under section 206 of the act of Congress of the United States known as the Transportation Act. The action was brought to recover damages to fruit in transit, while the railroad company in question was under government control. In October, 1922, an amended complaint was filed, naming as defendant only James C. Davis as agent aforesaid. The defendant Davis brought and filed a demurrer to the amended complaint, alleging, among other things, that said amended complaint did not state a cause of action against said defendant, and also that the alleged cause of action set forth in the amended complaint was barred by the provisions of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California, and by subdivision (a) of section 206 of the Transportation Act of the United States of 1920. The defendant also moved the court to dismiss the action, among other things, upon the ground that at the time the action was brought against the said John Barton Payne as Agent, under the original complaint he was no longer such agent, but had previously retired from office as such agent, and that the said James C. Davis had been appointed as agent for the government under said section 206 subsequently, and that no proceedings had been taken by the plaintiff for the substitution of said James C. Davis as a party defendant in the place and stead of John Barton Payne, within the period of limitation prescribed by the act. The case was considered on the question of the statute of limitations. The court says: "The record shows that more than two years had elapsed before the bringing in of the defendant, James C. Davis, as agent under the Transportation Act, and that at the time suit was instituted John Barton Payne was not the agent under said act and had not been for some period of time."

The court holds that the amendment naming James C. Davis as the sole defendant was not a substitution of said Davis as defendant in an action which had already been properly commenced against his predecessor, but that under the original complaint no action against the United States had been properly instituted, and that the effect of filing an amended complaint, naming the then incumbent as the sole defendant, was in effect to attempt to institute a new action which was barred by the statute of limitations.

By way of illustration, the court in the Natoli Case refers to Jeffers v. Cook, 58 Cal. 147, citing the section of the Code stating what constitutes causes of action, to wit, the filing of a complaint, and then going on to speak of the effect of filing a supplemental or amended complaint bringing in new defendants. In that case the action was to foreclose a mortgage, where all the parties to the action were not made defendants in the original complaint. The court there says: "By moving, in the original action, to make the subsequent grantees of the mortgagor parties to the action, the plaintiff followed the course of procedure approved in Goodenow v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 465 [76 Am. Dec. 540]," and other cases cited; and adds: "But her motion was not made, and her supplemental complaint was not filed until nearly six years after the cause of action stated in the original complaint had accrued; and, according to the rule for moving within reasonable time, enunciated in Goodenow v. Ewer, supra, it would seem to have been too late to resort to a remedy against new parties in aid of a cause of action which, as to them, was barred by the lapse of time within which, under the Code of Civil Procedure, an action could be brought against them upon the cause of action. But it is contended that the cause of action was not barred, because the original complaint in the action, having been filed against the mortgagor in statutory time, stopped the running of the statute of limitations."

The opinion continues: "That as a legal proposition is true as to the mortgagor, who was made the sole party defendant to the action at the time of filing the complaint. And it would, also, have been true as to those who were subsequently made parties defendants by the supplemental complaint, if they had been made parties before the statute had run in their favor. But they were not made parties until the statute had run. The filing of the original complaint, therefore, stopped the running of the statute of limitations only as to him who was the party defendant at the time it was filed; it did not stop the running of the statute in favor of those who were not made defendants in the action at that time; the statute continued to run in their favor. * * * We do not find that this rule has been departed from in any subsequent California cases."

The instant case was submitted by stipulation, on the briefs on file, being appellants' opening brief and respondent's brief. No reply brief was filed by appellant. Without going further into a review of the authorities cited by respondent, the effect of which seems to be undisputed, we are of the opinion that the demurrer to plaintiff's amended complaint was properly sustained, and the judgment of dismissal is affirmed.

RICHARDSON et al. v. KELSEY et al.
(Civ. 7054.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 13, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 12, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 6, 1930.

1. Contracts §164—Agreements executed during negotiations covering months to carry out parties' intentions were to be construed together in ascertaining terms of contract (Civ. Code, § 1642).

Where negotiations involving transfers of property covered period of months resulting in execution of various instruments to carry out intention of parties, all instruments must, under Civ. Code, § 1642, be taken together when ascertaining what contract between parties was.

2. Mortgages §319(1)—Grantors under trust deed claiming right to offsets or credits against principal and interest payable thereunder have burden to make proper showing.

If grantors under trust deed are entitled to any offsets or credits against amounts required to be paid as principal and interest thereunder, burden rests upon them to make proper showing.

3. Mortgages §366—Contention that there was failure of proof of notice of sale under trust deed, where affidavit relied on was merely cumulative, held without merit.

Where affidavit as proof for giving of notice of time and place of sale under trust deed was merely cumulative to other evidence consisting of trust deed and deed executed by trustee on foreclosure and sale and recitals therein proved facts recited in affidavit, contention that there was failure of proof because affidavit was incompetent held without merit.

4. Mortgages §335—Notice of default under trust deed need not mention volume and page in which original is recorded (Civ. Code, § 2924).

Under Civ. Code, § 2924, written notice of default under trust deed is not required to give volume and page in which original notice was recorded.

5. Forcible entry and detainer §5—Grantors under trust deed refusing to surrender premises after foreclosure, and employer and employee relationship having terminated, held guilty of forcible detainer.

Where grantors under trust deed were not entitled as owners to remain in possession after trust deed was foreclosed and relationship of employer and employee between grantors and purchaser at sale had terminated, grantors in refusing to surrender possession of premises held to have committed forcible detainer.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Action by H. G. Kelsey against Thomas E. Richardson and others, in which defendants filed a cross-complaint against plaintiff and others. From the judgment rendered, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John L. McNab and Jerome H. Bayer, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Tobin & Tobin and George A. Clough, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to obtain the possession of a lot and the apartment house located thereon, the same being situated in San Francisco and known as the Kenilworth Apartments. He set forth his rights in two counts. The defendants answered both counts and filed a cross-complaint. The plaintiff answered the cross-complaint, but on the trial the plaintiff introduced evidence on only the first count and dismissed the second count. The trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiff, and from a judgment entered thereon the defendants have appealed.

In the first count the plaintiff pleaded unlawful detainer. The plaintiff claimed the right to the possession by reason of being the grantee named in a trustee's deed. That deed purported to be a trustee's deed issued in the foreclosure of a trust deed which had been executed to secure a promissory note theretofore made by the defendants and which was a renewal of another note. If the proceedings were regular which resulted in the execution by the trustees of the deed held by the plaintiff, the judgment must be affirmed. We will pass, therefore, to a consideration of the claims of alleged irregularities. The first claim made by the defendants is that they were not in default when the foreclosure proceedings were commenced to foreclose the renewal note. That note was dated February 8, 1926, and provided that $3,126.50 should be paid on the principal one day after date, and that interest should be paid monthly as it became due. It also provided that if default should be made in the payment of the interest, then the whole of said principal and interest should immediately become due and payable at the option of the holder of the note. Notice of default in the payment of interest was given the 10th day of May, 1926. It is not claimed that the interest in name had been paid, but it is contended that the defendants were entitled to certain credits which, if they had been received, would have placed them in the position of not being in default but of having anticipated their payments. This claim carries us back to the inception of the entire transaction.

Before proceeding it will assist the reader to state that the litigation arose out of an attempt to finance a property valued at $165,000 or more, and in that attempt the evidence shows that the Richardsons put into the venture $8,764.50, and that the Kelseys put into the venture $8,000—and perhaps more. All other sums consisted of borrowed money. These facts must be borne in mind when, as counsel make assertions, we may have some light as to where an equity rests or does not rest.

The Richardsons bought the property in suit from Kurkjian. At that time Urrutia held: (1) A second mortgage for $50,500; (2) a chattel mortgage on the furniture; (3) a leasehold interest in and to the property; and (4) a claim against a former lessee, Mrs. Gorman, for unpaid rents, and on this last-mentioned item an action was pending. But, at the same time, Urrutia was liable on an appeal bond executed in certain litigation in which his interests in the property were in-involved, and that appeal bond was a potential liability against Urrutia.

As early as June or July, 1925, negotiations were commenced, among three parties, looking toward the execution of two bilateral contracts which were executed September 1, 1925. The first was between the Kelseys and Urrutia. The Richardsons called on the Kelseys at the home of the latter at Merced Falls and induced the Kelseys to agree to purchase the Urrutia interests. The Kelseys agreed to do so and authorized the Richardsons to conduct the negotiations. By the terms of those oral agreements, upon acquiring the Urrutia interests the Richardsons and the Kelseys would become tenants in common holding equal interests. For the Kelseys the Richardsons conducted the negotiations to a successful issue and purchased the Urrutia interests for $12,500. By the terms of that purchase the Kelseys executed to Urrutia a guaranty to hold him harmless on the appeal bond. The Kelseys also executed to Urrutia a promissory note in the sum of $12,500 secured by a deed of trust. The written guaranty was delivered September 1, 1925, and the note and deed of trust were delivered September 2, 1925.

The second bilateral contract was between the Kelseys and the Richardsons. Prior to the date just mentioned an agreement was entered into by which the Kelseys agreed to sell to the Richardsons their one-half interest. There is no direct evidence in the record as to what items, or what interest in any items so purchased from Urrutia, were assigned to the tenants in common by the Kelseys, nor what obligation or part of any obligation to Urrutia was assumed by the Richardsons. However, contemporaneously with the negotiations to purchase the Urrutia interests, the parties discussed the sale by the Kelseys to the Richardsons. On September 2, 1925, the Richardsons executed: (1) A written guarantee, by the terms of which they agreed to hold the Kelseys harmless as to certain obligations, naming them, but not naming the Urrutia note; (2) a promissory note for $26,585; and (3) a trust deed to secure its payment. A written memorandum used by the parties discloses that they treated the Urrutia note as a partnership liability. So treating it, they estimated the equity of the Kelseys at $26,281.15. The plaintiff testified in substance that he sold according to the written memorandum, and that the Urrutia note became the debt of the Richardsons which they were in duty bound to pay. The Richardsons did not flatly deny that statement. At the time of the purchase of the Urrutia interests the incumbrances had been so funded that $18,000 additional moneys had been borrowed. On September 3, 1925, the Urrutia note was taken up by the Richardsons.

[1] Noting the foregoing dates, it appears that, although the deal had its inception in June, the negotiations continued, and the deal as a whole was not consummated until September 1, 1925, when each party delivered or received, as the case might be, the document which he was bound to deliver or was entitled to receive; and in this manner a three party agreement was entered into and actually executed. We may therefore take all of these documents together in attempting to ascertain what was the contract between the parties. Civ. Code, § 1642. When so examined it is not difficult to ascertain the rights of the parties.

[2] As above stated, while Urrutia held a lease on the property a claim arose in his favor against Mrs. Gorman for rents. Later that claim ripened into a judgment. By the expressed language contained in the guaranty dated September 1, 1925, and which was a part of the transaction of the sale by the Kelseys to the Richardsons, that judgment was recognized as the property of the Richardsons. The contingent liability of Urrutia on the appeal bond ripened into a judgment. The judgment against Mrs. Gorman was so assigned as to extinguish the judgment against Urrutia. This act canceled the liability of Urrutia and it canceled the liability of the Kelseys on the guaranty they had executed to Urrutia. The Richardsons claim they were not parties to that guaranty and that they were the owners of the Gorman judgment and should have been credited with the proceeds. This contention is not sustained by any evidence. That there was no writing in evidence by which the Richardsons expressly became parties to the Urrutia guaranty is true. But it is also true that there is no writing by which they obtained title to the judgment. Moreover, there was no writing directly showing the Richardsons to have been the purchasers of the Urrutia interests—a mortgage on the real estate $50,500, a mortgage on the furniture for additional sums, and the leasehold interest. Their title to the assets bought from Urrutia and their liability on the Urrutia liabilities both rest on indirect evidence. Moreover, there is not a particle of evidence that the parties ever agreed to partial assignments of the benefits or burdens, or both, claimed to have been purchased from Urrutia. However, we think there was evidence sufficient to sustain the conclusion of the trial court that by virtue of the sale of their one-half interest the Kelseys passed to the Richardsons the Urrutia contract—both its benefits and burdens. If so, the Richardsons may not claim that they were not in default. Be this as it may, the plaintiff made a prima facie showing that the Richardsons were in default for not paying their interest February 8, 1926. If the latter were entitled to any offsets or credits, the burden rested on them to make the showing. This they wholly failed to do. These views are fortified by the acts of the parties. The documents executed by them were used in consonance with the views we have expressed. No claim at variance with these views was made by the Richardsons until the commencement of this litigation on or about December 19, 1927. On the trial there was evidence that the Richardsons acted under duress. The trial court found otherwise. The finding is supported by the evidence.

The defendants contend that the plaintiff holds the property in dispute for their benefit. In making this assertion they point to the testimony of the defendants, which was to the effect that the plaintiff and his attorney assured the defendants before the sale that the defendants would be fully protected. In their answer the defendants ask that the court ascertain the amount due the plaintiff and the defendants would pay the same. On the trial they made no offer and no attempt to sustain their pleading.

[3] It is claimed that there was a failure of proof for the giving of notice of the time and place of the sale under the trust deed. In this connection the defendants call to our attention that on the trial the plaintiff introduced in evidence, over the objection of the defendants, an affidavit as proof. The defendants contend that the affidavit was incompetent. Lacrabere v. Wise, 141 Cal. 554, 75 P. 185. Apparently conceding the force of the objection, the plaintiff replies that at most the affidavit was merely cumulative. Continuing, he quotes from the record, showing that he introduced the trust deed and also the deed executed by the trustee to him, and that the recitals therein prove the facts recited in the affidavit. Turner v. Marshall, 90 Cal. App. 345, 265 P. 860; Roberts v. Colyear, 179 Cal. 669, 672, 180 P. 937. We think the reply is sufficient.

[4] Objection is made to the order admitting the written notice of default. The defendants assert the notice was defective because it did not mention the volume and page in which the original was recorded. The statute did not so require. Civ. Code, § 2924.

[5] The trial court made a finding that the defendants had committed a forcible detainer. It is claimed there is no evidence to support it. As will be seen, the defendants were not entitled as owners to remain in possession after the trust deed had been foreclosed. True, they at one time were in possession as the employees of the plaintiff. However, that relation had also been terminated. The court did not err in making the finding.

It is also claimed that there was no consideration for the largest part of the renewal note. If the court believed the evidence offered by the plaintiff, the point is without merit. The plaintiff offered an abundance of evidence to show that the claim of the plaintiff amounted to the principal stated in the note, if not to a greater sum.

We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

APPLIANCE CO. v. KELLEY et al. (Civ. 60.)

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California. Nov. 18, 1929.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1)—Findings of trial court will not be disturbed on appeal, if supported by material evidence.

If material evidence supports findings of trial court, such findings will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Evidence ⇨594—Undisputed testimony, in seller's action, that change in coils would make refrigerating plant work satisfactorily, must be accepted as true.

In seller's action for balance of purchase price of refrigerating plant, undisputed testimony that changes in coils and pipes, which buyers would not permit seller to make, would make plant work satisfactorily, must be accepted as true.

3. Sales ⇨365—In action for purchase price, finding that buyers acted in bad faith in refusing to let seller repair goods held immaterial.

In action for balance due under sale contract, where defense was failure of consideration, finding that buyers acted in bad faith in not permitting seller to repair goods held immaterial.

4. Sales ⇨124—Buyers, retaining possession of goods without offer to restore, could not be relieved of obligation to pay (Civ. Code, § 1691).

Buyers in possession of all or considerable part of consideration, having made no offer to restore goods, could not be relieved of obligation, since under Civ. Code, § 1691, on rescission of contract, parties should be restored to former positions.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; H. G. Ames, Judge.

Action by the Appliance Company against Tony Berardino and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants Berardino appeal. Affirmed.

E. F. Du Fresne, of San Diego, for appellants.

Tompkins & Clark, of San Diego, for respondent.

MARKS, J. Plaintiff filed its action in the superior court against defendants to recover a balance due it under a contract to install an ice box and display case, and refrigerating machinery and equipment, in a store being erected by the defendant Joseph C. Kelley, as contractor, for the defendants and appellants, Tony Berardino and Rose Berardino, as owners. Appellants filed their cross-complaint against their codefendant, asking for damages, but it was stipulated by all parties at the trial that, under his deposit of $549 in court, no judgment would be taken against him. Respondent recovered judgment against appellants in the sum of $549.

Appellants' sole ground upon which they ask a reversal of the judgment is that the following findings of the trial court are not supported by the evidence:

"1—Plaintiff was and is at all times mentioned in the amended complaint a corporation duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Delaware, with its principal place of business at the city of San Diego, state of California."

"6—By reason of the acts and conduct on the part of the defendants, Tony Berardino and Rose Berardino, and by reason of their refusal to allow plaintiff to install said unit and coils after said adjustment had been made that the defendants, Tony Berardino and Rose Berardino, acted in bad faith.

"7—The amount due, owing and unpaid from the defendants, Tony Berardino and Rose Berardino, to the plaintiff herein, is the sum of five hundred forty-nine dollars ($549.00)."

Appellants abandoned their contention that the finding of the corporate existence of appellant was not supported by the evidence, when it was pointed out to them that at the trial they had amended their pleadings and alleged such corporate existence.

[1] The law is well settled in this state that, if there is any material evidence in the record supporting the findings of the trial court, they will not be disturbed on appeal. In this case there is competent evidence of the following facts:

That in September, 1925, the written order for the refrigerating equipment was placed with respondent; that at that time it was contemplated that the refrigeration would be furnished for a delicatessen store, which did not require the maintaining of as low a temperature for successful refrigeration as a meat market; that in December, 1925, appellants decided to rent their store for a meat market, and the original contract with respondent was modified at that time, after part of the equipment had been designed by it; that installation of the equipment was completed on December 21, 1925, and the meat market opened for business on December 26, 1925; that the refrigeration of the display case was accomplished by a series of pipes in which a cooling liquid was circulated, the lower pipes furnishing the cold, and the upper pipes returning the liquid to the pumping machinery; that the tenant operating the meat market desired the pipes in the case lowered, which was done to satisfy him, and which reduced the level of the cold zone in the case; that the refrigeration in the case was not satisfactory, and respondent frequently sent its men to the market to make changes and repairs; that at times they found the water shut off from the building and the refrigerating plant shut down; that at other times they were not permitted by appellants or their tenant to work on the machine at all; that respondent always responded to a request to service the plant when a complaint was received; that in February, 1926, respondent, with the consent and at the request of appellants and their tenant, took the pipes and coils from the case to their factory, to change the grade of the pipes and thus increase the flow of the cooling liquid through the plant, thereby reducing the temperature in the case; that appellants refused to permit respondent to reinstall the pipes and coils, and refused to pay the balance of respondent's bill of $549, although they retained a large ice box built by respondent, the display case furnished by it, and all of the refrigerating plant, except perhaps that portion removed from the case for change at the factory; that, had the pipes and coils been reinstalled, the plant would have worked satisfactorily and kept the temperature of the case at a point sufficiently low to preserve meats; that the ice box, which was satisfactory to appellants, was of the value of $600, and the display case and refrigerating plant of the value of $549.

The undisputed evidence showed that the total contract price which appellants agreed to pay respondent for the refrigerating equipment, ice box, and display case was $1,149, of which sum $600 had been paid to respondent, leaving a balance of $549 unpaid. If respondent was entitled to recover any judgment at all, it was entitled to the last-named sum.

[2] We believe that this evidence is sufficient to support the findings of the court, which are not attacked by appellants, that the respondent installed the ice box and display case, and the mechanical refrigerating equipment to cool the display case, and was prevented from finally perfecting the refrigerating plant by appellants. Part of the failure of the refrigerating plant to cool the display case between December 26, 1925, and the time the coils and pipes were taken out by respondent must be charged to appellants' refusal to permit respondent's workmen to make changes and adjustments in the plant, and the fact that it was shut down and the water turned off at different times. Respondent was willing at all times to do its best to make the plant satisfactory, and its expert testimony, to the effect that the final changes in the coils and pipes would do so, was not disputed and must be accepted as true. Boomer v. Southern Cal. Edison Co., 91 Cal. App. 375, 267 P. 178.

[3] That portion of the findings of the trial court which impute bad faith to appellants is not material to the issue. Respondent brought its action for a balance due under a contract, and appellants defended upon the ground of total or partial failure of consideration, and whether they acted in bad faith is of no great importance, except, perhaps, in weighing their testimony. This finding can be entirely disregarded. Spencer v. Deems, 43 Cal. App. 601, 185 P. 671. There are other findings of the court that support the judgment and are supported by the evidence. They must control. Hill v. Clark, 7 Cal. App. 609, 95 P. 382.

[4] Appellants are asking to have the courts relieve them from the obligations of their contract while they are in possession of all or a considerable part of the consideration which they received from respondent, without any offer to restore the same. This we cannot do (sec. 1691, Civ. Code). Upon the rescission of a contract the parties should be restored to their former positions as nearly as possible as the same existed when it was made. Gaume v. Sheets, 181 Cal. 119, 183 P. 535. They must surrender or offer to surrender any consideration received in the transaction. List v. Moore, 20 Cal. App. 616, 129 P. 962.

This case was appealed under the alternative method. The opening brief of appellants does not contain a single line of testimony or a single reference to the transcript. Their reply brief does not set forth any of the evidence, but does contain a few references to the transcript by line and page. Attorneys must prepare their appeals according to law and the rules of court. Their failure to do so unnecessarily places too great a burden upon this court.

Judgment affirmed.

Giving of notice and conduct of parties thereafter may amount to rescission of contract by mutual consent.

4. Sales ☞92—Where buyers of grocery business, who leased building, deserted property and repudiated sale, retaking of possession by seller and lessor to protect property held not rescission (Civ. Code, § 1689).

Where parties who purchased grocery business together with store fixtures and equipment, and who leased building in which store was located, repudiated sale and abandoned property entirely, and lessor notified them to remove merchandise from his building, and they refused to do so, retaking possession of property by seller and lessor did not amount to acquiescence on part of lessor of repudiation of contract or any intent on his part to end sale, so that there was no rescission under Civ. Code, § 1689, requiring consent of all parties.

5. Sales ☞92—Resale of groceries after buyers repudiated sale of grocery business and failed after notice to remove merchandise from building held not rescission (Civ. Code, § 1689).

Where purchasers of grocery business, together with fixtures and equipment, repudiated sale and lease of building in which business was located, and seller and lessor subsequently notified buyers to remove merchandise from building, but they failed to do so, resale of groceries at public auction by seller and lessor did not amount to rescission of contract, under Civ. Code, § 1689, requiring mutual consent.

6. Sales ☞92—If resale of groceries was unjustified or for inadequate consideration after buyers repudiated purchase of grocery business, remedy was action for conversion.

If seller of grocery business after buyers repudiated contract and lease of building in which business was located had no right to sell groceries after original buyers failed to remove them from building, or if resale was for an inadequate consideration, that grocery store had been fully paid for and title had passed to original buyers, who gave notice of rescission before becoming in default on rent, was immaterial, where action was for rescission and not for conversion, which would be remedy of original buyers.

7. Sales ☞92—Where buyers of grocery business owed rent and repudiated sale and abandoned property, retaking possession by seller and lessor was not rescission by consent or acquiescence (Civ. Code, § 1689).

Where buyers of grocery business, as lessees of building wherein business was located, were two months in arrears on rent and had repudiated sale and abandoned property when seller and lessor retook possession, no rescission by consent or acquiescence thereby resulted, under Civ. Code, § 1689, requiring mutual consent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by C. M. Holmes and another against Vincent O. Roberts. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Albee & Watkinson, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Warren L. Williams and S. S. Silverton, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by plaintiffs, C. M. Holmes and Susan M. Holmes, from a judgment of nonsuit entered against them in an action for rescission. The appeal is upon the judgment roll alone.

The pleadings set forth these facts: Plaintiffs allege in their original and supplemental complaint that on January 22, 1927, they purchased from defendant, Vincent O. Roberts, a grocery business, store fixtures, and equipment, etc., located in the city of Redondo Beach, Cal., paying therefor the full purchase price of $1,775, and, as part of the same transaction, plaintiffs leased from defendant the building in which said store was located, for a period of three years from January 22, 1927, at a monthly rental of $50, paid the first month's rent and took possession of said building and all of said personal property on said 22d day of January, 1927, and operated the grocery business in said building until on or about the 12th day of February, 1927, when plaintiffs served upon defendant a written notice of rescission, stating, in substance, that they had ascertained that certain representations made by defendant to induce them to enter into the contract of sale and purchase of the grocery business and lease of said building were false, fraudulent, and untrue, and demanded the return of the purchase price of the store and the rent paid. Subsequent to the service of said notice of rescission, and subsequent to the filing of the original complaint in this action, defendant entered into and took possession of the building and stock of groceries, equipment, etc. Thereafter, and on or about April 4, 1927, defendant sold said stock of groceries, fixtures, and equipment to one F. K. Faucher, whom plaintiffs allege was acting for and as the agent of said defendant. The supplemental complaint further alleges that, ever since said 4th day of April, 1927, defendant has been in the possession of said store building and of said grocery stock, fixtures, equipment, etc., and has been operating the same as his own. Defendant admitted in the answer that, after the premises were vacated for approximately one month, and about March 13, 1927, he took possession thereof, and alleged that plaintiffs voluntarily surrendered said premises; that on April 4, 1927, he sold said groceries, etc., at auction to a bidder, and not as agent or one acting for him; that the sale was not fictitious but bona fide; that said transaction was through a bank escrow, etc.; that no person was deterred from bidding; and that he did not directly or indirectly purchase any of said stock of merchandise.

By further answer, defendant set forth that, since January 22, 1927, no rent was paid by appellants for said premises and that $100 became due for rent on the 22d day of March 1927; that on February 12, 1927, appellants served written notice of rescission upon him and delivered to a bank the keys for said premises with instructions to the bank to deliver same to defendant; that plaintiffs notified defendant that they had relinquished possession of said premises and said personal property, etc., and that said premises remained vacant until April 5, 1927, when respondent repossessed the property.

Defendant further alleged in his answer that, due to the perishable nature of the merchandise, etc., in said store, and the fact that the same was becoming overrun with rodents and was rotting and decaying, he notified plaintiffs to remove said stock of groceries and fixtures from his building by March 20, 1927, and, in the event they failed so to do, the same would be stored at plaintiffs' expenses, or he would sell the same to the highest bidder and account to plaintiffs for the proceeds; that respondent did later notify plaintiffs of the time of said sale, and did sell said merchandise to the highest bidder, F. R. Faucher, for $375; and that he herewith offers and tenders to plaintiffs the proceeds of said sale, less the sum of $100 due him for rent according to the terms of said lease.

The case proceeded to trial before the court sitting without a jury upon the issues thus raised, and, after plaintiffs had introduced all their evidence, the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit, which was granted.

[1, 2] In the absence of a record showing the evidence offered and received at the trial, we must assume that the evidence was wholly insufficient to warrant a judgment in plaintiffs' favor, and that the trial court's conclusion was right and proper in every essential particular. O'Connell v. Behan, 19 Cal. App. 119, 124 P. 1038; Heslin v. Lapham, 77 Cal. App. 139, 246 P. 150; Archer v. Harvey, 164 Cal. 274, 128 P. 410. We are therefore limited in the consideration of this appeal to the admissions made in the pleadings.

Appellants contend that the undisputed facts as to the conduct and acts of the respective parties, as alleged and admitted in their pleadings, constitute a rescission by mutual consent, and that they were entitled to a judgment of rescission. With this contention we are unable to agree.

Section 1689, Civil Code, provides: "A party to a contract may rescind the same in the following cases only: * * * (5) By consent of all the other parties."

[3] The law is well settled that the giving of notice and the conduct of the parties thereafter may amount to a rescission by mutual consent. D. Ghirardelli & Co. v. Students' E. & T. Co., 175 Cal. 427, 166 P. 16; Newell v.

E. B. & A. L. Stone Co., 181 Cal. 386, 184 P. 659, 9 A. L. R. 993.

The question, therefore, to be determined is, Did either of the two acts of respondent, that of retaking possession of the store and building, or that of reselling the stock of groceries, fixtures, and equipment, amount to a consent or acquiescence to a rescission of the contract; or, in other words, was either act of respondent inconsistent in any manner with respondent still insisting upon the continuance in effect of the contract? We think not.

[4] If the respondent had taken possession under such circumstances as would show an acquiescence on his part in the position taken by appellants, viz. that the sale was repudiated and ended, then there would at once have been a rescission by mutual consent (Phillips v. Stark, 186 Cal. 372, 199 P. 509); but when appellants repudiated the sale and abandoned the property entirely, and after respondent had notified them to remove the merchandise from his building, and they had refused to do so, he then took possession of the building and merchandise, his act in retaking possession cannot be said to indicate any acquiescence on his part of the repudiation of the contract or any intent on his part to end the sale. Appellants deserted the property and notified respondent that the sale was repudiated, and thereby thrust upon respondent the necessity of retaking possession, and against his will, in order to protect his property. Under such circumstances there was no rescission.

[5] For practically the same reasons the second act of respondent, that of reselling the groceries, etc., at public auction, did not amount to a rescission. The appellants had repudiated the contract and had abandoned the premises, and had refused to remove their goods and merchandise from respondent's premises. Was respondent, in the face of appellants' absolute and unequivocal repudiation of the sale and abandonment of the entire property, both real and personal, required to stand idly by, indefinitely, and see his property go to rack and ruin, under peril of acquiescing in appellants' repudiation of the contract? Certainly not!

It has been held many times that a resale by the vendor, whose vendee has repudiated the contract, does not work a rescission. Phillips v. Stark, supra; Tomboy Gold & Copper Co. v. Marks, 185 Cal. 336, 197 P. 94; Rayfield v. Van Meter, 120 Cal. 419, 52 P. 666, 667.

In Rayfield v. Van Meter, supra, considering a similar situation, the court said, quoting from Ketchum v. Everton, 13 Johns (N. Y.) 359, 7 Am. Dec. 384: "The plaintiffs renounced the contract, and peremptorily refused to fulfill it. It was vain, therefore, to keep the land for them. The plaintiffs cannot, by their own wrongful act, impose upon the defendant the necessity of retaining property which his exigencies may require him to sell. This would be most unreasonable and unjust, and it is not sanctioned by any principle of law."

Appellants lay great stress upon the fact that the grocery stock, etc., had been fully paid for and title had passed to them, and they gave notice of rescission before they became in default on rent, and therefore respondent had no right to take possession and sell out the stock of groceries, etc., and that by so doing he impliedly consented to a rescission.

[6] There is no merit in this contention. In the first place, this is not an action for conversion, but one for rescission. If respondent had no right to sell the merchandise, or if he sold it for an inadequate consideration, appellants have their remedy in conversion.

[7] Appellants were two months in arrears on the rent, and had repudiated the sale and abandoned the property at the time respondent took possession. Respondent, having been forced by the action of appellants to take possession to protect his property, no rescission by consent or acquiescence can be attached to such act of respondent.

It seems to us that further discussion is unnecessary. From what has been said, it follows that we are of the opinion that respondent did not acquiesce in appellants' repudiation of the sale and lease, and that the judgment of nonsuit was correct and should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

BLANCETT et al. v. BURR et al. (Civ. 5663.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 20, 1929.

Appeal and error ⇨936(1)—Record not showing determination was not on merits nor under circumstances warranting any other judgment, award for costs and disbursements held proper.

Where record on appeal by plaintiff from judgment of dismissal did not disclose costs were allowed by way of indemnity, nor that cause was not actually determined on its merits, nor that dismissal was not effected under circumstances and conditions warranting entry of judgment from which appeal was taken, award for costs and disbursements held proper, since under circumstances appellate court must assume trial court founded its judgment on record and facts before it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Action by Earl R. Blancett and another against John Burr and others. From a judgment dismissing the action, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 279 P. 668.

A. E. Moore, of Los Angeles, for appellants.
Chauncey Gardner, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, Acting P. J. It appearing that a formal dismissal of an action pending between the parties in the superior court of Los Angeles county had been served, filed, and entered, a formal judgment was rendered accordingly on the day set for trial, and the defendants were awarded costs and disbursements in the sum of $105. A motion to retax costs and to strike the cost bill from the files was denied, and the plaintiffs appealed from said judgment.

Appellants argue in their brief that the trial court erred in allowing costs by way of indemnity, and that the actual determination of the cause upon its merits is necessary to an allowance of attorney's fees. The record does not disclose the existence of either of these contingencies, nor does it appear that the dismissal was not effected under circumstances and conditions warranting the entry of the judgment from which the appeal was taken. The subsequent motion to retax costs and to strike the cost bill from the files having been reviewed upon motion of appellants, we assume that the trial court founded its judgment upon the record and the facts before it. We cannot say as a matter of law that it erred in this respect.

The judgment is affirmed.

YAKOBIAN v. JOHNSON et al. (Civ. 6759.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 15, 1929.

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇨194—Purchaser let into possession is entitled to crops raised by him absent stipulations to contrary.

In absence of stipulation to contrary, purchaser let into possession is entitled to crops raised by him.

2. Mortgages ⇨32(2)—Instrument intended as security will be given that effect whatever its form.

Whatever the form of instrument, if instrument is intended merely as security, it will be given that effect.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⇨194—Parties held to have intended that vendor should retain lien on crops for purchase price, and not ownership thereof, crops were expressly reserved as security.

Where contract expressly provided that half of crops were reserved as security for payment of installments of price of land, parties held to have intended that vendor should retain lien on crops for purchase price and not ownership thereof.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⇨305—Vendor having elected to forfeit and terminate purchase contract could not thereafter recover unpaid installments of purchase price.

Where vendor elected to forfeit and terminate purchase contract, vendor could not thereafter recover unpaid purchase price which thereupon ceased to be enforceable obligation, nor could payment thereof be subsequently enforced against security.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⇨194—Purchaser remaining in possession, notwithstanding vendor's election to terminate purchaser's rights under contract, is adverse claimant as respects crops.

On election by vendor to terminate and forfeit purchaser's right under purchase contract, as respects crops, purchaser remaining in possession of land is an adverse claimant, and all privity between him and vendor thereupon ceases.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⇨299(1)—No receiver for purchaser could legally be appointed in vendor's action to terminate purchaser's rights.

In vendor's action to terminate and forfeit purchaser's rights under contract, no receiver for purchaser could legally be appointed.

7. Vendor and purchaser ⇨299(1)—Vendor's remedy on termination of purchase contract consists of recovery of value of use and occupation of land.

In vendor's action to terminate purchaser's rights, remedy of vendor consists in recovery from purchaser of value of use and occupation of land.

8. Chattel mortgages ⇨225(2)—Vendor having lien on undivided half of crop on termination of contract could not assert that rights of mortgagee of other undivided half were diminished by wrongful acts of purchaser.

Vendor sold land, retaining half of crops as security for payment of price. Purchaser executed mortgage on other undivided half of crop. On default of purchaser, vendor terminated contract and took possession. Mortgagee brought suit against vendor for the conversion of mortgaged crop. Held, vendor, having relinquished lien, could not assert that rights of mortgagee were diminished by wrongful acts of purchaser.

9. Chattel mortgages ⇨227—Where receiver paid proceeds of crop which were subject to mortgage executed by purchaser to vendor, mortgagee could recover from vendor.

Where, in vendor's action to terminate rights of purchaser, receiver was appointed, and receiver thereafter paid proceeds of crops which were subject to lien of mortgage executed by purchaser to vendor, vendor held liable to mortgagee, even though receiver was officer of court.

10. Chattel mortgages ⇨227—Where receiver applied proceeds of crop subject to mortgage to benefit of vendor, vendor held liable for amount of mortgage.

Where receiver appointed in vendor's suit to recover on purchase contract held crop subject to mortgage executed by purchaser, proceeds having been applied to vendor's benefit, vendor was obligated to pay mortgage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Charles R. Barnard, Judge.

Action by Serop Yakoobian against H. G. Johnson and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals. Affirmed. Superseding opinion in 279 P. 165.

Sherwood Green, of Berkeley, for appellant.

Gallagher & Jertberg, K. Kuyumjian and W. E. Simpson, all of Fresno, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Defendant H. G. Johnson has appealed from a judgment for $2,616.66 which was recovered against him by plaintiff, Yakoobian. The plaintiff alleged that appellant converted to his own use certain crops of grapes and figs on which the former held a mortgage in the sum of $2,500. By a second count in the form of an action for money had and received he sought to recover to the extent of the mortgage the sums received by appellant from the sale of the crops.

The following are the facts of the case: Some time before the year 1924 appellant agreed to sell the land on which the crops were grown to S. Papazian. By the contract one-half of the crops to be produced thereon were reserved as security for the payment of the installments of the purchase price. Thereafter, on January 4, 1924, Papazian mortgaged to the plaintiff one-half of the crops to be produced thereon during the years 1924 and 1925 to secure a note for $2,500 payable to the plaintiff on or before October 1, 1924. During the crop season of 1924 Papazian sold a portion of the crops, and received therefor amounts aggregating $1,713.67. Thereafter he defaulted in the performance of his contract with appellant, and on September 4, 1924, the latter instituted an action to terminate his rights under the contract and for the recovery of the possession of the land. A judgment terminating the vendee's rights was entered on March 7, 1925, following which appellant went into possession. Upon the filing of that action the court, on the application of appellant, appointed a receiver, who took possession of the crops. The receiver proceeded to market the same, and received therefor a total of $4,411.64. After deducting his expenses and fees, he paid to appellant the sum of $685 in cash, and expended for the latter's benefit the following amounts: $81.65 for insurance on the buildings situated on the property; $368.21 for taxes; and $2,280 in payment of the accrued interest on the mortgage upon the land executed by appellant; the total amount received directly and indirectly by the latter being the sum of $3,330.71. It is admitted that the crop was removed by the receiver without the consent of the plaintiff. In addition to the above facts the trial court found that the value of the crop taken by the receiver was about $5,000 and in accordance with the allegations of the complaint that appellant became indebted to the plaintiff for money had and received in the sum of $2,616.66, this being the amount of the mortgage and accrued interest.

[1, 2] Appellant contends that, in view of the facts, the plaintiff had no valid claim to the crop, and that the conclusion of the trial court cannot be supported. In the absence of a stipulation to the contrary, a vendee let into possession is entitled to the crops raised by him (Lewis v. Hall, 38 Cal. App. 329, 176 P. 171; First National Bank of Tulare v. Andreas [Cal. App.] 267 P. 937); and, whatever the form of an instrument, if it was intended merely as security, it will be given that effect (17 Cal. Jur. [Mortgages] §§ 45, 46).

[3] And where, as here, the contract expressly provided that half the crops were reserved as security for the payment of installments of the price of the land, manifestly it was not the intention of the parties that the vendor should retain the ownership thereof, but a lien thereon for the price. Palmer v. Howard, 72 Cal. 293, 13 P. 858, 1 Am. St. Rep. 60; Stockton Savings, etc., Society v. Purvis, 112 Cal. 236, 44 P. 561, 53 Am. St. Rep. 210; Ferguson v. Murphy, 117 Cal. 134, 48 P. 1018. Such was the interpretation given the provision by the trial court, and, where its conclusion appears consistent with the true intent of the parties, it is not within the province of the appellate court to substitute another interpretation, though equally tenable, for that of the court below. Slama Tire, etc., Co. v. Ritchie, 31 Cal. App. 555, 161 P. 25; Manley v. Pacific Mill, etc., Co., 79 Cal. App. 641, 648, 250 P. 710.

[4] Following the execution of the contract, the vendee went into possession of the land, and so far as appears from the evidence, remained therein until the entry in 1925 of the judgment terminating his rights. In what respects he was in default under the contract is not shown by the record, but the vendor, having elected to forfeit and terminate his rights thereunder, could not thereafter recover the unpaid installments of the purchase price, which thereupon ceased to be enforceable obligations. Glassell v. Coleman, 94 Cal. 260, 29 P. 508; Dishian v. Kishishian, 64 Cal. App. 440, 221 P. 669; Mahoney v. McCrea, 104 Iowa, 735, 74 N. W. 699; Waite v. Stanley, 88 Vt. 407, 92 A. 633, L. R. A. 1916C, 886; Roney v. H. S. Halvorsen Co., 29 N. D. 13, 149 N. W. 688; Wotrung v. Shoemaker, 102 Pa. 496; Steiner v. Baker, 111 Ala. 374, 19 So. 976; Ward v. Warren, 44 Or. 102, 74 P. 482; Warren v. Ward, 91 Minn. 254, 97 N. W. 886; Illinois, etc., Co. v. Steams, 60 Ill. App. 21. Nor could payment thereof be subsequently enforced against the security, namely, the crops. While these were subject to the lien reserved by the vendor, the lien was created by the contract, and the right to enforce it depended upon the continued existence of the obligations secured. Glassell v. Coleman, supra; Hovsepien v. Eskender, 69 Cal. App. 379, 231 P. 364; Frankel v. Rosenfield (Cal. App.) 273 P. 122; Steiner v. Baker, supra; Ward v. Warren, supra; Warren v. Ward, supra.

[5-7] The crops which were fructus industriales (Vulicevich v. Skinner, 77 Cal. 239, 19 P. 424; Hovsepien v. Eskender, supra) were not in existence when the contract was made, and upon the election by the vendor to terminate and forfeit the vendee's right under the contract the latter notwithstanding remained in possession of the land. He thereupon became an adverse claimant and all privity between him and the vendor ceased (Cal. Delta Farms, Inc., v. Chinese, etc., Farms, Inc. [Cal. Sup.] 269 P. 443; Hovsepien v. Eskender, supra); and in the action to terminate the rights no receiver could legally be appointed (Cal. Delta Farms, Inc., v. Chinese, etc., Farms, Inc., supra); the remedy of the vendor consisting in the recovery from the vendee of the value of the use and occupation of the land (Johnston v. Fish, 105 Cal. 420, 38 P. 979, 45 Am. St. Rep. 53; Rector v. Lewis, 46 Cal. App. 168, 188 P. 1018; notes, 39 A. L. R. 958; 57 A. L. R. 578).

[8] Appellant claims that the portion of the crops removed and sold by Papazian was necessarily a part of the undivided half thereof which was subject to plaintiff's lien, and that the latter's security was to that extent diminished. Whether Papazian's acts would have had the effect claimed had appellant's lien continued, we need not decide, but, as between the plaintiff and Papazian, the latter's wrongful act could not affect the plaintiff's rights, and, so long as any crops owned by Papazian remained upon the land, the same would still be subject to the lien of the mortgage. Having relinquished his lien, appellant was not in a position to assert that the rights of the plaintiff were diminished by the wrongful acts of the vendee.

[9, 10] It is also contended that the receiver was not the agent of the appellant, but an officer of the court, for whose acts he was not responsible. However this may be, appellant received the proceeds of the crops which were subject to the lien of plaintiff's mortgage, and to which the latter by reason thereof was equitably entitled. Under such circumstances the money may be recovered. Gray v. Huffaker, 176 Cal. 516, 169 P. 1038; Fontaine v. Lacassie, 36 Cal. App. 175, 171 P. 812. Furthermore, the receiver held the crops subject to the mortgage (Von Roun v. Superior Court, 58 Cal. 358; Bories v. Union Building & Loan Ass'n, 141 Cal. 74, 74 P. 552), and, the proceeds having been applied to the benefit of appellant, he was to the amount of the mortgage obligated to repay the same to the plaintiff (Crosby v. Fresno Fruit Growers' Co., 30 Cal. App. 308, 158 P. 1070.)

The judgment is affirmed.

DRURY et al. v. LOS ANGELES RY. CORPORATION. (Civ. 3923.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 18, 1929.

As Modified, on Denial of Rehearing, Dec. 18, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 16, 1930.

1. Carriers ⇨280(3)—Street railway as common carrier of passengers must exercise utmost degree of care (Civ. Code, § 2100).

Under Civ. Code, § 2100, providing that carrier of persons for reward must use utmost care and diligence for their safe carriage, street railway, as common carrier of passengers is bound to exercise utmost degree of care.

2. Trial ⇨295(1)—Instructions relating to same subject must be read together on appeal in determining alleged error in one of them.

Instruction alleged to be erroneous must, on appeal, be read with other instructions pertaining to same subject, in determining alleged error.

3. Carriers ⇨287(1)—Street car stopping regularly at abrupt turn in track should exercise greater care to see that passengers are safely aboard.

Where street car regularly stops for passengers at a safety zone located at beginning of abrupt turn in course of track, greater care should be exercised to see that passengers are safely aboard, and that car is carefully started and operated around curve, since sudden change in direction is likely to increase danger to those remaining on platform or steps.

4. Carriers ⇨348(14)—Instructions in action by passenger who fell off platform of street car held not to exclude contributory negligence in attempting to board car while in motion.

In action for personal injuries sustained when falling from platform of street car while rounding curve, where sole charge of contributory negligence relied on was plaintiff's attempt to board car while in motion, instructions permitting recovery if defendant brought car to standstill and plaintiff was attempting to board car while car was standing still, and defendant negligently moved car forward and plaintiff was solely injured thereby, held not erroneous as omitting all reference to defense of contributory negligence upon which defendant relied.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1064(1)—Instruction that street car passenger suddenly put in position of peril is not negligent if in bewilderment he runs directly to danger, though technically erroneous, held not reversible error.

In action for personal injuries sustained when falling from platform of street car while rounding curve, instruction that, when person without fault is suddenly put in position of peril by negligent act of another, even if in bewilderment he runs directly in very danger which he fears, he is not in fault, though technically erroneous, held not reversible error, in view of other instructions relating to same subject given in greater detail, and which, when read together, showed jury could not be misled thereby.

6. Carriers ⇨347(15)—Whether danger confronting street car passenger falling off rear platform justified clinging to handlebar held for jury.

Whether danger of emergency confronting passenger on street car falling off rear platform while car was rounding curve justified passenger's conduct in clinging to handlebar held for jury.

7. Carriers ⇨338—If ordinarily prudent person would have clung to handlebar when falling off platform of street car under similar circumstances, passenger so doing was not contributorily negligent.

Though passenger of street car falling off rear platform while rounding curve could have saved herself from serious injury by not clinging to handlebar, if ordinarily prudent person would have so acted under similar circumstances, passenger will nevertheless be excused from penalty of what might otherwise amount to contributory negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Action by Edmond Drury and another against the Los Angeles Railway Corporation. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, of Los Angeles (Philip C. Sterry, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

THOMPSON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff Ethel Drury as a result of falling from the platform of a street car while it was rounding a curve in the track. The evidence as to the material issues was conflicting. The defendant challenges certain instructions as erroneous.

The plaintiff Ethel Drury was a teacher of music in the public schools at Los Angeles. About 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon of October 6, 1925, she attempted to board an east-bound Crown Hill street car at the corner of Broadway and First streets for the purpose of returning to her home. At this corner the car made an abrupt left-hand turn from First street northerly onto Broadway. It had stopped on First street opposite a safety zone just before proceeding to round the curve on to Broadway. Several passengers, among whom was the plaintiff Ethel Drury, boarded the car at this point. She was the last person to step upon the car at this station. Regarding the circumstances which led to the accident, there is a serious dispute. According to the testimony of Mrs. Drury and several of her witnesses, the car was at a full stop at this safety zone when several passengers boarded it. All had reached the platform of the car except Mrs. Drury. She secured a place on the steps of the car before it started, grasping the handlebar with her left hand.

A portly lady was entering the car ahead of her. While she was in this position, the car suddenly started and swerved round the curve at quite a rapid rate of speed, estimated by Mrs. Drury to have been about 10 miles an hour. The sudden start and jerking of the car threw her from her balance, and she slipped from the step, still clinging to the handlebar. In this predicament she was dragged a distance of 12 or 15 feet. Her weight pulled her hand down along the bar until her feet were caught under the rear wheels and crushed. Screaming, she released her hold and fell unconscious to the pavement. After rounding the curve, the car stopped. An ambulance was called, and she was taken to the emergency hospital. It was ascertained that her feet and ankles were crushed and that she was seriously injured.

There is no controversy regarding the sufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment, nor is the amount of the verdict questioned. The defendant denied the allegations contained in the complaint of negligence on its part, and, upon the contrary, affirmatively charged the plaintiff with contributory negligence in attempting to board the car while it was in motion. The language of the answer in this regard is as follows: "The said plaintiff carelessly and negligently * * * undertook to board a moving street car of the defendant * * * and so carelessly and negligently conducted herself as aforesaid, that she fell to the pavement and * * * that the injuries * * * resulting therefrom * * * were directly, proximately and concurrently contributed to by the fault * * * of said plaintiff Ethel Drury as aforesaid." No act of alleged contributory negligence other than the attempt to board the car while it was in motion was charged or proved.

[1, 2] The appellant challenges as erroneous three instructions which were given to the jury at the request of the plaintiff. It is claimed two of these instructions violate the rule announced in Pierce v. United Gas & Elec. Co., 161 Cal. 176, 118 P. 700, Keena v. United Railroads of S. F., 57 Cal. App. 124, 207 P. 35, and other California authorities, to the effect that it is erroneous to recite facts of a case in a charge and direct the jury to render a verdict in favor of a particular party in the event they find these specific facts to be true, unless the instruction embraces all the circumstances or features involved in the case which are necessary to fix legal liability upon the opposite party. In the present case, it is asserted that these challenged instructions omitted all reference to the defense of contributory negligence upon which the defendant relied. This was true of the instruction which was condemned in the Keena Case, supra. In that case, however, the defendant railroad company relied upon the defense for the killing of an infant child in a street railway accident on the assertion that the parents of the child were guilty of contributory negligence in permitting it to play in the street where the cars were operated. The instruction in that case did utterly fail to consider the defense of contributory negligence. It merely informed the jury that "if * * * the gripman * * * saw said child upon or near the tracks and did not give any warning of his approach, and * * * that he was negligent in not doing so, and that such negligence proximately contributed to its death * * *" judgment should be rendered in favor of the plaintiff. Clearly this was erroneous. Obviously the gripman of the defendant railroad company may have been guilty of all the negligent acts which were recited in the instruction; these acts may have been the proximate cause of the death of the child, and still, if the negligence of its parents in permitting it to play in a place of danger contributed to the cause of its death, the company would not be liable to the parents in damages. Accepting all the facts related in the Keena instruction as true, the contributory negligence relied upon in that case might still exempt the company from liability. For that reason it was error to predicate a declaration of the right of the plaintiff to recover judgment solely upon the facts recited. Similar omissions of facts vital to issues involved led to a declaration that instructions which were given in the other cases cited by the appellant in this case were erroneous. This criticism does not apply to the first instruction which is challenged in the present case. This instruction is readily distinguishable from that which was involved in the Keena Case. In the present case the defendant relied upon the defense of contributory negligence, consisting solely of a charge that the plaintiff Ethel Drury recklessly tried to board the street car while it was in motion. This instruction specifically based its declaration of plaintiffs' right to a judgment upon facts which are in conflict with, and absolutely precludes the possibility of, the existence of the contributory negligence upon which the defendant relied. If the jury found the car was stationary when it was boarded by Mrs. Drury, then by necessary implication the jury must have found that defendant's charge of contributory negligence was not true. This left no uncertainty as to the law. The jury could not have misunderstood its application. The defendant was deprived of none of the force of its defense of contributory negligence. Indeed, the jury were specifically charged in another instruction, which was given at the request of the defendant, that, if they found from the facts that Mrs. Drury tried to board the car while it was moving, she could not recover damages. The first instruction complained of read in part: "* * * It was the duty of the defendant, * * * to have used the highest or utmost degree of care for her safety," and, therefore, "if you find that the plaintiff, Ethel Drury, had hold of the handlebar and was on the step of said car * * * when said car was standing still, and that while she was in this position the car was negligently started, and that she was thereby thrown from the step of the car and injured, a judgment should be rendered in her favor. This is a correct statement of the law under such circumstances. As a common carrier of passengers, the "utmost degree of care" is required of a street railway company by the provisions of section 2100 of the Civil Code. The finding that Mrs. Drury boarded the car while "it was standing still," and that she "had hold of the handlebar," necessarily excludes the possibility that she was injured while attempting to board it when it was in motion. Moreover, the jury was further charged in defendant's instruction No. V that " * * * the defendant * * * claims * * * that after the street car had started up from its usual stopping place and while it was in motion and in the act of turning the curve * * * the said plaintiff Ethel Drury voluntarily attempted to board the same. If such is the fact the plaintiffs cannot recover." There seems to be no possibility of the jury misunderstanding the correct application of the law declared by these two instructions. They must be read together.

[3, 4] The next instruction complained of read in part as follows: "If you find that the defendant * * * brought the 'Crown Hill' car to a standstill, and the plaintiff, Ethel Drury, was attempting to board the car * * * while said car was standing still, and the defendant (then) negligently moved said car forward and she was solely injured thereby, then your verdict should be for the plaintiffs."

The preceding discussion regarding the former challenged instruction applies likewise to this charge. It is based on the hypothesis that the car was stationary when it was boarded and that the defendant negligently started the car while the plaintiff Mrs. Drury was still in this dangerous position. This instruction is even more specific than the former one, for it authorized a verdict for plaintiff only if her injuries were sustained "solely" by the negligent conduct of the motorman which was specifically described. This instruction was not erroneous. It should be observed that, when a street car regularly stops for passengers at a safety zone which is located at the beginning of an abrupt turn in the course of the track, greater care should be exercised to see that the passengers are safely aboard and that the car is carefully started and operated around the curve, for the reason that the sudden change in the direction in which the car is traveling is likely to increase the danger to those who may remain on the steps or platform of the car.

[5] The last instruction complained of involves the law applicable to the conduct of one who is suddenly placed in imminent danger of serious injury. It evidently refers to the incident disclosed by the evidence, from which it appears that, when Mrs. Drury was thrown from the moving car as it proceeded around the curve, she still clung to the handlebar and was dragged until her feet were caught and crushed beneath the wheels of the car, while with the exercise of better judgment she might have released her hold of the handlebar and fallen to a place of greater safety on the pavement. This instruction read in part: "When a person, without fault on his part, is suddenly put in a position of peril by the negligent act of another, even if in bewilderment he runs directly in the very danger which he fears he is not in fault. * * * Standing alone, this is technically not a correct statement of the law. It was preceded by another instruction relative to the same subject which was given in greater detail, and its application was apparent. When these two instructions are read together, we are inclined to think the jury could not be misled thereby, particularly is this true in view of the fact that the jury were clearly informed that the plaintiff Ethel Drury could not recover if she was guilty of contributory negligence.

The preceding instruction with which this challenged one was read and in connection with which it must be construed was in the following language so far as it is necessary to quote it: "If you find that the plaintiff, Ethel Drury, got upon the step of the car * * * while said car was at a standstill, and the defendant then started said car forward and threw her off said car and thus confronted her with danger of losing her life or great bodily harm, then, in an attempt to save herself (by clinging to the handlebar) she was not required to use the same care that she would otherwise be required to use when not confronted with danger. * * * If you find * * * that she used the care that an ordinarily prudent person would under the same or similar circumstances * * * then she was not guilty of * * * contributory negligence. * * * It is apparent that, since this instruction was immediately followed by the statement that "in a position of peril * * * if, in bewilderment he runs directly into the very danger which he fears, he is not in fault," this language may reasonably be assumed to apply to the incident of Mrs. Drury's clinging to the handlebar when she was thrown from the step of the car. For it was argued that this increased her danger and resulted in the injuries which she sustained. It is not unreasonable to assume that the jury understood the term "she is not in fault" to mean she would not be in fault for the exercise of poor judgment in clinging to the bar, if they should determine that a reasonable person in such an emergency would have done the same. In truth, we are unable to say it was not a most natural and human impulse for one to cling for safety to such a bar, when suddenly thrown from the step of a moving car. Moreover, we are unable to say what the result would have been if she had released her hold of the bar and dropped to the pavement. Her danger might have been thereby increased or it might have been diminished. At least the jury were correctly instructed that in such an emergency one is not held to the same degree of sound reasoning in an effort to extricate himself from a situation of extreme danger. Quoting approvingly from Thompson on Negligence in the case of Waniorek v. United Railroads, 17 Cal. App. at page 124, 118 P. 947, 949, this language, which is appropriate to the situation in the present case, is used: "Where a passenger upon a railway train is, in consequence of the negligent and unskillful operation of its train by the company, placed in a situation so perilous as to render it seemingly prudent for him to leap from the train * * * and he so leaps and is injured, he is entitled to recover damages, although he would not have been hurt, if he had remained on the train."

[6, 7] This doctrine is supported by many authorities, and may not be questioned. It therefore becomes a question for the jury to determine whether the danger of the emergency which confronted Mrs. Drury justified her conduct in clinging to the bar, and, if it did, even though she might have saved herself from serious injury by acting differently, still, if an ordinarily prudent person would have so acted under similar circumstances, she will nevertheless be excused from the penalty of what might otherwise amount to contributory negligence. Bilton v. So. Pac. Co., 148 Cal. 443, 83 P. 440. Of course, the court was not authorized to usurp the province of the jury and instruct them definitely that "she was not in fault." But, construing this instruction with the language of the preceding one in the light of the evidence indicating that the incident of clinging to the handlebar was the only circumstance to which these instructions could have been addressed, we think it is reasonable to hold that the jury must have understood this to mean that "she was not in fault" (under such circumstances) for the use of poor judgment in clinging to the handlebar. At least there is not a miscarriage of justice in this case. Even though this last instruction was in fact technically erroneous, we are of the opinion that the case should not be reversed on that account alone.

Upon examination of the instructions as a whole, we find that the jury were fully, fairly, and correctly instructed as to the law with relation to the essential issues of the case, including the doctrine of the burden of proof, the negligence of the defendant, the proximate cause of injury, and the exemption from liability on the part of the defendant in the event that contributory negligence of the plaintiff was shown. There appears to be no reversible error.

The judgment is affirmed.

FORBES et al. v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (GISH et al., Interveners).★
(Civ. 3704.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 14, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 14, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 13, 1930.

1. Frauds, statute of §144—Stockholder in water company whose property city sought to acquire held not estopped when sued for specific performance to assert agent was not authorized in writing, where means of ascertaining authority were open.

Where representatives of city seeking to acquire canal, water rights, and other property of mutual water company made no effort to ascertain extent and nature of authority which stockholder had given agent in premises, though means of doing so were convenient and ready, stockholder, when sued for specific performance of agreement executed by agent, held not estopped to assert contract was not binding, because agent was not authorized in writing.

2. Estoppel §116—Burden is on one relying on equitable estoppel to show injury, if truth be proved.

One relying on equitable estoppel has burden of showing that he will be injured, if truth be proved.

3. Frauds, statute of §144—Stockholder in water company whose property city sought to acquire held not estopped, when sued for specific performance, to assert invalidity of agreement, where resulting injury was not shown.

Where city seeking to acquire canal, water rights, and other property of mutual water company entered into agreement with each stockholder for transfer of his stock and property without binding itself to take any of property without all thereof, and it was not shown that city offered to pay more than reasonable value, property holder, when sued for specific performance, held not estopped to assert invalidity of agreement executed by agent on ground agent's authority was not in writing, since, where city did not offer to pay any more than reasonable value, there was no showing of injury.

4. Specific performance §44—Payment of full purchase price of realty does not entitle buyer to specific performance.

Payment of full purchase price of real property to seller does not entitle buyer to specific performance, even though buyer is compelled to sue for recovery of consideration paid.

5. Specific performance ☞42—Part performance of oral contract for sale of realty relied on for specific performance must be referable alone to contract (Civ. Code, § 1741).

Part performance of oral contract for sale of realty relied on to take contract out of provisions of Civ. Code, § 1741, requiring sale of real property to be in writing or executed by agent authorized in writing, and providing that court may nevertheless compel specific performance for part performance thereof, must be performance of something required by contract, and mere doing of something because of contract or in reliance thereon is not enough, that is, acts of part performance must be referable alone to contract.

6. Specific performance ☞41—City not having partly performed oral contract to acquire property of stockholder in water company held not entitled to specific performance (Civ. Code, § 1741).

Where city seeking to acquire canal, water rights, and other property of mutual water company entered into agreement with property holder for conveyance of his property with agent who was only verbally authorized, and city had not partly performed contract, city held not entitled to specific performance, since, under Civ. Code, § 1741, oral contract for sale of real property cannot be specifically enforced, in absence of part performance thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mono County; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action by Jennie Forbes and another against the City of Los Angeles and others, in which J. L. Gish and others intervened, and in which defendant named filed a cross-complaint against intervener Katherine Francisco. From a judgment for cross-complainant, intervener last named appeals. Reversed.

Swallow & Richards, of Bishop (Edward Brody, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., W. B. Mathews, Floyd M. Hinshaw, Clarence S. Hill, and S. B. Robinson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

A. R. Honnold, of Escondido, amicus curiæ.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiffs brought this action to cancel a deed purporting to convey to the defendant city the canal, water rights, and other property of the McNally Ditch Company, a mutual water company. The interveners alleged the same facts, and prayed for the same relief as the plaintiffs. The defendant city, which will be referred to as the defendant and respondent, entered into a compromise agreement with the plaintiffs and all of the interveners, except Katherine Francisco, by which it acquired their lands and water stock. The defendant filed answers to the complaint and the complaint in intervention, and also filed a cross-complaint against Mrs. Francisco. The cross-complaint contains two counts. The first count stated, or attempted to state, a cause of action for specific performance. The second stated a cause of action in eminent domain. The court found that the deed sought to be canceled is invalid. The second cause of action stated in the cross-complaint seems not to have been tried, and need not be further noticed. Judgment was entered in favor of the cross-complainant city requiring Mrs. Francisco to convey to it the lands described in the cross-complaint and 61 shares of the capital stock of the McNally Ditch Company. She has appealed from the judgment. The court found the allegations of the cross-complaint to be true. Such allegations are in substance as follows:

The cross-defendant owns the lands described in the cross-complaint and 61 shares of the capital stock of the company. The lands are entitled to receive water from the company for the irrigation thereof. On and prior to August 4, 1924, all of the plaintiffs and interveners owned land within the service area of the ditch and shares of the capital stock of the company, and such "lands and shares of stock * * * constituted all of the farm lands served by the said McNally Ditch and all of the shares of stock of the said McNally Ditch Company, owned and held in connection with farm lands, which had not then been acquired by the said defendant, * * * or in trust for it." Prior to the time mentioned, all of the interveners "had authorized and empowered W. W. Watterson and M. Q. Watterson, * * * and each of them, to act as their agents or agent in negotiating for the sale to said defendant * * * of their several lands and shares of stock, * * * and said intervener, Katherine Francisco, had authorized and empowered her said agents, and each of them, to agree on her behalf to sell her aforesaid lands and shares of stock to the said defendant * * * for the sum of $18,000."

On the day stated, the interveners, "acting by and through their said agent M. Q. Watterson, entered into and delivered to said defendant * * * an agreement in writing, whereby they agreed to sell to the said defendant * * * all of said lands and shares of stock of the said interveners for the aggregate sum of $206,450, and that at the time of the making of said agreement, it was understood between the said M. Q. Watterson and representatives of the said defendant * * * that $18,000 of said aggregate sum of $206,450 would be paid to and received by the intervener, Katherine Francisco, as the purchase price of her said lands and shares of stock." It was understood at that time by such agent, M. Q. Watterson, and the defendant that the defendant would not purchase any of the interveners' lands or stock, unless it was able to purchase all of the lands and stock of all the plaintiffs and interveners. In reliance upon such agreement, the defendant, on August 5, 1924, entered into an agreement with the plaintiffs to purchase their lands and stock for the sum of $114,000. The defendant would not have agreed to purchase the plaintiffs' lands and stock if it had not believed that Mrs. Francisco would perform her agreement to sell her lands and stock to the defendant for $18,000. Prior to any notice or intimation from Mrs. Francisco that she would not perform her agreement, the defendant paid to the plaintiffs the full purchase price of $114,000 for their lands and shares of stock, "and paid in escrow, for the benefit of all of the interveners, in proportion to their respective interests, the aforesaid sum of $206,450." On or about December 26, 1924, Mrs. Francisco, "through her said agent, W. W. Watterson, notified and advised the said defendant that she refused to perform her said agreement to sell and convey to said defendant * * * her said lands and shares of stock for the said sum of $18,000, or for any sum less than $24,000." The agreement of August 4, 1924, "is and was at all times herein mentioned just and reasonable as to said intervener, Katherine Francisco," and the "agreed purchase price of $18,000 is and was at all times herein mentioned, an adequate consideration for the transfer and conveyance of the said lands and shares of stock of the said intervener * * * and more than the actual value of said lands and shares of stock."

The court further found that Mrs. Francisco "never, at any time, authorized or empowered either W. W. Watterson or M. Q. Watterson by any instrument in writing, to act as her agent, or agents for the sale of her property to the defendant, * * * or any other person or corporation whatsoever, and that said Watterson, in negotiating and contracting for the sale of the intervener's land and water stock" to the defendant was "acting upon her verbal authorization only"; and that the defendant "never at any time, in reliance upon the contract of purchase, * * * or at all, entered into the possession of the lands of the intervener (Mrs. Francisco) or any part thereof, or into the possession, use or enjoyment of the water represented by her said 61 shares of stock, * * * and never at any time made any improvements or expended any money upon said lands or any part thereof." From the facts found the court drew the conclusions of law that Mrs. Francisco "is estopped to assert the invalidity" of the agreement of August 4, 1924, and that such agreement "was and is a valid, binding and enforceable agreement, and should be specifically performed by the said intervener."

The agreement reads as follows:

"Bishop, Cal., August 4, 1924.

"W. B. Mathews

"John T. Martin."

Subsequently, in due time, the agreement was completed by its acceptance by the defendant, but on the condition that it was to take all of the property of the interveners or none. The defendant did not irrevocably bind itself to take the property of any of the interveners without all thereof until after it had notice that Mrs. Francisco refused to sell her property at the agreed price. The defendant, however, had paid the plaintiffs the full purchase price of their lands and water stock before it had notice of Mrs. Francisco's refusal. Subsequently, with full knowledge of her refusal, the defendant took the lands and water stock of the other interveners at the agreed prices. The plaintiffs and the interveners constituted two separate groups, represented by different persons. An attorney at law, who represented the defendant in the negotiations, and who drafted the agreement of August 4, 1924, testified that he did not know "just what kind of authority" Watterson had, "except he stated he was authorized," and that he did not know, but assumed, that Watterson was not the attorney in fact of the interveners. M. Q. Watterson, a witness for the defendant, testified that he did not state to any of the defendant's representatives that he "had authority to bind any of these people in a binding agreement." The appellant had no personal negotiations with the representatives of the defendant, and made no statements to them concerning the sale of the property or Watterson's authority to act for her. She declined Watterson's request that she sign an option to sell her property to the defendant. She is bound, if at all, by her oral statement to Watterson that "she would accept the price" of $18,000 for her property and that he "could go ahead and close the deal on it." She knew at that time that the representatives of the defendant had said that it would take none of the property of the interveners without all thereof.

[1] It may be conceded that the evidence supports the finding that appellant verbally authorized the Wattersons to agree in her behalf to sell her property to the defendant. It cannot be held, however, that the appellant is estopped to deny that such authorization was in writing. The representatives of the respondent had convenient and ready means of ascertaining the extent and the nature of the authority which appellant had given the Wattersons, and such representatives made no reasonable effort to ascertain the truth. 10 Cal. Jur. 637; Robbins v. Law, 48 Cal. App. 555, 562, 192 P. 118. The respondent therefore is in the same position as if it had actually known, before accepting Watterson's offer, that his authorization was verbal only.

[2-4] One relying on equitable estoppel has the burden of showing that he will be injured if the truth be proved. 10 Cal. Jur. 638. The respondent failed to make any such showing in this case. Considering, first, the appellant's property alone, there was no injury, because it is alleged and found that the value of the property is less than the agreed price of $18,000. It is not to be inferred that one is injured by a refusal to sell him property for more than it is worth. Considering the properties of the interveners together, it is neither alleged nor found that the respondent paid more than the reasonable value therefor. Neither is it alleged or found that the properties of the plaintiffs are not of the reasonable value paid therefor. It clearly appears from the record in this case that the respondent desired to acquire all of the water rights involved in this action, and it is a matter of current state history that the purchase of such property at a reasonable price would be of great benefit to the respondent. Since it does not appear, therefore, that the respondent paid for any of such property a greater sum than the reasonable value thereof, there is no showing of injury. It is true that the respondent kept the purchase price of the properties in escrow for a few weeks, but it is well settled that the payment of the full purchase price of real property to the seller does not entitle the buyer to specific performance, even though the buyer is compelled to sue for the recovery of the consideration paid. Woerner v. Woerner, 171 Cal. 298, 301, 152 P. 919.

[5, 6] Considering the case from a broader standpoint, it must be conceded that, even though the respondent actually knew that Watterson's authorization was oral, yet, in a proper case, judgment of specific performance would be proper. The Legislature has not left the matter in doubt. Section 1741 of the Civil Code provides:

"No agreement for the sale of real property, or of an interest therein, is valid, unless the same, or some note or memorandum thereof, be in writing, and subscribed by the party to be charged, or his agent, thereunto authorized in writing; but this does not abridge the power of any court to compel the specific performance of any agreement for the sale of real property in case of part performance thereof."

"The Code section [1741] specifically excepts from the operation of the statute of frauds parol agreements, partly performed, and otherwise would be invalid under subdivision 5 of section 1624. If any other exception were intended, here was the place to make it. The framers of our statute deliberately added one express exception, and we must assume that they intended to leave their work complete." Trout v. Ogilvie, 41 Cal. App. 167, 174, 182 P. 333, 335.

"We are led to the general rule of law which has always prevailed, and become consecrated almost as a maxim in the interpretation of statutes, that where the enacting clause is general in its language and objects, and a proviso is afterwards introduced, that proviso is construed strictly, and takes no case out of the enacting clause which does not fall fairly within its terms. In short, a proviso carves special exceptions only out of the enacting clause; and those who set up any such exception, must establish it as being within the words as well as within the reason thereof." United States v. Dickson, 15 Pet. (40 U. S.) 141, 165, 10 L. Ed. 689.

Attention has not been called to any decision in this state holding that an oral contract for the sale of real property can be specifically enforced, in the absence of a part performance thereof. As shown by the terms of section 1741, the part performance relied on must be part performance of the contract sought to be enforced. As stated in Knoff v. Grace, 68 Colo. 527, 190 P. 526, 528, 10 A. L. R. 1492: "Part performance must be part performance; i. e., it must be the performance of something required by the contract. * * * Doing something because of the contract or in reliance on it is not enough." The acts of part performance must be referable alone to the contract. Hambey v. Wise, 181 Cal. 286, 291, 184 P. 9; Blanc v. Connor, 167 Cal. 719, 723, 141 P. 217; Owens v. McNally, 113 Cal. 444, 451, 45 P. 710, 33 L. R. A. 369. The decisions in this state contain many statements to the effect that an oral contract cannot be specifically enforced, in the absence of a showing of part performance thereof, among them the following:

"The contract being oral, it was essential that appellant prove sufficient part performance to take it out of the statute of frauds within the meaning of section 1741, Civil Code." Wood v. Anderson, 199 Cal. 440, 444, 249 P. 862, 864. Such a contract "could only be taken out of the statute and enforced in equity by reason of part performance." Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, 131, 113 P. 147, 152. "Treating the action as one for the specific performance of a contract relating to real property, it was necessary to prove * * * either that the contract was in writing or that it had been partially performed (section 1741, Civ. Code)." Allman v. Rich, 76 Cal. App. 601, 605, 245 P. 439, 441. See, also, Sampson v. Draeger, 88 Cal. App. 105, 262 P. 781; Viau v. Viau, 57 Cal. App. 66, 71, 207 P. 39; Hines v. Copeland, 23 Cal. App. 36, 42, 136 P. 728. "The case is reduced by the findings to an action to enforce a parol contract to convey real estate. Such an action is maintainable only where there has been a part performance sufficient to take the agreement out of the statute of frauds." Woerner v. Woerner, supra. The facts in that case were much stronger in favor of the party claiming an estoppel than in this.

Respondent relies on Seymour v. Oelrichs, 156 Cal. 782, 106 P. 88, 134 Am. St. Rep. 154, and other analogous cases, but the oral contract in that case did not involve the transfer of real estate, and therefore section 1741 of the Civil Code was not applicable thereto.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by Alice H. Comer, as administratrix of the estate of J. J. Comer, deceased, and another, against the Associated Almond Growers of Paso Robles. Judgment for plaintiffs and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Griffith & Thornburgh and Wm. G. Griffith, all of Santa Barbara, for appellant.

M. R. Van Wormer, of San Luis Obispo, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiffs commenced an action to recover a judgment against the defendant for money. Thereafter they filed a second amended complaint. The defendant demurred. Its demurrer was overruled, and thereafter it filed an answer which, among other things, pleaded an earlier judgment as a bar. A trial was had in the trial court before the court sitting without a jury. The court made findings in favor of the plaintiffs, and from a judgment entered thereon the defendant has appealed. In their second amended complaint the plaintiffs alleged the corporate capacity of the defendant; that on the 1st day of November, 1922, the plaintiffs commenced an action, No. 7251, records of the county clerk of San Luis Obispo county, in specific performance against the defendant to compel the defendant to execute a deed to certain lands, and, if it be found that defendant was unable to convey said premises, then to recover judgment in the sum of $15,000, which sum was alleged to be the value of the premises in controversy at the time of the commencement of the action; that the action came on for trial; that the plaintiffs offered to prove by Frank W. Aston that at the time action No. 7251 was commenced, and at the time the action was on trial, Frank W. Aston was the owner of the premises. Objection was made that the evidence was inadmissible because not within the issues, and the objection was sustained; that during the course of the trial the court inquired of defendant's counsel if defendant was able to convey the premises in the event that the court should decide in favor of the plaintiffs; that counsel answered the question in the affirmative and the trial continued; that thereafter the court made findings in favor of the plaintiffs and, among other things, found that the plaintiffs had paid the defendant $13,000 and that plaintiffs were entitled to a conveyance; that thereafter a decree was entered directing defendant forthwith to execute a conveyance and to deliver the conveyance, together with a certificate of title, showing the premises to be free and clear of incumbrances and liens; that for the purpose of carrying said judgment into effect the court appointed a commissioner; that thereafter plaintiffs served a copy of judgment and a notice of entry on the defendant; that the judgment has never been appealed from nor vacated and has become a final judgment; that the defendant did not execute the conveyance; that the commissioner did execute the conveyance; that at the time the said action No.

7251 was commenced the defendant was not, and is not, the owner of said premises; that the conveyance is void; that the plaintiffs have paid the defendant $13,000, no part of which has been returned; that by reason of the representation of defendant's counsel in open court on the trial of action No. 7251 the plaintiffs and the trial court relied thereon and acted thereon; and that the defendant is estopped from setting up the judgment in action No. 7251 as a bar in this action. The trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiffs on each of the allegations except as follows:

"That by reason of the stipulations, assurances and representations of defendant's said counsel with respect to defendant's ability to convey title to said premises, referred to in paragraphs three and four in the complaint herein, plaintiffs' counsel was misled and, after the representation had been made, as aforesaid, he proceeded in the said cause to its completion in full reliance thereupon, and that after the said matters were stated by defendant's counsel plaintiffs verily believed that defendant could and would convey title to said premises to them; that the issue of defendant's ability to convey title to said premises was withdrawn from said cause by reason of said remarks, stipulations and representations, and by reason thereof defendant is estopped in this action from setting up the defense of res adjudicata. Among other things, the trial court found:

"That is it true that the plaintiffs and their counsel well knew that the defendant had only a contract to purchase said premises and that its ability to convey to the plaintiffs depended upon its paying the said Aston the balance due on said contract.

"That all of the allegations of the second defense set forth in defendant's answer are true, excepting that it is not true that the plaintiffs are estopped by the judgment in said action No. 7251 from maintaining this action."

The defendant claims it was not estopped from setting up the defense of res adjudicata. It claims that the statement made by the defendant in action No. 7251 was a promise to do something in the future and should be classed in the realm of contracts and cannot be used to create an estoppel. It cites and relies on Corpus Juris 1142, § 144. It is stated in the text that such is the general rule. But in the next section of the text "Exceptions to Rule" are enumerated, and Seymour v. Oelrichs, 156 Cal. 782, 106 P. 88, 134 Am. St. Rep. 154, is cited in the notes. In that case, at page 797 of 156 Cal., 106 P. 95, 134 Am. St. Rep. 154, the court said: "Practically, defendants said to plaintiff: 'We want you to enter our employ at once. We know that to do so you must give up your life position in the police department and that you are not willing to do this unless you are assured of employment for ten years at $300 a month. A written contract is, under our statute, essential to guarantee you such employment. We will execute this contract just as soon as Mr. Fair returns from Europe. Go ahead and resign your position now and commence work with us at once, and it will be all right. The written contract will be given as promised.'" At another place the court quotes with approval from Anderson v. Hubble, 93 Ind. 570, 47 Am. Rep. 394: "All that is meant in the expression that an estoppel must possess an element of fraud is that the case must be one in which the circumstances and conduct would render it a fraud for the party to deny what he had previously induced or suffered another to believe and take action upon. * * *

There need be no precedent corrupt motive or evil design." Then, at page 799 of 156 Cal., 106 P. 96, 134 Am. St. Rep. 154, the court said: "While the question is by no means free from doubt, we believe that it should be held that there were sufficient facts in this case to support a conclusion that the promise here to give such a written agreement as was required by the statute was made under such circumstances that the irrevocable surrender by plaintiff of his position in the police department in full reliance thereon made it, in the eye of equity, a binding contract, the subsequent repudiation of which by defendants would constitute such a manifest fraud as would justify the application of the doctrine of equitable estoppel." We think the exception, stated in 21 Corpus Juris 1142, § 145, rather than the rule, is applicable in this case.

It is unnecessary to discuss any other point.

We find no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

MITCHELL v. TUTTLE et ex. (Civ. 5783.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 15, 1929.

1. Fraud ⇨30—Innocent assignor of leasehold could not be held for damages for fraudulent representations of coassignor.

Where assignor of leasehold had no knowledge as to alleged fraudulent misrepresentations of her coassignor, innocent assignor could not be held for damages.

2. Fraud ⇨49—In deceit action, plaintiff need prove but single material false representation, made with intent to deceive, and which did deceive, plaintiff to his injury.

In action for deceit, plaintiff is required to prove but single material false representation, made by defendant to plaintiff with intent and purpose to deceive, and which in fact did deceive, plaintiff and was relied and acted on by him to his injury, notwithstanding multitudinous allegations of fraud.

3. Fraud ⇨12—Representation of assignor of leasehold that property was occupied by permanent tenants held material statement of fact in deceit action.

In action for deceit against assignor of leasehold, representation that property was occupied by permanent tenants, who would remain as tenants during remainder of lease, held material statement of fact, where assignor had knowledge that tenants were navy attachés, who might vacate property at any time.

4. Fraud ⇨13(2)—Assignor's testimony that tenancy of navy attachés varied from four months onward could not be accepted as excuse that assignor did not know falsity of statement regarding permanency of tenancy.

Where assignor of leasehold knew that tenants were navy attachés, liable to vacate at any time, testimony in action against assignor for deceit that tenancy of navy attachés varied from four months onward, and that he always considered them on par with civilians, could not be accepted as excuse that, at time he made statement regarding permanency of tenants, he did not know statement to be false.

5. Fraud ⇨58(4)—In deceit action, evidence as to reliance on false representations as to permanency of tenants held sufficient.

In action for deceit, testimony that assignee relied on representations made by assignor and his agents regarding permanency of tenants of leasehold assigned held sufficient evidence as to reliance on representations.

6. Fraud ⇨59(2)—Measure of damages in deceit action is difference between actual value of property and its value had property been as represented.

Measure of damages which person is ordinarily entitled to recover in action for deceit in sale of property is difference between actual value of property and its value had property been as represented, and measure of recovery is not affected by price paid.

7. Fraud ⇨30—Innocent assignor of leasehold should not be allowed to reap benefits of assignment procured by fraud of coassignor.

Innocent assignor of leasehold should not be allowed to reap part of benefits of assignment procured by fraudulent representation of coassignor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. T. Price, Judge.

Action by Nellie Hopple Mitchell against Leroy R. Tuttle and Belle M. Tuttle. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed as to last-named defendant, reversed and remanded as to first-named defendant, and affirmed in part.

O. C. Sattinger, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

John J. Monahan, of San Pedro, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. For the sum of $780 in cash and a promissory note executed by plaintiff in favor of the defendants, plaintiff purchased from the defendants a leasehold interest in a furnished bungalow court. Shortly thereafter plaintiff brought an action against the defendants for damages, based upon alleged false and fraudulent representations made by the defendants to plaintiff in inducing her to purchase said leasehold interest. From a judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $881 and the cancellation of said promissory note, the defendants have appealed.

[1] At the outset, appellants urge that in no event can the judgment stand as against defendant Belle M. Tuttle, who was the wife of her codefendant. In that connection the evidence shows that, although Belle M. Tuttle was one of the owners of the leasehold interest which forms the subject-matter of the action, at no time did she personally make or cause to be made either or any of the alleged fraudulent misrepresentations upon which plaintiff relied, to her injury. The only action taken in the premises by said defendant was that, after the sale of the leasehold interest had been consummated, said defendant joined with her codefendant in executing a transfer or assignment thereof to plaintiff; also that said defendant verified the joint answer of the defendants to the complaint. The evidence fails in showing knowledge at any time in said defendant of any of the alleged fraudulent statements made by her codefendant to plaintiff; nor, other than the fact that the promissory note given as part of the consideration for the assignment of the leasehold interest was executed in favor of the two defendants, does the evidence show any present or possible future participation by said defendant in any of the benefits resulting or to result from the sale of said leasehold interest. Other than some authorities which relate to the rule applicable to the ratification of contracts (as distinguished from torts), none is cited by respondent which would tend to uphold the judgment herein as against said defendant Belle M. Tuttle. To the contrary, the authorities in general are to the effect that in circumstances such as are herein disclosed no civil liability is incurred by one standing in the relation to the facts as does the defendant Belle M. Tuttle in the instant case. 12 Cal. Jur. 774, 775, and cases there cited.

[2] It is next urged by appellants that each of the false and fraudulent representations alleged by plaintiff to have been made by the defendants was but an expression of opinion, and consequently could not form the basis for an action for damages. The law is well settled that, in an action for deceit, in establishing his case, notwithstanding multitudinous allegations contained within the complaint, the plaintiff is required to prove but a single, material, false representation made by the defendant to the plaintiff with the intent and purpose to deceive him, and which in fact did deceive the plaintiff, and was relied on and acted upon by him to his injury. 12 Cal. Jur. 834; Thomas v. Hacker, 179 Cal. 731, 733, 178 P. 855; Davis v. Butler, 154 Cal. 623, 626, 98 P. 1047.

[3] The evidence herein satisfactorily establishes the fact, as against defendant Leroy R. Tuttle, as found by the trial court, that "the said defendants and each of them then and there represented to this plaintiff that the income from said leased property was six hundred twenty dollars ($620) per month; that such income would be permanent, and that the tenants then and there occupying such leased premises were permanent tenants, and would remain therein as tenants during the remainder of the term of said lease." That part of such finding of fact which relates to the permanency of the tenants constitutes the subject of appellants' attack. It is conceded by appellants that, within the knowledge of defendant Leroy R. Tuttle, at the time of the execution of the assignment to plaintiff of the lease in question, all the tenants in the leased bungalow court were "navy folk," attached to a fleet at nearby anchorage, and that on the departure of the fleet (which might take place at any time) such tenants would vacate the leased premises. In such circumstances, the statement made by the defendants "that the tenants then and there occupying such leased premises were permanent tenants, and would remain therein as tenants during the remainder of the term of said lease," became a material statement of a matter of fact. 12 Cal. Jur. 725 et seq. Deceit may consist of "the suggestion, as a fact, of that which is not true, by one who does not believe it to be true." Section 1710, Civ. Code.

[4] In view of the admitted familiarity of defendant Leroy R. Tuttle with the facts regarding the possibility of an early vacation by the then tenants of the leased premises, the fact that, according to his testimony, the tenancy of rooms or apartments by "navy folk" varied from "four months onward," and that he "always considered them on a par with civilians," cannot be accepted as an excuse that, at the time he made the statement regarding the "permanency" of the tenants occupying the leased premises, he did not know it to be false. The evidence showed that he was fully acquainted with the possibilities likely to arise from the situation, and he was not warranted in making a positive assertion of something which only might be true—dependent wholly upon contingencies over which he had no control.

[5] The further contention by appellants that plaintiff did not rely upon the false representations made to her by Leroy R. Tuttle is completely answered by the following excerpt from the testimony given by plaintiff on the trial of the action:

"Q. Did you rely upon your own judgment, or did you rely upon the representations made? A. I relied upon the representations made by Mr. Tuttle and his agent, Mr. Winters."

[6] Appellants also contend that no proof of damages suffered by plaintiff was received on the trial of the action, nor any evidence introduced in support of the judgment. As to the latter contention (exclusive of the proof of damages), without here attempting to recite the evidence adduced on the trial, it may suffice to state that, in the opinion of this court, it was sufficient to justify the findings made by the trial court, and that, predicated upon such findings, the general effect of the judgment is in accordance with the law relating thereto. As to the first point, appellants' complaint appears to be that, in actions of the character of that here involved, a judgment for damages must be founded upon evidence of the difference between the value of what plaintiff received in the transaction, and what value she would have received, had the representations made by the defendants to the plaintiff been true, and that on the trial of the action no evidence was received relating to either of such values. In support of such suggestion as to the law on the question of damages, appellants cite the following authorities: Hines v. Brode, 168 Cal. 507, 143 P. 729; George Cople Co. v. Hinds, 34 Cal. App. 576, 170 P. 155; Hyman v. Harbor View L. Co., 46 Cal. App. 98, 188 P. 828; Foster v. Gorham, 63 Cal. App. 601, 219 P. 476.

In considering the question thus presented, it should be borne in mind that no attempt, either in law or in fact, was made by plaintiff to rescind the contract. To the contrary, so far as may be ascertained from the allegations contained in the amended complaint, the theory of the pleader was, not that the contract should be rescinded, but that, for the alleged deceit of defendants, plaintiff should be entitled to recover damages. An examination of the record herein discloses the fact that judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $881, besides directing the cancellation of the promissory note hereinbefore referred to. Although the evidence established that, as consideration for the assignment of the leasehold interest in question, plaintiff gave the defendant Leroy R. Tuttle the sum of $780 in cash, together with said promissory note for $220, and that said sum of $780 represented and in fact was a payment by said defendant to the owner or lessor of the premises of the last two months' rental provided by the lease which was transferred, no other evidence was introduced to show either the value of the leasehold interest at the time it was assigned to plaintiff, or what its value would have been had the representations made by defendant Leroy R. Tuttle to plaintiff been true.

In the case of Hullinger v. Big Sespe Oil Co., 50 Cal. App. 6, 194 P. 742, as in the instant case, plaintiff sought to recover damages for deceit. There, as here, in the introduction of evidence the plaintiff failed to follow the rule indicated in the case of Hines v. Brode, 168 Cal. 507, 143 P. 729, 730, wherein it is said: "That rule declares that the measure of damages which a person is ordinarily entitled to recover in an action for deceit in the sale of property is the difference between the actual value of the property and its value had the property been as represented, and that the measure of recovery is not affected by the price paid. The price paid may be considered only as evidence of value. * * * This is not only the rule in California, but it is declared to be the rule under the great weight of authority. * * *"

In the case of Hullinger v. Big Sespe Oil Co., 50 Cal. App. 6, 194 P. 742, 743, a judgment in favor of the respondent was reversed. In part, it is there said: "* * * From the findings in this case, we are unable to determine if the court, in rendering its judgment, took into consideration the fact that under the contract there was due from plaintiff the sum of $13,000 in unpaid installments. It is somewhat significant that the amount allowed as damages for failure to deliver a fee-simple title is the equivalent of the amount paid by plaintiff at the time of the execution of the lease contract, with interest thereon; and it may well be inferred that it was the intention of the court to compel the defendant to restore the amount it had received on the purchase price of the lease, without any rescission by the plaintiff on discovery of the fraud. This inference is fortified by the circumstances that there is no testimony in the record before us upon which to base a finding that the sum so assessed was the actual damage sustained, except so far as the amount agreed to be paid might be considered as evidence of the value of the property had it been as represented."

The Supreme Court denied a petition for hearing before that tribunal and, regarding the damages recoverable in such an action, said: "* * * The law as to the amount that may be recovered in such an action and what must be set off against any damage proved is sufficiently declared in Hines v. Brode, 168 Cal. 507, 143 P. 729."

In the instant case it may be conjectured that the "damages" properly recoverable by plaintiff, which the judge of the trial court thought plaintiff was entitled to recover, was the $780 cash paid by plaintiff to defendant Leroy R. Tuttle, plus the sum of $101 for some unascertainable reason, and in addition thereto, have cancelled the promissory note given by plaintiff to defendants. Although in natural justice it may be that the actual legal damage suffered by plaintiff was the equivalent of the exact relief attempted to be administered by the judgment which was rendered, the law has provided a method of ascertaining damages in such cases differing from that adopted by the trial court.

[7] At the same time that the answer to the complaint in the action was filed defendants interposed a cross-demand for judgment against plaintiff on the promissory note executed by her in favor of defendants. With reference thereto, it was adjudged by the trial court that said promissory note "was and is without consideration and void, and that the same shall be forthwith cancelled and delivered to the plaintiff herein. * * *" Although, considering that the effect of the action for deceit was to ratify the contract of purchase, and consequently that, inasmuch as the promissory note was a part of the purchase price for the leasehold interest which was assigned by defendants to plaintiff, it may be said that a quasi consideration for the execution of the promissory note was present, from the entire findings made by the trial court it is clear that the intention in the premises was to declare void the entire transaction solely because of the fraudulent misrepresentations made by defendant Leroy R. Tuttle to plaintiff, to which reference has heretofore been had herein. On a retrial of the issue of damages, the status and effect of the promissory note should be taken into consideration by the trial court in arriving at the amount, if any, which plaintiff is entitled to recover as against defendant Leroy R. Tuttle; or, if the court should determine that plaintiff is entitled to recover no damages, the item represented by the promissory note may then be justly adjusted between the plaintiff and said defendants; otherwise, if the promissory note executed by plaintiff in favor of the two defendants were to be considered as a binding obligation on the part of plaintiff and in favor of the two defendants, then the defendant Belle M. Tuttle, although not bound by the fraudulent misrepresentations made by defendant Leroy R. Tuttle to plaintiff, and not liable to respond in damages therefor, would be permitted to reap a part of the benefits of the fraudulent transaction. This she should not be allowed to do.

It is ordered that as to defendant Belle M. Tuttle the judgment awarding damages against her be and it is reversed, and that as to defendant Leroy R. Tuttle the judgment awarding damages be and it is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial as against him, for the sole purpose of determining the amount (if any) of the damages to be awarded against him. The judgment, in so far as it cancels said note, is affirmed.

LOWMILLER v. MONROE, LYON & MILLER, Inc., et al. (Civ. 7053.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 7, 1929.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 5, 1929.

1. Principal and agent ⇨159(1) — Ostensible principal may be liable for torts of ostensible agent.

Principal under an ostensible authority, which through fault or negligence he has permitted, may be held liable for torts of an ostensible agent.

2. Evidence ⇨272—In personal injury action, original answer could be treated as declaration against interest, in determining whether driver of automobile was servant of codefendant or independent contractor.

In action for damages for personal injuries sustained while riding in automobile, where it appeared defendant's salesman had hired bus driver to transport plaintiff to view property which defendant had for sale, original answer, admitting that defendant had invited plaintiff to view property, could be treated as declaration against interest, to be taken into consideration with all other evidence in determining whether relationship existing between driver of automobile and codefendant was that of master and servant, or of an independent contractor.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

On petition for rehearing. Petition denied. For former opinion, see 281 P. 433.

J. Hampton Hoge, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel and Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In its petition for rehearing herein, the appellant complains that the opinion heretofore filed fails to refer to certain assignments of error made by appellant and particularly to the giving of certain instructions. Notwithstanding the fact that appellant wholly failed to comply with the provisions of section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure, and with rule 8 of the rules of the Supreme Court, we did consider the assignments made, but did not touch upon them, as we considered them wholly without merit.

[1] As to the instruction covering the law of ostensible agency, it is argued that under no circumstances can the doctrine of ostensible agency apply in an action for tort, and the cases of Barton v. Studebaker Corporation, 46 Cal. App. 707, 189 P. 1025, and Smith v. Belshaw, 89 Cal. 427, 26 P. 834, are cited as authority. Neither case supports the rule contended for. Both hold that, under the facts of the particular case considered, proof of ostensible agency was insufficient to fasten liability on the purported master. The rule applicable to the case at hand is fully stated in Donnelly v. San Francisco Bridge Co., 117 Cal. 417, 422, 49 P. 559, 560, where the express provisions of section 2330 of the Civil Code are relied on for the holding that "no reason exists why the principal under an ostensible authority, which through fault or negligence he has permitted, should be exonerated from liability for the torts of the ostensible agent, any more than would the principal in the case of an actual agency."

In the case at hand Clark, Black, and Friedman were all licensed as real estate salesmen at the request of and under the employment of the appellant herein. Their licenses were issued by the state real estate commissioner under the provisions of the act of 1919 (St. 1919, p. 1252), and any attempt to create for them the status of independent contractor or broker would have been in violation of the penal provisions of that act. The jury, of course, was entitled to presume that none of the parties hereto had purposefully committed a crime within the terms of that act. At the same time the jury was entitled to believe all the testimony, which showed unmistakably that up to the time of the trial the corporation held itself out as the broker having sole authority to make the sales, and that during the same time the corporation, as well as the agents, deliberately and purposefully represented to the plaintiff and to the prospective customers that these parties were merely agents of the corporation, and that the corporation and it alone had sole authority to arrange for the sale of the lots and that all others acting or engaged in any capacity in connection with the sales or prospective sales of the lots were acting as the agents and employees of the corporation alone.

[2] Complaint is also made of our failure to comment upon the instruction relating to the admission of the original answer in evidence. The point is that the original complaint charged that the defendant corporation invited and solicited the plaintiff to view and inspect the properties for the purpose of offering them for sale. This allegation was admitted in the original answer filed by the corporation, but after the trial had progressed this appellant asked and obtained leave to file an amended answer in which this allegation was denied. In instructing the jury the trial judge advised them that they could take these facts into consideration in determining the question as to the relation of the parties defendant. The instruction is not, as urged by appellant, an instruction that the original answer should be taken as an admission or confession of the facts pleaded in the complaint. The instruction as given means that the original answer may be treated as a declaration against interest to be taken with all other evidence in the case to determine the disputed question of fact—that of agency.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

Ex parte BROWN. (Cr. 1102.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 19, 1929.

1. Habeas corpus ⇨92(1)—Whether indictment charges an offense within jurisdiction of trial court will not be determined in habeas corpus proceedings.

Where indictment purports or attempts to state an offense of kind of which court assuming to proceed has jurisdiction, question whether facts charged are sufficient to constitute an offense of that kind will not be determined in habeas corpus proceedings.

2. Habeas corpus ⇨30(2)—Indictment for making false financial statement to bank examiner held sufficient to charge public offense on application for habeas corpus (Bank Act Wash. § 56).

Indictment for making false financial statement to bank examiner, charging violation of Bank Act Wash. § 56 (Laws 1917, p. 299), which did not allege that accused was officer, agent, or employee of bank, held sufficient to charge public offense, on habeas corpus proceedings to secure release of accused from custody on an executive warrant for his extradition.

3. Habeas corpus ⇨30(2)—In habeas corpus proceedings to secure release of accused from custody on extradition warrant, indictment in language of statute is sufficient.

Indictment which follows language of statute is sufficient for purposes of habeas corpus proceedings to secure release of accused from custody on an executive warrant for his extradition.

Application of H. P. Brown for writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Inman & West, of Sacramento, and Morgan J. Doyle, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

L. B. Donley, Deputy Atty. Gen., of Washington, and Frank R. Devlin and Philip H. Angell, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The petitioner has applied for a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that he is illegally restrained of his liberty under an executive warrant issued by the Governor of this state, after a hearing, upon the demand of the Governor of the state of Washington for the extradition of the petitioner, who was indicted by the grand jury of the county of Grays Harbor, Wash., on five counts, in each of which it is charged, in substance: That the petitioner did "willfully, knowingly, maliciously, fraudulently, feloniously and unlawfully make, subscribe, exhibit to and file with Hayes & Hayes, Inc., bankers, a banking corporation duly organized and existing pursuant to the laws of the state of Washington as a state bank," a false financial statement of assets and liabilities, "with the intent to deceive the examiner or examiners or other person or persons who were authorized by law to examine into the affairs of said banking corporation."

The alleged false financial statement referred to in the first count purported to set forth the assets and liabilities of the petitioner and those in the other counts the assets and liabilities, respectively, of four different corporations.

Section 56 of the Washington Bank Act reads as follows: "Every person who shall knowingly subscribe to or make or cause to be made any false statement or false entry in the books of any bank or trust company or shall knowingly subscribe to or exhibit any false or fictitious paper or security, instrument or paper, with the intent to deceive any person authorized to examine into the affairs of any bank or trust company or shall make, state or publish any false statement of the amount of the assets or liabilities of any bank or trust company shall be guilty of a felony." (Laws 1917, p. 299.)

[1] Petitioner contends that the indictment fails to state a public offense, that the section quoted applies only to "the officers, agents, employees and banking personnel of banks," and that the indictment does not allege that the petitioner is an officer, agent, or employee.

"On habeas corpus the inquiry into the sufficiency of an indictment is limited. We think the true rule is that, where an indictment purports or attempts to state an offense of a kind of which the court assuming to proceed has jurisdiction, the question whether the facts charged are sufficient to constitute an offense of that kind will not be examined into on habeas corpus." Matter of Ruef, 150 Cal. 665, 666, 89 P. 605; Ex parte Cordish (Cal. App.) 271 P. 784.

"By the laws of Pennsylvania, every indictment is to be deemed and adjudged sufficient and good in law which charges the crime substantially in the language of the act of Assembly prohibiting its commission, and prescribing the punishment therefor. * * * That commonwealth has the right to establish the forms of pleadings and process to be observed in her own courts, * * * subject only to those provisions of the constitution of the United States involving the protection of life, liberty, and property in all the states of the Union." Ex parte Reggel, 114 U. S. 642, 5 S. Ct. 1148, 1153, 29 L. Ed. 250.

"In extradition proceedings, * * * the purpose of the writ [of habeas corpus] is not to substitute the judgment of another tribunal upon the facts or the law of the matter to be tried. * * * And even if it be true that the argument stated offers a nice question, it is a question as to the law of New York which the New York courts must decide. * * * When, as here, * * * the indictment by a grand jury for what it and the Governor of New York allege to be a crime in that state, and the reasonable possibility that it may be such, all appear, the constitutionally required surrender is not to be interfered with by the summary process of habeas corpus upon speculations as to what ought to be the result of a trial in the place where the Constitution provides for its taking place." Drew v. Thaw, 235 U. S. 432, 35 S. Ct. 137, 138, 59 L. Ed. 302; Biddinger v. Commissioner of Police, 245 U. S. 128, 38 S. Ct. 41, 62 L. Ed. 193.

[2] Testing the indictment by the foregoing rules, it cannot be held, in this proceeding, that it does not substantially charge a public offense. The act of the cashier of a bank in keeping on file a false statement of the kind alleged in the indictment, with the intent to deceive a bank examiner, would doubtless constitute a violation of section 56 of the Washington Bank Act. If a customer of the bank, knowing the purpose of the cashier, should make and file with the bank such a false financial statement, even though he might be termed an accessory before the fact, would be liable to indictment, trial, and punishment as a principal. Remington's Compiled Statutes of Washington, § 2007. It cannot be said that there is not a "reasonable possibility" that the indictment may be held sufficient to warrant a conviction upon proof of facts of the kind stated.

[3] Whether the making and filing of a false financial statement with the officers of a bank, with intent to deceive a bank examiner, where such officers in good faith believe the statement to be true, is a violation of section 56 appears never to have been decided by the Washington courts. There is at least a "reasonable possibility" that such acts by a customer of a bank, for the purpose of establishing or maintaining his credit, may be held to be a violation of that section. It is true that the indictment does not allege that the petitioner was a customer of the bank at the time of the alleged acts or that he made and filed the alleged false statement for the purpose of establishing or maintaining his credit, but this defect, if it is a defect, is one of uncertainty only, which cannot be considered in this proceeding. The courts of Washington, in common with those of many other states, have held that it is sufficient generally to charge an offense defined in a statute in the language of the statute. The charge in the indictment follows the language of the statute and, for the purposes of this summary proceeding, it is deemed sufficient.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner is remanded to the custody of respondent, W. A. Hamm, sheriff of Grays Harbor county, Wash.

CORNELIUS v. HOLLAND et al. (Civ. 5744.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 21, 1929.

1. Partnership ⇨20—Parties purchasing half interests in lot, which they agreed to improve and try to sell at profit, dividing profits or losses equally, held partners (Civ. Code, § 2395).

Persons acquiring undivided half interests in lot, for which each paid half of purchase price, and agreeing to improve it, each bearing half of cost, and to endeavor to sell it at profit, dividing all profits or losses equally, held partners with regard thereto, under Civ. Code, § 2395.

2. Partnership ⇨140—Partner signing card listing partnership lot with broker for sale obligated partnership to pay commission (Civ. Code, § 2429).

One of two partners, acquiring half interest in lot for purpose of improving and selling it, obligated partnership to pay commission on sale thereof, under Civ. Code, § 2429, by signing card listing it with broker for sale.

3. Brokers ⇨40—Partnership ⇨157(1)—Partner signing escrow instructions to pay commission to broker, with whom copartner listed partnership lot for sale, ratified latter's act, and also entered into new, independent obligation to pay commission.

Partner signing escrow instructions, authorizing payment of commission to broker, referred to therein as "my agent," for selling partnership lot listed by copartner, not only ratified latter's act, but entered into new and independent obligation to pay commission.

4. Principal and agent $\Rightarrow$ 23(1)—Evidence held to show agency between broker and salesman procuring purchaser.

Testimony of one, to whom partner delivered card listing partnership property for sale, that he was real estate salesman with company under name of which broker conducted business, and escrow instructions, signed by such partner providing for payment of commission to such company, "my agent," held to establish agency between broker and such salesman who procured purchaser.

5. Principal and agent $\Rightarrow$ 171(6)—Agent's services held ratified by action against third person for such services.

Defendant, in action to recover for services rendered by plaintiff through his employee or agent, cannot be heard to question agent's authority to represent principal; latter having ratified and adopted agent's acts by instituting action.

6. Brokers $\Rightarrow$ 43(2)—Salesman need not have written authority to act for broker to enable latter to take advantage of fruits of his labor.

A real estate salesman need not have written authority to act for and on behalf of broker who employs him in order for such broker to take advantage of fruits of salesman's labor.

7. Costs $\Rightarrow$ 260(4)—Appeal from judgment for broker's commission by defendant contending solely that no agency was shown between plaintiff and salesman procuring purchaser held frivolous, warranting addition of \$100 to costs as damages.

Appeal from judgment for plaintiff in broker's action for commission by defendant, whose sole contention was that no agency was shown between plaintiff and salesman who procured purchaser, held frivolous, so as to warrant addition of $100 to costs of appeal as damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by J. A. Cornelius, doing business under the name and style of J. A. Cornelius Realty Company, against Granville Holland and Norton H. Edwards. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Edwards appeals. Affirmed.

Philip Cohen, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Howard F. Shepherd and B. L. Hoyt, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BURNELL, Justice pro tem. Prior to the transaction which gave rise to this litigation the defendants, Granville Holland and Norton H. Edwards, together with their respective wives, acquired title to a lot in the city of Beverly Hills, an undivided one-half interest therein being conveyed to each couple as joint tenants. Each of the defendants paid one-half of the purchase price of the lot, their agreement being that they would improve the same, each bearing one-half of the cost of such improvement, and would endeavor to sell the property so improved at a profit, and that all profits or losses arising from the improvement and sale should be equally divided between them. Prior to April 24, 1925, Holland, with the knowledge and consent of Edwards verbally expressed, employed the plaintiff as a broker to sell the property. Evidencing such employment Holland signed a listing card describing the property, specifying the price asked as $35,000, stating the terms of sale and agreeing to pay a commission of 5 per cent. of the sales price to the broker. The broker's name was not filled in, but the listing card was delivered so signed to one Eger, who was an employee of and a licensed salesman under the plaintiff, to whom he in turn delivered it. Thereafter the plaintiff, acting through his employee Eger, procured one Illitch—whom the court found was "ready, willing and able to buy said property"—to pay a deposit of $2,000 on account of the purchase price thereof and to sign an agreement to complete the purchase on the terms and for the price demanded by the sellers. To the deposit receipt containing this agreement was appended the following: "I agree to sell the above described property on the terms and conditions herein stated and agree to pay the above signed agent as commission the sum of Seventeen Hundred and Fifty and no/100 Dollars $1750.00 Dollars, or one-half the deposit in case same is forfeited by purchaser, provided the same shall not exceed the full amount of the commission. Granville Holland, Seller. Paul L. Eger, Witness." Thereupon Illitch and the two defendants went into escrow, the sellers' instructions being signed by both Holland and Edwards and containing a direction to the escrow holder to pay a commission of $1,750 "to Cornelius Realty Co. (Paul L. Eger) my agent in this sale. * * *" About five months later the sale fell through by reason of a failure on the part of Holland and Edwards to complete the house under construction on the lot in question. The notice to the bank to cancel the escrow instruction was signed by Edwards and wife. Cornelius then brought this action against Holland and Edwards to recover his commission, and judgment was rendered in his favor as against both defendants, from which judgment Edwards alone appeals.

[1-5] From the foregoing recital of the facts as found by the court, and as sufficiently established by the evidence, it is clear that a partnership existed between appellant Edwards and his codefendant Holland with regard to the lot (Civ. Code, § 2395), and that by signing the listing card Holland obligated the partnership to pay a commission on the sale of the partnership property (Civ. Code, § 2429). Furthermore, by signing the sellers' escrow instructions, which authorized the payment of the commission to plaintiff, referred to therein as "my agent," appellant not only ratified the previous act of Holland but entered into a new and independent obligation to pay the commission. That everything was done by the broker to entitle him to the commission (Gunn v. Bank of California, 99 Cal. 349, 33 P. 1105; Oullahan v. Baldwin, 100 Cal. 648, 35 P. 310; Tuso v. Green, 194 Cal. 574, 229 P. 327; Smith v. Schiele, 93 Cal. 144, 28 P. 857) is not disputed by appellant, whose sole contention—the basis of every point he seeks to make for a reversal of the judgment—is that no agency was shown to have existed between the plaintiff and Eger, through whom the transaction was handled. This point is so utterly without plausibility that we find it difficult to believe that it is advanced for any purpose other than delay. Eger himself testified that he was a real estate salesman with the Cornelius Realty Company, which was the name under which the plaintiff conducted his business; the escrow instructions signed by appellant provided for payment of the commission "to Cornelius Realty Co. (Paul L. Eger) my agent in this sale." Plaintiff himself, were he sought to be bound by Eger's act, might defend upon the ground that Eger was not his agent, but we can conceive of no theory upon which the defendant in an action in which the plaintiff seeks recovery for services rendered by himself through his employee or agent, thereby in the strongest manner possible ratifying and adopting such acts (Delano v. Jacoby, 96 Cal. 275, 31 P. 290, 31 Am. St. Rep. 201), can be heard to question the authority of the agent to represent the principal. A somewhat similar point was presented in Nelson v. Colton, 36 Cal. App. 69, 171 P. 701, 704, where the purchaser of certain land claimed that the sale was void for the reason that the broker's authority to sell was not in writing as required by section 1624, subd. 5, of the Civil Code, and the court there said: "In its application to this case, there is clearly no force in the point. Whether Crawford was legally authorized to make a binding contract for the sale of the land, was a matter entirely between him and Colton, the owner of the land. The latter has not questioned Crawford's authority or act in that regard. On the contrary, he ratified all that Crawford did under his verbal authority by conveying the land to Nelson."

[6] Appellant cites a number of cases as supporting his strange theory. All of them have to do with the relationship between the seller and the party claiming to have been the broker—none of them with the relationship existing between the broker and his salesman or agent. There is no provision of law that requires a real estate salesman to have written authority to act for and on behalf of the broker who employs him in order that such broker may take advantage of the fruits of the labor for which he recompenses his employee. Even if Eger, instead of being a salesman in plaintiff's service, had been an independent broker co-operating with him in the endeavor to procure a purchaser for defendants' property, with an agreement for a division of the commission between them, no writing would have been necessary as between Cornelius and Eger. Thus, in Gray v. Janss Investment Co., 186 Cal. 634, 200 P. 401, 404, which was an action by one broker against another to recover a portion of the commission paid to the latter, it was held: "There is no merit in the contention that the agreement between the plaintiffs and defendants is void because not in writing. The agreement is not one to pay a commission for the sale or exchange of real property. None of the parties to the agreement undertook to pay the other a commission. They obligated themselves in the first instance to do no more than co-operate in the exchange and divide the commissions earned therefor, and the subsequent modification of the original agreement, whether as pleaded in the plaintiffs' complaint or as found by the trial court upon the issue raised by the evidence, left it still a co-operation agreement between broker and broker to divide commissions, and consequently does not fall within the inhibition of subdivision 6 of section 1624 of the Civil Code [citing cases]."

[7] Judgment affirmed, and let there be added to the costs of appeal assessed against the appellant the sum of $100 as damages because of the frivolous nature of the appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

On rehearing. Former opinion modified.

For former opinion, see 277 P. 862.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Halverson & Halverson and W. T. Kendrick, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. In this cause it is ordered that paragraph V of the judgment, which purports to remove L. F. Hughes and G. C. Chase as directors of the Rock Creek Water Corporation, a corporation, be and the same is hereby stricken out. It is further ordered that the judgment in this action also be modified by deducting, from the amount $9,767.10, the sum of $450, and that, as so modified, said judgment be and it is hereby affirmed, respondents to recover their costs on appeal.

[1] This cause was reheard to give further consideration to the question of the power of a court of equity, in the absence of a statute, to remove a director of a private corporation and to declare his office vacant. But on the hearing counsel for each side conceded that the term of office as director of said two men had long since expired; that three annual meetings had been held since the date of said judgment; and that the two defendants referred to had been re-elected to office in both the years 1928 and 1929 at the annual stockholders' meeting. The question, therefore, so far as this action is concerned, has become moot. Childress v. Dinkelspiel Co., 203 Cal. 262, 263 P. 801. But for the presence of other questions in the cause it would be our duty to dismiss the appeal. Weiss v. City of Los Angeles, 190 Cal. 576, 213 P. 979.

There are, however, other questions involved, as to which we are satisfied with our conclusion heretofore announced and accordingly, we hereby adopt, as the opinion of this court, the former opinion written in this case by Mr. Justice Curtis, eliminating therefrom only the discussion of the question above declared to be moot, which former opinion, as here readopted, is as follows:

"Action by certain of the stockholders of the Rock Creek Water Corporation against said corporation and five individual defendants. Four of said individual defendants—L. F. Hughes, H. J. Hammond, Stewart Gibson and G. C. Chase—were directors of said corporation and, with the plaintiff W. A. Phillips, formed the board of directors of said company. The fifth individual defendant was George W. Hughes, who died subsequent to the commencement of this action, and the same has been dismissed as to his personal representative.

"The facts admitted by the pleadings or proven at the trial show that the Rock Creek Water Company is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of California; that said corporation is a mutual water company, and was organized by the owners of certain water rights for the purpose of facilitating the control of said water and the distribution of the same for domestic and irrigation purposes among its owners in proportion to the amount owned by them respectively. Some time prior to the annual meeting of said corporation in the year 1924 George W. Hughes, through the purchase of the Hammond and Boyce properties and the stock in said corporation representing water used on said properties, became the owner of a large amount of the capital stock in said corporation, and after said purchase the said George W. Hughes and his son, the said L. F. Hughes, owned a majority of the capital stock of said corporation. At the annual meeting of said corporation held in said year the following-named persons were elected directors of said company for the ensuing year: the said L. F. Hughes, the son of said George W. Hughes; Stewart Gibson, the private secretary of George W. Hughes; H. J. Hammond, from whom he purchased the Hammond and Boyce ranches, and who acted as foreman or ranch superintendent of said George W. Hughes up to May 15, 1925; G. C. Chase, who became such foreman after May 15, 1925, and W. A. Phillips, one of the plaintiffs in this action, who represented the minority stockholders of said company upon said board of directors. The directors organized by electing L. F. Hughes president, W. A. Phillips vice-president and G. C. Chase secretary and treasurer of said company. The by-laws of said corporation provide that 'Delivery (of water) to each (stockholder) shall be made at some point on the main ditch.' The delivery of said water to the stockholders was made by a zanjero, and it was usually run into small equalizing or distributing reservoirs, from which the water was drawn in a more or less constant flow, these reservoirs not being intended for storage purposes, but rather for distributing purposes. These reservoirs were not owned by the corporation, but by the stockholders, or groups of stockholders, individually, nor were the pipe lines or ditches connecting the main ditch with said reservoirs owned by the company, but by the individual stockholders. There were at least four of these reservoirs, referred to in the evidence as Kendrick reservoirs Nos. 1 and 2, the Hammond reservoir and the Boyce reservoir. The latter two reservoirs had been used by the owners of the Hammond ranch and the Boyce ranch, individually, for some years prior to the time these properties were acquired by George W. Hughes. They were situated below the lowest terminus of the company's ditch and from ten to fifteen feet lower than the lands of any of the stockholders except said lands of George W. Hughes purchased from Hammond and Boyce. About March 25, 1925, and after George W. Hughes had acquired the Hammond and Boyce ranches, and while he was the owner thereof, the company began enlarging and recementing said reservoirs at the expense of the corporation. On the 7th of April following, at a meeting of the board of directors of said company on that day, deeds to sites of each of said reservoirs, executed by said George W. Hughes in favor of said corporation, were presented to said board of directors. By resolution these were accepted by said board of directors and it was ordered that two reservoirs be constructed upon the land thereby conveyed to be used for the storage of water for irrigation purposes, the cost of such construction to be paid by checks drawn on the funds of said corporation. A further resolution was passed by said board of directors at said meeting levying an assessment of ten cents a share on each share of the capital stock of said corporation, 'for the purpose of paying expenses, conducting business and paying debts of this corporation.' These resolutions were adopted by the affirmative vote of directors Hammond, Gibson and Chase, director Phillips voting in the negative. At the time of the adoption of the said resolutions there was in the treasury the sum of $1,915.62, which was ample for conducting the ordinary business and paying the debts of said corporation. The purpose of levying said assessment was to furnish money 'to construct, improve, enlarge and cement reservoirs upon the property known as the "Hammond Ranch" and the "Boyce Ranch." * * * Thereupon, plaintiffs commenced this action to restrain the collection of said assessment; to declare void the proceedings of the board of directors accepting the deed to said reservoir sites and ordering the construction of the reservoirs thereon; for an accounting of the money expended by the directors for the construction, enlargement and cementing of said reservoirs, and for the removal of the defendant directors. An answer to said complaint was filed on May 29, 1925. On June 12th following the board of directors of said company met and rescinded the resolutions adopted by them on April 7, 1925, accepting said deeds, ordering the construction of said reservoirs, and levying the assessment of ten cents per share to pay the cost thereof. Immediately thereafter and at the same meeting the said board of directors adopted similar resolutions to those previously adopted by them on April 7, 1925, whereby they sought to accept said deeds from George W. Hughes, authorize the construction of said reservoirs upon the property therein described at the cost and expense of the corporation, and levy an assessment of ten cents per share, and for the same purpose as that designated in the former resolution levying the assessment of April 7, 1925. The action taken by said board of directors at the meeting of said board on June 12, 1925, rescinding the prior resolutions adopted by them on April 7, 1925, and adopting new resolutions in their stead, so the court subsequently found, was to 'avoid and defeat the restraining order heretofore issued' in this action whereby said defendants were enjoined and restrained from carrying into effect the resolutions of April 7, 1925. After the adoption of said resolutions by the board of directors at their meeting of June 12, 1925, and on July 13, 1925, the plaintiffs filed an amended and supplemental complaint, in which they set forth in full the proceedings taken at the meeting of said board of directors on June 12, 1925, including the action of said board in rescinding its former resolutions and in adopting the subsequent resolutions already referred to. The relief prayed for in said amended and supplemental complaint was that the new assessment be declared void and the defendants restrained from collecting the same, for an accounting of the money expended by them upon the Hammond and Boyce reservoirs, the repayment thereof to the corporation, for the removal from office of said directors, and for general relief. To this pleading the defendants filed their answer. To a large extent the allegations of the complaint and those of the amended and supplemental complaint were admitted by the defendants' answers. Those that were not so admitted were, in the main, found to be true by the court. Upon these findings the court rendered judgment in plaintiffs' favor in accordance with the prayer of their amended and supplemental complaint. From this judgment the defendants L. F. Hughes, H. J. Hammond and G. C. Chase have appealed.

"The first point raised by appellants in their attack upon the judgment is that there is no evidence to support the finding of the trial court that George W. Hughes and L. F. Hughes conspired to elect directors of said corporation who were under their domination with the intent and purpose that said directors would adopt and pass said resolutions, the effect of which was to bring about the construction of said reservoirs for the use and benefit of the Hughes, but at the cost and expense of the corporation. It appears to us that whether or not such a conspiracy was formed is not a matter of material importance in this action. If the acts of the directors in passing said resolutions were legal, then it is a matter of no consequence that the Hughes conspired to cause the same to be adopted by the board of directors of said company. On the other hand, if said directors acted illegally in the enactment of said resolutions, then they are invalid for any purpose and this would be their effect whether the Hughes conspired to secure their adoption or not. In our opinion, therefore, the question of first importance in considering the validity of said judgment is to determine whether the board of directors of said company in the adoption of said resolutions acted within the scope of their lawful authority.

[2, 3] "Appellants contend that there was nothing illegal in the acts of the directors in accepting deeds to the reservoir sites from George W. Hughes and in ordering the construction of reservoirs thereon at the expense of the corporation, and that if such acts were legal the assessment levied for the purpose of paying the cost of constructing said reservoirs was free from any taint of fraud or illegality. In support of this last-mentioned contention the appellants assert in their brief that 'The board of directors, in taking such action, were exercising the authority with which they were clothed to conduct the business of the company to the best of their judgment in conformity with the charter and by-laws of the company, as well as its needs. If it accepted deeds to real property from G. W. Hughes, the corporation was not injured. On the other hand, having accepted deeds to land from said G. W. Hughes, and it being within the discretion of the board of directors under its charter, to conduct and develop the affairs of the corporation, and it being their best judgment that the reservoirs in question be constructed upon the lands so conveyed to the corporation, these acts could not be complained of nor would they be considered by the ordinarily prudent business man as being unlawful.' There can be no question that under the purposes for which said corporation was formed, as set forth in its articles of incorporation, it has the right to acquire water, water rights, dams, ditches and canals for the development, storage and carriage of water 'in connection with the principal object and purpose of this corporation, which is generally specified to be the conduct of a mutual water company.'

"While the construction of reservoirs is not expressly mentioned in the purposes for which said corporation was formed, yet from the broad general terms used in defining said purposes, we have no doubt if the construction of a reservoir, or a number of reservoirs for that matter, would result in increasing the water supply of the company, or be of any substantial advantage to the company in its business of furnishing water to its stockholders, that the right to exercise such power was given to said corporation by its articles of incorporation. But this right must be exercised for the benefit of the stockholders generally and not for the benefit of some favored few of said number. As we have stated above, the by-laws of the corporation provide that water shall be delivered to each stockholder at some point on the main ditch. The evidence shows that this has been the universal practice of the company since its organization. The water was then conducted in most instances through pipe lines or ditches to private reservoirs, built and paid for by individual stockholders who were served by the water stored therein. Upon each of the Hammond and Boyce ranches at the time the same were purchased by G. W. Hughes there was located a reservoir used by the owner thereof for the purpose of facilitating the distribution of water upon his land. The board of directors by the proceedings complained of attempted at the expense of the company to either rebuild these two reservoirs or to construct new ones upon the sites occupied by the original ones. These reservoirs were for the exclusive and individual use of G. W. and L. F. Hughes. The other stockholders of the company were not benefited in any manner by this expenditure of the company's funds. Their lands were located above these reservoir sites, and could not be irrigated with water drawn therefrom even had said stockholders desired so to do, or had the Hughes permitted such use. Then, also, the other stockholders had been compelled to build and pay for their own reservoirs, and there is no evidence that said board of directors intended to reimburse them for money so expended, or to maintain or keep in repair the reservoirs of the minority stockholders already constructed. The construction by said board of directors of the reservoirs on Hughes' property at the expense of the corporation was the use of the funds of said corporation to improve and benefit the private property of Hughes. It was an illegal and an unlawful use of the corporate funds and it resulted in a detriment to every other stockholder of the corporation. While the board of directors are clothed with broad powers and are given wide discretion in the management of the affairs of the corporation, and the expenditures of its funds, it was an abuse of that discretion for said board to use the corporate funds to improve the property or to advance the individual interests of any one or group of stockholders to the detriment of the balance of the stockholders. This proposition of law seems so simple and just that no citation of authority is necessary to support it. As we view the facts of this case there is no question but that the board of directors acted illegally in constructing said reservoirs with the funds of said company. It follows, therefore, also that the assessment levied by the directors for the purpose of meeting the cost of constructing said reservoirs was invalid, and the action of the board of directors in levying the same was illegal and cannot be upheld.

[4] "The further point is made by appellants that the judgment is erroneous in holding that the directors of the corporation were guilty of fraud in building the reservoirs, and that there was no testimony to support the findings of the court that the corporation exceeded its power in building said reservoirs. We think that there is ample evidence to support the conclusion and finding of the trial court that the directors, other than director Phillips, were guilty of fraud in constructing said reservoirs for the exclusive use of the Hughes and paying for such construction out of the funds of said corporation. The fraud is so apparent and manifest that it is unnecessary to go into any lengthy details or give any extended reasons for so holding. We might state at this time that the capital stock of said corporation was divided into 48,000 shares of the par value of one dollar per share, of which the members of the Hughes family were the owners of slightly over one-half. Being the owners of a majority of the capital stock, they were able to control the election of the board of directors. The board of directors after their election attempted to foist upon the stockholders the entire cost of improvements constructed for the exclusive use of George W. Hughes and family. The court found that the directors had paid in the construction of said reservoirs almost $6,000 from the treasury of said corporation and had otherwise misappropriated the funds of said company in an amount, including that paid in the construction of said reservoir, aggregating the sum of $9,767.10. To hold that this could be innocently done, under the claim that the directors were honestly endeavoring to carry on the business and affairs of the company, would be to challenge the credulity of human nature. A mere recital of the bare facts will, we believe, convince any person of ordinary intelligence of the bad faith of the majority of the directors, and that they designedly attempted to despoil the minority stockholders for the benefit of George W. Hughes and L. F. Hughes.

[5, 6] "The final objection made by appellants to the judgment herein is that the trial court in rendering judgment in favor of the corporation and against said defendants for moneys wrongfully and illegally paid out by the defendants, included in said amount the following items: $750 for the Boyd reservoir site and $450 to the attorneys representing the defendants in this action for services rendered in defending this action. We are of the opinion that the first of these items was properly included in the judgment. The testimony regarding the Boyd reservoir site is not as full as we might wish. The price paid therefor was $750, and there was evidence that it was worth not to exceed $100. It is not clear as to just what use was to be made of the land purchased. The company had no use for it as a reservoir site. It was above the ditch of the company, was arid in character and was underlaid with bedrock three or four feet from the surface. It evidently could not be put to agricultural purposes. In this connection we might refer to a statement which the respondent Phillips testified to as having been made by the defendant L. F. Hughes, in which the latter was reported to have said, 'I am going to build about ten reservoirs before I get through. Going to put on an assessment every month. I hope the other stockholders won't suffer too much. I am going to break Kendrick.' The trial court may well have concluded that the Boyd reservoir site was purchased with the view of constructing thereon a reservoir for the same purpose as the reservoirs constructed on the Hammond and Boyce sites were intended to be used. If so, this expenditure would be in the same class as those incurred in the construction of the Hammond and Boyce reservoirs, and the judgment that the money expended therefor be repaid to the corporation was a proper one. The item of $450 was not mentioned or referred to in the complaint. It could not have been for the reason that it was not paid out until after the commencement of this action. Neither was it mentioned or referred to in the amended and supplemental complaint. It could not, therefore, be recovered in this action. The judgment, therefore, should be modified by deducting this sum from the amount of the judgment."

V. L. Hatfield, Martin I. Welsh, and W. H. Hatfield, all of Sacramento, amici curiae Sacramento Committee of the State Bar.

PRESTON, J. In this action, brought by plaintiff to recover fees alleged to be due for services rendered by him as an attorney at law on behalf of defendants in the matter of negotiating for settlement or instituting and prosecuting a suit on account of certain personal injuries and damages sustained by defendant William Yalen, the judgment is hereby affirmed. In the following statement of the case may be found the ground upon which we base our conclusion:

Plaintiff, by the first count of his amended complaint, alleged an oral contract with defendants whereby he was to render all necessary services for them in the matter of said claim, receiving as consideration therefor one-third of any sum accepted by them in settlement thereof or one-third of any judgment obtained and collected in the event of institution of suit, exclusive of court costs. He further alleged the following fact, established by the evidence: That, after an unsuccessful attempt to effect a settlement, he filed suit on behalf of defendants, and caused the case to be set for trial, after which he was discharged by them; that a judgment in their favor was subsequently obtained in the sum of $5,000, which they compromised for $4,500. He therefore prayed that one-third of the sum so received by defendants, or $1,500, plus costs in amount of $15.90, be awarded him. His second cause of action was on a common count alleging an indebtedness of $1,546.90 for services rendered and costs, which sum was a reasonable charge therefor. Said amount, $1,546.90, included, in addition to said $1,500 and $15.90, an item of $31 which plaintiff also sought to recover, and which he alleged by the third count of said amended complaint, covered the amount due him for legal services rendered defendants and costs advanced in their behalf in a justices' court action. Said items of $31 and $15.90, totaling $46.90, are not disputed, and no dissatisfaction is expressed with that portion of the judgment awarding plaintiff said sum.

The answer of defendants was a general denial, denying the existence of any contract with plaintiff, any agreement for payment of a one-third contingent fee, or any indebtedness whatsoever to him. Upon the trial, however, defendants testified to the existence of an oral contract whereby they had employed plaintiff, but they denied that the terms thereof were as alleged by him, or that they had ever entertained his proposal that they pay him one-third of any sum recovered; that is, they claimed that said contract, with respect to plaintiff's fee, provided for payment to him of 10 per cent. of the sum recovered in the event of settlement without suit, or 20 per cent. of any judgment obtained and collected in event of settlement after trial.

From the judgment entered in his favor for the sum of $346.90, plaintiff appealed. As above stated, the item of $46.90 is conceded, but appellant attacks strenuously that portion of said judgment awarding him only $300 for his said services rendered in said matter. In this behalf he contends that the judgment is contrary to the evidence, and that the findings upon which it is based are likewise inconsistent and not supported by the evidence.

We cannot accede to this claim. The court found that "plaintiff and defendants entered into an oral contract," whereby it was understood that "plaintiff would render his legal and professional services in the matter of negotiating for settlement or the institution and prosecution of a suit" in said matter. This finding has full support in the evidence. Both parties virtually admitted, and the correspondence between them which was introduced in evidence showed, that they in fact made an oral contract whereby plaintiff was to represent them in matters pertaining to said damage claim.

But the court further found, and this finding likewise has full support in the evidence, that defendants did not agree to pay plaintiff one-third of any sum accepted by them as settlement of said cause or one-third of any judgment obtained and collected; that, by reason of plaintiff's failure to accept the offer made by defendants to pay him 10 per cent. on settlement before trial, or 20 per cent. of recovery on or after trial for his services, "there was no agreement by or between said parties for any specific sum or compensation to plaintiff therefor, whereby he became and is entitled only to reasonable compensation for such services as he rendered"; that $1,500 was not a reasonable sum therefor, but that $300 was and is the reasonable value of the services so rendered by plaintiff to defendants.

[1] In other words, the evidence proves clearly a valid oral contract of employment between the parties; in this respect the minds of the parties met, and they were in complete accord, but it also shows plainly that no agreement was ever reached between them as to the compensation to be paid plaintiff for his services thereunder.

Had there been included in said contract a provision as to plaintiff's compensation, such provision upon his wrongful discharge would have measured the amount of his recovery. Kirk v. Culley, 202 Cal. 501, 261 P. 994; Webb v. Trescony, 76 Cal. 621, 18 P. 796.

[2, 3] Said contract, however, lacking any provision whatsoever by which to measure plaintiff's compensation, he was entitled to recover the reasonable value of said services admittedly rendered by him, before his discharge by defendants. Gage v. Atwater, 136 Cal. 170, 173, 68 P. 581; Buck v. City of Eureka, 124 Cal. 61, 56 P. 612; Young v. Bruere, 78 Cal. App. 127, 248 P. 301. This issue as to quantum meruit was squarely presented by the second count of said amended complaint, alleging $1,500 as a reasonable charge for said services, and was determined by the trial court in accordance with the averments thereof, except as to the reasonable value, which was found to be $300 instead of $1,500. This was a finding well supported by the evidence and within the power of the trial court to make. The court had before it detailed evidence as to the nature and extent of the services rendered, and was empowered to use his own experience and judgment as to the reasonable value thereof, with or without the aid of testimony of witnesses as to value. Kirk v. Culley, supra; Estate of Duffill, 188 Cal. 536, 206 P. 42; Estate of Straus, 144 Cal. 553, 77 P. 1122; Spencer v. Collins, 156 Cal. 298, 104 P. 320, 20 Ann. Cas. 49.

It is our conclusion that both findings and judgment are consistent and amply supported by the evidence, and that a review of the record compels affirmation of the action of the trial court, as first herein announced.

MARELLI v. KEATING et al. (S. F. 13586.)

Marcus D. Wolff, of Oakland, for respondents.

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 2, 1929.

1. Homestead §186—Levy of execution is necessary to subject excess value of homestead over exemption to judgment, and creates valid lien against third person, to whom judgment debtor conveys (Civ. Code, §§ 1240, 1245-1259; Code Civ. Proc. § 541).

Levy of writ of execution is necessary step in proceedings under Civ. Code, §§ 1245-1259, to subject excess of value of homestead above exemption to satisfaction of judgment, and is effectual to create lien on property which is valid against third person to whom judgment debtor may convey property, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 541, that all property of defendant not exempt from execution may be attached.

2. Homestead §107—Where execution is necessary to preserve judgment creditor's rights, homestead property is subject to execution and attachment (Code Civ. Proc. § 541).

Property such as homestead is not exempt from and is liable to execution, where execution levy is necessary step to secure or preserve to judgment creditor valuable rights, and hence, where not exempt from execution, property is by terms of Code Civ. Proc. § 541, subject to attachment.

3. Homestead §5—Courts liberally construe homestead law to extent of exemption only.

Liberal construction of homestead law, object of which is to protect homesteader and those dependent on him or her in enjoyment of domicile not exceeding $5,000 in value, will be indulged in by courts to extent only of exemption.

4. Homestead §128—Husband, to whom wife conveyed homestead pending litigation against her, took title subject to judgment creditor's right to attach value above exemption, and was charged with notice of rights of attaching creditor as to excess (Civ. Code, §§ 1245-1259; Code Civ. Proc. § 541).

Husband, to whom wife conveyed homestead pending litigation against her and after writ of attachment had been levied on the property, but prior to rendition of judgment, took title subject to right of judgment creditor, under Code Civ. Proc. § 541, to reach excess over $5,000 as exempted value of homestead through proceedings provided for in Civ. Code, §§ 1245-1259, and was charged with notice of rights of attaching creditor as to excess.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action by Charles Marelli against John J. Keating, as Sheriff of the county of Marin, and another. Judgment adverse to plaintiff, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas P. Boyd, of San Rafael, for appellant.

SEAWELL, J. Plaintiff, Charles Marelli, appeals from a decree of the superior court of the county of Marin, dissolving an injunction restraining the sheriff of said county until the further order of the court from selling certain real property claimed by plaintiff upon which said sheriff had levied execution. The execution was levied and the said property advertised for sale to satisfy a judgment in favor of Henry Heide, defendant in this injunction suit, and against plaintiff's grantor. Plaintiff's grantor at the time of the conveyance was his wife, the parties having intermarried after the institution of the action, in which the wife, then Jennie Marquard, was a defendant. The conveyance to plaintiff, which is not attacked on the ground of fraud, was made after a writ of attachment had been levied on said property, but prior to the rendition of the judgment. Several years previous to the institution of the action said Jennie Marquard, a widow and the head of a family, had filed a declaration of homestead covering the real property in suit. It is by virtue of this declaration that plaintiff claims the property conveyed to him was exempt from forced sale, and that the court below was in error in not perpetually restraining a sale by the sheriff.

The defendants filed an answer after the court had granted the injunction restraining the sale until its further order. They alleged therein that the value of the property was approximately $24,000, and therefore greatly exceeded the maximum homestead exemption of $5,000, and further set forth that they had taken the required statutory steps to subject the excess to forced sale under the provisions of sections 1245-1259, Civil Code. After a hearing held, following the filing of said answer, at which it appeared that the appraisers appointed in the statutory proceeding had reported said property to be of a value of $24,000, the court made the order dissolving the injunction, from which this appeal is taken.

The judgment in the action was not rendered or the execution issued until after the property had been transferred by the homestead claimant to the plaintiff. This being so, the execution levy was unauthorized, and the owner entitled to enjoin the sale, unless the attachment, levied before the transfer, was effectual to secure to the judgment creditor the right to hold the excess after the ownership of the property had passed from the judgment debtor.

[1, 2] Plaintiff has contended that homesteaded property, whatever its value, is not subject to attachment. We cannot accede to this view. By the terms of section 541, Code of Civil Procedure, all property of the defendant not exempt from execution may be attached. Section 1240, Civil Code, provides that homesteaded property is exempt from execution or forced sale, except as in the subsequent sections of that chapter provided. Sections 1245-1259, Civil Code, authorize a levy of execution upon homesteaded property exceeding $5,000 in value and a court order "directing its sale under execution" upon a compliance with the procedure prescribed by said sections. The excess value over the homestead exemption is subject to execution and forced sale, the difference being that in such cases certain additional requirements must be followed before the excess may be applied to the satisfaction of the judgment.

The levy of the writ of execution is a necessary step in the proceedings in order to subject the excess to the satisfaction of the judgment and is effectual to create a lien upon the property which is valid against third persons to whom the judgment debtor may convey the property. Lean v. Givens, 146 Cal. 739, 81 P. 128, 106 Am. St. Rep. 79; Martin v. Hildebrand, 190 Cal. 369, 212 P. 618. Property cannot be said to be exempt from, or not liable to, execution where the execution levy is a necessary step to secure or preserve to the judgment creditor valuable rights, and, not being exempt from execution, it is, by the terms of section 541, Code of Civil Procedure, subject to attachment.

[3] The object of the homestead law is to protect the homesteader and those dependent upon him or her in the enjoyment of a domicile not exceeding $5,000 in value, and to this end a liberal construction of the law and facts will be indulged by courts. When this object has been accomplished, courts will not suffer this salutary statute to be used as a shield behind which those who would deal unjustly with creditors may find refuge.

We are not compelled to reach a contrary conclusion by the decisions in such cases as Boggs v. Dunn, 160 Cal. 283, 116 P. 743, where in it was held, in construing section 671, Code of Civil Procedure, which then provided that a judgment, from the time it is docketed, becomes a lien "upon all the real property of the judgment debtor not exempt from execution" owned by him or which he may afterwards acquire until the lien ceases, that a judgment does not become a lien upon homesteaded property, whatever its value.

[4] Marelli took title subject to the right of the judgment creditor to reach the excess through the proceedings provided for in sections 1245-1259, Civil Code, and was charged with notice of the rights of the attaching creditor as to the excess. Defendant Heide, as judgment creditor, has followed the procedure in said sections provided. The court, therefore, did not err in dissolving the injunction and authorizing the sale of the property. Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by Samuel H. Gunder against Agnes Gunder. From the judgment, defendant appeals. On plaintiff's motion to dismiss appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Saran & Thompson, of Riverside, and Woodruff, Musick, Pinney & Hartke and H. L. Pratt, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, J. The plaintiff and respondent moves to dismiss the appeal herein, on the ground that it is taken from a judgment which is not a final judgment, within the meaning of section 963, subdivision 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The action was instituted to rescind, on the grounds of fraud and undue influence, a property settlement agreement made between the parties, husband and wife, who were divorced prior to the commencement of this action. Other relief, including a decree declaring an involuntary trust, canceling prior transfers, and ordering reconveyances and retransfers, granting an injunction, and ordering an accounting, was sought. The trial court found that the plaintiff was entitled to the relief, and rendered a judgment which, after its formal recitals, provided that a certain quitclaim deed covering a half interest in the Elsinore Gas Works—the other half interest having previously, and during their married life, been conveyed by the plaintiff to the defendant—and a certain bill of sale of personal property be canceled, set aside, and declared to be null and void, and that the plaintiff was entitled to have and was given the right of possession of the personal property and the right of possession with the defendant of the real property; that the defendant render a full, complete, and true account to a referee appointed by the court of all moneys and bonds received by the defendant from the plaintiff during their married life, of all proceeds from the sale of bonds, of bonds or other property purchased with such funds, of all moneys, profits, or proceeds derived from the operation of the Elsinore Gas Works, etc.; that "said defendant render * * * a full, complete, and true account of the true condition of the accounts and business of the Elsinore Gas Works from the 30th day of April, 1926, until the date of said referee's report, and a full, complete, and true account of all receipts, expenditures, collections, and moneys had, received, or expended by or in the hands of the defendant, Agnes Gunder, on account of her dealings with or handling of any personal property during her married life with said plaintiff, and on account of the sale, purchase, or exchange of any bonds during said time, and on account of any dealings with or deposits in any bank, wheresoever located, and on account of any matter or thing pertaining to business transactions with any bank or business of said plaintiff, and that the referee hereinafter named and appointed herein take such account and such other accountings as may be necessary to clarify and show the exact situation in regard to the matters in issue in this case, and render his report and findings to the above court"; that "upon the rendition of said account of said referee to the court, and the court's approval thereof, said plaintiff is [entitled to] and shall be given a final judgment against said defendant for the immediate possession of any and all personal property, including bonds and money and proceeds thereof, in the hands of said defendant, or under her control, or any one on her behalf, belonging to said plaintiff, or the value thereof, as well as also for a final judgment in favor of said plaintiff and against said defendant in such amount as the court may find that the plaintiff is entitled to"; that "the defendant is hereby restrained and enjoined, pending the accounting and report of said referee and until the entry of final judgment, from incumbering, * * * etc.

It is contended by the appellant that the judgment is a final judgment, in accordance with the rule stated in the case of Zappettini v. Buckles, 167 Cal. 27, 138 P. 696. As stated by the court in that case, however, the decree there was similar to the decree from which an appeal was taken in the case of Clark v. Dunnam, 46 Cal. 204, and the decision of the latter case was followed by the court in the Zappettini Case. In neither of those cases did the decree involve a reference for an accounting, but in each case it ordered a sale of property and specified the distribution to be made of the proceeds. There was, therefore, in those cases no further judicial action required on the part of the court to adjudicate finally the rights of the parties.

While there is a conflict of authority on the question whether a decree which settles the basic issues between the parties, adjudges the complainant's right to an accounting and refers the items of the account to be found by a master, etc., is an appealable judgment (see Wells v. Shriver, 81 Okl. 108, 197 P. 460), we are persuaded from an examination of the authorities that the rule adopted by the courts of this state and applicable to the present case is based on the desirability of subjecting the parties to but one appeal at the determination of the entire controversy between them (see Doudell v. Shoo, 159 Cal. 448, 454, 114 P. 579; Gianelli v. Briscoe, 40 Cal. App. 532, 536, 181 P. 105; Bancroft's Code Practice and Remedies, p. 8329), and is stated in Pomper v. Superior Court, 191 Cal. 494, at page 496, 216 P. 577, as follows: "The general rule is that where a decree is made fixing the liability and rights of the parties which refers the case to a master or subordinate tribunal for a judicial purpose, such, for instance, as the statement of an account, upon which a further decree is to be entered, the decree is not final. 2 Cal. Jur. §§ 19, 20, p. 142; California Nat. Bank v. Stater, 171 U. S. 447, 19 S. Ct. 6, 43 L. Ed. 233. See, also, Rose's U. S. Notes; Clement v. Duncan, ante, p. 209, 215 P. 1025; Doudell v. Shoo, 159 Cal. 448, 453, 114 P. 579."

It is apparent upon the showing made in this case that the judgment is not and was not intended by the court to be a final determination of the controversy in the trial court, but that final judgment as to the issues adjudicated was reserved by the court, to be entered upon the submission of the referee's report, which would then be subject to "the court's approval," and at which time the court would also render its "final judgment in favor of said plaintiff and against said defendant in such amount as the court may find that the plaintiff is entitled to," and that the appeal should therefore be dismissed.

It is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Marshall F. McComb, Judge.

Divorce action by Antonia C. Jacobus against Elmer L. Jacobus, in which defendant filed cross-complaint against plaintiff and Julia C. White and William O. Sauer. From a decree for defendant, plaintiff and cross-defendants appeal. One Frank J. Rehorst was substituted as attorney for plaintiff in the place and stead of George W. Rochester, and the latter moves to set aside the order for substitution of attorney. Motion denied.

Oscar W. Hogue and Peter J. Youngdahl, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Geo. W. Rochester and Frank P. Doherty, both of Los Angeles, and Frank J. Rehorst, of Pasadena, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. The record and briefs on the appeal in the above-entitled cause are on file. The notice of appeal to this court was filed on July 12, 1927. The action is for divorce and for an adjustment of property rights. The interlocutory decree of divorce was given for respondent, Elmer L. Jacobus, on his cross-complaint, and property rights were also settled thereby.

Petitioner George W. Rochester was the attorney for respondent throughout the litigation, and has a written contract with him for a 45 per cent. contingent fee to be calculated upon the amount of property recovered or secured by respondent in the action. On June 11, 1929, the court below directed that one Frank J. Rehorst be substituted as attorney for respondent in the place and stead of petitioner. On August 1, 1929, petitioner came to this court with a document styled "Motion of opposition to substitution of attorney for defendant and respondent by George W. Rochester, Petitioner," but in the body of it appearing to be a motion "for an order setting aside an order of the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Los Angeles substituting Frank J. Rehorst as attorney for Elmer L. Jacobus in the above entitled cause in place of George W. Rochester."

[1-3] Manifestly this court is the only forum within which the parties to a perfected appeal may move for a substitution of attorneys during the pendency of such appeal. Manifestly, also, the motion of George W. Rochester, the attorney of record for the respondent upon this appeal, to have this court set aside an order which the trial court has made or attempted to make long after this appeal was perfected, purporting to substitute another attorney for said Rochester, cannot prevail, for the reason, if for none other, that there is no record herein upon which this court could consider or reverse an order of the trial court made after final judgment, however erroneous or lacking in jurisdiction such order might be. So far as the record upon appeal herein discloses, George W. Rochester is still the attorney of record for respondent upon this appeal, and will be recognized as such until such time as a proper order for the substitution of another as the attorney of record for the respondent herein shall have been made.

In denying this quite unnecessary motion we deem it proper to say that the question as to the right of the respondent to discharge his attorney of record and to substitute another in his stead is not a proper subject of consideration by this court upon the present motion; nor is the question as to what may be the right and remedy of an attorney of record who has been thus discharged presented for our determination upon the state of the record before us.

The motion is denied.

Action by H. B. Woodill against the City of Glendale and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. Turney Fox, City Atty., Bernard Brennan, Deputy City Atty., and Ray L. Morrow, all of Glendale, Leslie R. Tarr, of Los Angeles, and Frank M. Moody, of Glendale, for respondents City and Kerns.

Arthur M. Ellis, of Los Angeles, for respondent Fleming.

PRESTON, J. The judgment is affirmed. The action is an attack upon certain proceedings taken and completed by the city of Glendale under the Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended (St. 1911, p. 730, c. 397, as amended), followed by the issuance of bonds or warrants as provided in the Bond Act of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1441, c. 733). The attack is purely collateral; no single protest or objection of any kind having been made to the city council at any time.

The resolution of intention was in proper form; it was published as required by law, and the proper posting was also done. Jurisdiction to carry out these proceedings thus attached. Sections 7 and 16 of said act (St. 1911, p. 730); Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 359, 360, 80 P. 81; Watkinson v. Vaughn, 182 Cal. 55, 58, 186 P. 753; In re East Bay, etc., Water Bonds of 1925, 196 Cal. 725, 735, 239 P. 38.

The complaint of some 34 pages is a general technical criticism of the steps taken, all of which were matters first to be addressed to the city council, all of which are covered by the various curative provisions of the statutes involved, and none of which are proper subjects for court proceedings. Sections 16, 21, and 26 of the Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p.

730), and section 8 of said Bond Act of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1446). It is unnecessary to undertake to detail them. In principle, if not in fact, they have each been disposed of in recent decisions of this court, none of which have been considered by appellant San Francisco Sulphur Co. v. County of Contra Costa (Cal. Sup.) 276 P. 570; Noyes v. Chambers & De Golyer, 202 Cal. 542, 261 P. 1006; Blake v. City of Eureka, 201 Cal. 643, 258 P. 945.

The trial court sustained general demurrers to the complaint, without leave to amend, followed by judgment for defendants, appealed from by plaintiff, and now affirmed.

DAVIS v. WESTPHAL. (Civ. 6250.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California. Nov. 25, 1929.

- 1. Usury ⚡88—Whether interest specified be treated as usury or bonus was immaterial, where plaintiff suing on note waived both interest and bonus.

Whether interest specified in contract for use of money be treated as usury or as additional compensation for lender's work in business under contract for temporary association was immaterial, where, in action on note, plaintiff waived both interest and bonus at opening of trial.

- 2. Usury ⚡75—Allowing attorney's fees in action on note, though interest specified was illegal, held not error (Usury Act).

In action on note, allowance of attorney's fees held not error whether or not rate of interest specified was illegal, since under Usury Act (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii) such contracts are valid, except that interest is forfeited.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by W. R. Davis against J. M. Westphal. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Cooper & Collings, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fred M. Bottorff, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, Acting P. J. It appears that the parties to this action entered into a tentative agreement in writing on March 7, 1925, by the terms of which respondent agreed to loan the appellant $2,500 for the conduct of the latter's business, and to enter into his employment for a period of six months at a salary of $150 per month, in contemplation of forming a copartnership. It is contended that appellant received the $2,500 and gave to respondent his promissory note therefor; that he also paid said salary for the first five months, but refused to repay the amount of the note, or to pay the salary for the sixth month. Suit having been instituted for both sums, and judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff, this appeal is taken from said judgment.

The note is controversy called for the legal rate of interest upon the principal for a period of six months, together with a bonus of 8 per cent. per annum. The defendant incorporated the original agreement in his answer as an exhibit, alleging that said note was usurious, and that the monthly salary was merely a bonus which he had agreed to pay for the use of the money loaned. As a counterclaim the defendant allowed a credit of $50 per month for said five months, which the plaintiff was alleged to have earned in commissions and otherwise, and prayed judgment in the sum of $1,500, or treble the amount claimed to have been paid illegally, under the terms of the contract and promissory note. It is respondent's contention that the salary and the amount of the note were separate and distinct items, and that, in the event of the formation of a copartnership, the $2,500 was to have gone into the business, and a new contract was to have been executed between the parties. Said contract reads, in part, as follows:

"Witnesseth: That whereas the parties contemplate a permanent business association together as partners, this memorandum of agreement is made for a period of six (6) months from its date for the purpose of permitting the parties to determine whether or not a permanent association between them shall prove satisfactory.

"The said William R. Davis agrees to loan to the said J. M. Westphal, upon the signing of this agreement, the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars ($2500.00), which the said J. M. Westphal shall use in the general conduct of the business as above outlined. The said William R. Davis is to, and shall associate himself with said business commencing upon the signing of this agreement and the payment of the said sum of $2500.00, devoting his full time and efforts jointly with J. M. Westphal in promoting and building up, and increasing and developing said business.

"The said J. M. Westphal agrees to pay to the said William R. Davis, in lieu of his services as general salesman and assistant in said business, a commission of ten per cent (10%) upon all sales made by him, and repeat orders from his customers, which said commissions shall be credited to his personal account once a month and he shall be permitted to draw against said commissions the sum of one hundred fifty dollars ($150.00) monthly for a period of six (6) months.

"At the end of six months, unless the parties shall mutually agree to a sooner termination, or a longer extension of said period, the parties may, agreeable to both of them, enter into a joint partnership in the ownership and conduct of said business with such proportionate ownership to each as they at the time may mutually agree. In the event the parties fail to reach a satisfactory agreement after the period of this contract and the said William R. Davis should withdraw from said business, he shall be entitled to receive all commissions then due him, together with a repayment to him of the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars ($2500.00), plus interest at the rate of fifteen per cent. (15%) per annum for said period. * * *

"It is particularly provided and agreeable to both parties, that in the event the aggregate commissions earned by the said William R. Davis during the period of this contract, shall not equal the aggregate of $150.00 per month for said period, the said J. M. Westphal guarantees that the said $150.00 per month shall be paid in lieu of services rendered, with no obligation on the part of said William R. Davis for any overdrawings in excess of any commissions earned.

"In the event the partners agree at the termination of this contract to enter into partnership as the owner of said business, they shall do so in writing under an agreement of copartnership which said agreement shall set forth the ownership, of each of the partners and the conditions under which said partnership is entered into."

[1] Whether the rate of interest above specified be treated as a usurious charge for the use of the money represented by the note, or as additional compensation within the purview of the temporary association, is immaterial, since at the opening of the trial the plaintiff waived both interest and bonus. Judgment was rendered in the sum of $2,500 as principal, $250 attorney's fees, and $150 salary for the last month of the temporary term.

It is admitted that at the expiration of the six months' period the parties did not enter into a permanent agreement of copartnership. The plain language of the temporary contract required that this be done, or that the respondent should receive in return the full amount of $2,500, and that he should be paid $150 per month, regardless of the amount of commissions earned. It was further stipulated that respondent rendered services for the entire period of six months. The contract and the promissory note were contemporaneous, and it is immaterial whether the amount advanced be deemed a loan or an investment, since both documents guaranteed its return in the event of a failure to agree upon a continuance of the joint adventure. It results that the court did not err in rendering judgment therefor.

[2] It is also contended by appellant that, if the rate of interest specified in the promissory note was excessive and illegal, the whole transaction was rendered void by such charge, and that it was error to allow attorney's fees in an action founded thereon. It has been held that the Usury Act (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii) does not so provide, and that such contracts are valid except that the interest shall be forfeited. Haines v. Commercial Mtg. Co., 200 Cal. 609, 254 P. 956, 255 P. 805, 53 A. L. R. 725.

Finally, appellant insists that the contract was but a subterfuge to evade the Usury Act, and that the evidence did not support the judgment of the trial court. We have carefully perused the record, and it is plain from appellant's own testimony that this point is so obviously unfounded as to leave no room for extended discussion. He testified that he entered into the agreement with a copartnership in view; that, had Davis signified an intention to remain in the business, he originally intended to accept him; and that he did in fact pay him for a period of five months in accordance with the terms of the contract.

No error appearing, the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: IRA F. THOMPSON, J.; BURNELL, Justice pro tem.

RICHMAN v. BANK OF PERRIS et al. ★
(Civ. 2.)

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California. Nov. 18, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 18, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 16, 1930.

1. Corporations ⇨298(3)—Notice of special meeting of directors of corporation must be given each director, unless notice is waived (Civ. Code, § 320a).

In absence of statute or by-law providing to the contrary, notice of special meeting of board of directors of corporation must be given to each director, except when waived as provided in Civil Code, § 320a, and stock assessment levied at special meeting held without notice to all of directors is void.

2. Banks and banking ⇨52—Special meeting of directors of bank, called by two directors without notice to third or waiver, and stock assessment levied at meeting, held void, where by-laws required notice to all (Civ. Code, § 320a).

Where by-laws of bank provided that special meeting of board of directors might be called by president on notice to directors, meeting had on call of two of three directors without notice to the third director or without waiver by him under provisions of Civ. Code, § 320a, and stock assessment levied at meeting, held void.

3. Banks and banking ⇨52—That bank's assets had been converted by president who absconded did not validate special meeting of directors had without notice to president or waiver, where bank was in superintendent's hands and regular meeting could have been had without notice (Civ. Code, § 320a; Bank Act, § 136).

Fact that bank had been deprived of large amount of cash and securities converted by its president, who disappeared and could not be located, and that immediate action on part of board of directors was necessary to save the bank, did not validate special meeting of board of directors held without notice to the president as the third director, in violation of provisions of by-laws, and without waiver under Civ. Code, § 320a, and did not render valid purported assessment on bank stock levied at the special meeting where the bank was closed by the superintendent on April 21st and regular meeting of directors could have been held without notice on May 3d or June 7th, whereas special meeting was had on May 24th; bank superintendent having power, under Bank Act, § 136 (St. 1909, p. 115), to take possession of bank and retain possession until bank shall resume business or its affairs be finally liquidated.

4. Sales ⇨113—Equitable relief does not necessarily follow plaintiff's strict legal right to have sale set aside.

That plaintiff may have strict legal right to set aside sale does not necessarily entitle him to relief in equity, but his own actions are of greatest importance in determining equitable relief.

5. Equity ⇨65(1)—One otherwise entitled to profit by illegality of contract cannot receive equitable relief if he has participated in wrong (Civ. Code, §§ 3517, 3539).

While time does not confirm a void act, under Civ. Code, § 3539, no one can take advantage of his own wrong under section 3517 and party otherwise entitled to profit by invalidity of illegal contract cannot be heard in equity, if by his own act he has participated in the wrong.

6. Equity ⇨65(1)—In proper case, equity may set aside effect of statute, where party seeking relief was wrongdoer (Civ. Code, § 3517).

In a proper case, equity may set aside the effect of a statute in order to prevent an unconscionable thing, when the party seeking the relief is the actor in the wrong involved, in view of Civ. Code, § 3517, under which no one can take advantage of his own wrong.

7. Equity ⇨66—Maxim, "He who seeks equity must do equity," means court will not confer equitable relief unless party has acknowledged or will provide for equitable rights of adversary.

Rule of equity that "he who seeks equity must do equity" means that court will not confer equitable relief upon party seeking its aid unless he has acknowledged or will provide for all equitable rights justly belonging to adversary party necessarily involved in subject-matter of controversy.

8. Equity ⇨66—Plaintiff may be forced to do equity as condition to claiming statutory right.

Rule that one who seeks equity must do equity applies to actions authorized by statute, and plaintiff may be forced to do equity as condition of claiming right fixed by statute and established law.

9. Equity ⇨66—One seeking equity must do equity, regardless of kind of equitable remedy applied for.

Rule that one who seeks equity must do equity applies, regardless of the particular kind of equitable remedy which is applied for.

10. Equity ⇨65(1)—One coming into equity has burden to show his hands are clean.

Burden is on one coming into court of equity for relief to prove, not only his legal rights, but that he has clean hands, and otherwise court will deny relief.

11. Equity ⇨65(2)—Equity will not aid one committing fraudulent acts in original transaction which constitutes foundation of cause of action.

Equity will not aid plaintiff who has been guilty of fraudulent acts in original transaction which constitute foundation out of which action for relief goes, and rule would specially apply where acts are not only fraudulent but criminal.

12. Attachment ⇨175—Attaching creditor of bank president who converted bank's assets and absconded, had no greater right than president to set aside sale of his stock without offering to reimburse purchasers for moneys contributed to save bank (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 652, § 133; Code Civ. Proc. § 699).

President of bank owning majority of stock, who converted cash and securities and absconded, would not be able to set aside sale of his bank stock made under delinquent assessment levied at special meeting of board of directors illegally held without notice to him, without offering to reimburse purchasers of the stock attempted to be sold under Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 652, § 133, for amount advanced by them to save the bank from the effect of the defalcation; hence attaching creditor of president of bank, having notice of transfer of stock on books, could not, under certificate of sale at execution, maintain suit in equity to set aside sale under the assessment and have himself declared owner, his rights being limited to those of his debtor, under Code Civ. Proc. § 699.

13. Execution ⇨268, 269—Purchaser at execution sale takes subject to existing liens and equities (Code Civ. Proc. § 699.)

Purchaser at execution sale under Code Civ. Proc. § 699, takes subject to such existing liens and equities as property was subject to in hands of debtor, unless he can show he purchased the same without notice, either actual or constructive, of the existence of such liens or equities.

14. Attachment ⇨175—Attaching creditor of former stockholder takes stock transferred on books of corporation subject to existing equities (Code Civ. Proc. § 699).

Where stock has been transferred on books of corporation, creditor of former owner of stock by writ of attachment takes stock subject to existing equities, under Code Civ. Proc. § 699.

15. Corporations ⇨149—Constructive notice of interest in corporation's stock is given by entries in corporate books (Code Civ. Proc. § 699; Civ. Code, § 3521).

Constructive notice in relation to interest in corporation stock is given, not by instruments filed in office of county recorder, but by entries in books of corporation; certificate of sale under execution conveying only right which debtor had in property in question on day attachment was levied, under Code Civ. Proc. § 699; one taking benefit being required to bear burden under Civ. Code, § 3521.

16. Attachment ⇨175—Creditor of absconding bank president attaching president's stock had constructive notice of defects and outstanding equities from defendants' possession of stock and from book entries showing stock was canceled and reissued to defendants (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 652, § 133; Code Civ. Proc. § 699).

Where bank stock was sold under Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 652, § 133, for failure of stockholders to pay assessments, and defendants contributing to bank to make good losses suffered through president's defalcation, had possession and control of stock and business of corporation, and book entries showed cancellation of president's stock and reissue of substitute stock to defendants, creditor of absconding bank president, who attached president's stock and bought it in on execution under judgment recovered by him, had constructive notice of any defects in president's title and of any equities existing against president's interest arising out of the transaction under Code Civ. Proc. § 699.

17. Banks and banking ⚡43—Action by attaching creditor of bank president to set aside sale of president's stock under delinquent assessment held not barred after six months (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 652, § 133; Code Civ. Proc. § 341, subd. 2; Civ. Code, § 347).

Action in equity by attaching creditor of bank president to set aside sale of president's bank stock, made under delinquent assessment pursuant to Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 652, § 133, on ground of invalidity of assessment, held not barred by Code Civ. Proc. § 341, subd. 2, and Civ. Code, § 347, imposing six months' limitation relative to actions to recover stock sold for delinquent assessments.

18. Banks and banking ⚡44—Sale of bank stock for delinquent assessment under statute providing for enforcement without creating personal liability held not void (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 652, § 133; Const. art. 12, § 3).

Sale of bank stock for delinquent assessments under Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 652, § 133, which provides only for enforcement of assessment by the sale of stock, held not void under Const. art. 12, § 3, as attempt to create personal liability for corporation's debts, as is the case in Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 653.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by Fred H. Richman against the Bank of Perris and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John E. Biby and Harry C. Biby, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. Heber Winder, of Riverside, for respondents.

BARNARD, J. This is an action in equity, brought to set aside a sale of certain bank stock made under a purported assessment, and to declare the plaintiff the owner of said stock.

On a previous appeal (Richman v. Bank of Perris, 73 Cal. App. 321, 238 P. 754), it was held that a demurrer to the complaint had been improperly sustained that the complaint stated a cause of action, and the case was reversed, with directions to permit an answer. An answer having been filed and a trial had on the issues set up, the matter is now before us on the facts alleged in both the complaint and the answer, so far as the same were proved or admitted at the trial. These facts, so far as they affect the decision of this case, are as follows:

The defendant bank is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of California, with a capital stock of 250 shares of the par value of $100 each. The articles of incorporation provide for three directors. On April 15, 1919, the defendants Stewart owned 209 of the 250 shares of stock outstanding. On April 16, 1919, one J. B. Moffere purchased these 209 shares of stock and new certificates were issued by the corporation as follows: To Moffere, 199 shares, to Louis Vaiani, 5 shares, and to Louis Casaretto, 5 shares. The shares were issued to the last-named persons in order to qualify them to act as directors. The circumstances of the purchase are not in evidence. On the same day, April 16, 1919, the old board of directors of the bank met and resigned, and Moffere was elected a director and president, Vaiani a director and secretary, and Casaretto was elected a director. On the same day, or on the next day, April 17, 1919, which was the day he was last seen at the bank, the new president, Moffere, robbed the bank of a little over $40,000 in cash and securities and disappeared, and up to the date of the trial (July 14, 1926) had never been apprehended. On April 18, 1919, the Stewarts began a search for Moffere, and on April 21, 1919, a well-known detective agency was employed to endeavor to locate him. On the same day the state superintendent of banks closed the bank and placed its affairs in charge of a deputy, H. P. Maynard. On April 22, 1919, a warrant was issued for the arrest of the absent Moffere and placed in the hands of the sheriff. Continuously from that time the detective agency and the sheriff made frequent reports of their inability to find Moffere. On May 24, 1919, the superintendent of banks, finding the capital of the bank impaired "resulting from the felonious actions of your newly elected president, J. B. Moffere," directed that its capital be repaired, and fixed the amount necessary at $40,000, and further directed that an assessment of $160 a share be levied.

At all times herein involved the by-laws of the bank provided: "Special meetings of the Board may be called by the President on one day's notice to each director, either personally or by wire; special meetings may be called in like manner and on like notice, on the written request of two directors."

On May 26, 1919, the two available directors signed the following instrument in writing:

"Los Angeles, May 26, 1919.

"Mr. James B. Moffere, President of the Bank of Perris, Huntley Apartments, Los Angeles, Calif. Dear Sir: The undersigned, being a majority of the Board of Directors of the Bank of Perris, hereby request a special meeting of said board, to be called and held in the Bank of Perris at one o'clock in the afternoon of Tuesday, the 27th day of May, 1919.

"Louis Vaiani,
"Louis Casaretto."

On the same day the said two directors caused the original of said instrument to be delivered at the Huntley Apartments in Los Angeles, which was the last-known place of residence of the said Moffere, and obtained from the proprietor of said apartments the following written instrument:

"Los Angeles, Cal. May 26, 1919.

"This is to certify that Mr. James B. Moffere, formerly a tenant of the Huntley Apartments, 1207 West Third Street, Los Angeles, was not here present (nor has he been for over thirty days, his present whereabouts being unknown here) to receive a letter personally delivered by messenger, said letter being a call to the meeting of the Directors of the Bank of Perris, addressed to James B. Moffere, Huntley Apartments, and signed by Louis Vaiani and Louis Casaretto, as Directors.

"[Signed] Huntley Apartments,

"By E. Blalack.

"Witness: H. E. Maynard."

On May 27, 1919, the said Vaiani and Casaretto, as directors of said bank, met and caused to be entered in the minutes of the proceedings of the board of directors a resolution, of which the following is a copy: "Whereas, Charles F. Stern, Superintendent of Banks of the State of California, has made requisition upon the Bank to repair its Capital in the sum of $40,000, therefore, be it resolved and ordered that an assessment of $160.00 per share be levied upon each share of the stock of this corporation, said assessment to be payable on June 26, 1919, to Louis Vaiani, the Secretary and Cashier of this Bank, at the banking room of this Bank in the town of Perris, County of Riverside, State of California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid upon the 26th day of June, 1919, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold to pay the delinquent assessment together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale, or will be sold at private sale and without such public notice."

The court found that, at the time this resolution was passed, the said Moffere was absent from the state of California; that he was a fugitive from justice, having robbed the defendant bank of over $40,000; that his whereabouts were unknown to any of the defendants and to any person connected with the said bank; that every effort had been made to locate him and personally notify him of said meeting; but that, owing to these facts and to his absenting himself, it was impossible to locate him and to give him notice of said or any meeting of the board of directors of said bank. The court also found that each of the defendants herein knew that said purported meeting of said directors was held without any notice to the absent director. Moffere, other than that hereinbefore mentioned, and without his being present, that it was not held on a regular meeting day, and that the said meeting was not called by the president. The court also found that the call for said special meeting, made as above outlined, was in accordance with the provisions of the by-laws; that everything possible was done to procure the service of the notice on the said Moffere, and that the failure to personally serve him was due wholly and entirely to his absence from the state, under the circumstances above indicated. The court further found that none of the owners of the outstanding shares of stock in the bank paid said assessment, except one man, who made a partial payment, that a notice of intention to sell such stock was not published in any newspaper of general circulation, but such notice was served upon each of the stockholders by mail, and that each and all of the stockholders had personal notice of such intention to sell such stock.

It was further found that on May 28, 1919, three individuals, acting as agents for all of the defendants herein, except the Bank of Perris, made a written offer to pay to the defendant Bank of Perris the sum of $40,000 in cash, in payment of the amount assessed, as above mentioned. On the same day the bank mailed to each stockholder, at his last-known address, a notice reading as follows:

"Perris, California, May 28, 1919.

"Dear Sir: Please be advised that we have this day been offered full payment of the amount assessed against your stock of this corporation, a notice of which assessment was mailed to you at your last known address, a copy of which offer is enclosed. If you refuse or neglect to pay such assessment on or before July 14, 1919, please be advised that such offer will be accepted by the Board of Directors of this Corporation.

"Yours very truly,

"Bank of Perris,
"By Louis Vaiani, Sec."

On July 15, 1919, the said two directors, Vaiani and Casaretto, met at the office of the bank, and, by resolutions which were entered on the minutes of the proceedings of the directors, canceled 249 shares of stock, including the 209 shares then owned by said Moffere, and declared the said stock to be null and void, and issued new shares in lieu of the shares purported to have been canceled, to the defendants in this action, excepting the defendant Bank of Perris. After the new certificates were issued, the defendants, other than the Bank of Perris, acquired all other issued stock and then claimed to own the entire outstanding stock of the bank. The court found that the above proceedings were the only proceedings under or by which the stock owned by Moffere was canceled or attempted to be canceled. On July 17, 1919, the superintendent of banks withdrew from the control of the bank, and on August 9, 1919, a new board of directors was elected.

On August 14, 1922, the plaintiff herein commenced an action in Los Angeles county against the said Moffere, and on August 15, 1922, a writ of attachment in said action was levied upon the shares of stock in said bank, alleged to be the property of Moffere, and to have been illegally canceled, being the 209 shares above referred to. Later plaintiff recovered judgment against Moffere in said action, in the sum of $34,027.50, and an execution was issued and levied upon said stock. Subsequently Moffere's interest in said stock was sold at execution sale to the plaintiff, for the amount of his judgment. The plaintiff presented his certificate of sale to the bank, and demanded the issuance to himself of the stock claimed to have been owned by Moffere, which demand was refused. The court found that from and after July 15, 1919, said Moffere was not entitled to any of the rights of a stockholder in said bank, and that the defendants, other than the Bank of Perris, are the legal owners of the outstanding stock in said bank. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of the defendants, and that the plaintiff take nothing.

The appellant contends that the purported sale or cancellation of the Moffere stock is void, the meeting of the directors at which the proceedings were initiated not having been called upon legal notice, and that, as a consequence, appellant is the owner of said stock, having acquired the same through the execution sale. California Jurisprudence, vol. 6, p. 1055, states the rule relied upon by appellant, as follows: "It is the general rule, therefore, that a special meeting held without notice is void, and the directors present at such meeting cannot perform any valid corporate act. The provision that a majority of the whole number of trustees shall form a board for the transaction of business and every decision of a majority of the persons duly assembled as a board shall be valid, does not change the rule."

While respondents freely admit this to be the rule, they strongly urge that the circumstances here present an emergency which forms an exception to the general rule. They insist that such an exception arises where three conditions prevail: (1) the existence of an emergency; (2) a reasonable necessity for immediate action; (3) the impossibility of giving notice.

They argue that these conditions were all present in this case; that a much needed and only bank in a small community had been robbed, almost double its capital wiped out, and its doors closed; that it was not only impossible to serve the absent director, but this impossibility arose from his own crime and the fact that he intentionally secreted himself; that it was necessary for immediate action to be taken to rehabilitate the bank by an assessment, in order to save the financial structure of the community, and to carry out the orders of the state superintendent of banks; that it was necessary to do this within 60 days, and, to meet this sudden necessity, the remaining directors acted under the advice of the superintendent of banks; and that they made the best service of the notice possible under the circumstances. Therefore, as an exception to the general rule, they contend that the remaining directors were legally justified in holding the meeting and levying the assessment involved. In support of their contention that there is an exception to the general rule, in such cases of emergency, respondents cite a number of cases from foreign jurisdictions including the following: Chase v. Tuttle, 55 Conn. 455, 12 A. 874, 3 Am. St. Rep. 64; Bank of Little Rock v. McCarthy, 55 Ark. 473, 18 S. W. 759, 29 Am. St. Rep. 60; Smith v. Sinaloa Land & Fruit Co., 42 Utah, 445, 132 P. 556; Doernbecher v. Columbia City Lbr. Co., 21 Or. 573, 28 P. 899, 28 Am. St. Rep. 766; Re Lisk Mfg. Co. (D. C. N. Y.) 167 F. 411; Singer v. Salt Lake Copper Co., 17 Utah, 143, 53 P. 1024, 70 Am. St. Rep. 773; Stiewel v. Webb Press Co., 79 Ark. 45, 94 S. W. 915, 116 Am. St. Rep. 62; Edgerly v. Emerson, 23 N. H. 555, 55 Am. Dec. 207; In re Kenwood Ice Co. (D. C.) 189 F. 525. In addition to these authorities, respondents further rely on certain California cases which, it is contended, show a tendency to let down on the strict rule that notice is necessary under all circumstances, and in which, it is asserted, the courts have swept aside strict and exclusive compliance with the requirements of the statutes. See Bell v. Standard Q. Co., 146 Cal. 699, 81 P. 17; Scott v. Superior S. O. Co., 144 Cal. 140, 77 P. 817; Whitcomb v. Giannini, 43 Cal. App. 229, 184 P. 887; also, see Civ. Code, § 320a.

[1, 2] Without going into details, it may be observed that the California cases cited fall far short of going to the extent of establishing such a tendency as supports the exception contended for. A careful study of the cases from other states relied upon by respondents discloses that while much appears in some of the decisions which apparently supports the contention that such emergency may at times exist as to change the general rule, a large part of the language used is dictum, and in none of the cases cited does it clearly appear that there existed statutes and by-laws similar to those involved in this case. The great weight of authority elsewhere, as well as in California, is to the effect that, in the absence of a statute or a by-law providing to the contrary, notice of a special meeting of a board of directors must be given to each director, except when waived, as provided for in section 320a of the Civil Code. It has been uniformly held in this state that an assessment levied at a special meeting held without notice to all of the directors is void. Gashwiler v. Willis, 33 Cal. 11, 91 Am. Dec. 607; Harding v. Vandewater, 40 Cal. 77; San Buenaventura Mfg. Co. v. Vassault, 50 Cal. 534; Thompson v. Williams, 76 Cal. 153, 18 P. 153, 9 Am. St. Rep. 187; Alta Silver Mining Co. v. Mining Co., 78 Cal. 629, 21 P. 373; Smith v. Dorn, 96 Cal. 73, 30 P. 1024; Pauly v. Pauly, 107 Cal. 8, 40 P. 29, 48 Am. St. Rep. 98; Curtin v. Salmon River, etc. Co., 130 Cal. 345, 62 P. 552, 80 Am. St. Rep. 132; Relley v. Campbell, 134 Cal. 175, 66 P. 220; Cheney v. Canfield, 158 Cal. 342, 111 P. 92, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 16; Raisch v. M. K. & T. Oil Co., 7 Cal. App. 667, 95 P. 662; Beatty v. Rianda, 34 Cal. App. 180, 167 P. 185; Richman v. Bank of Perris, 73 Cal. App. 321, 238 P. 754.

In Cheney v. Canfield, 158 Cal. 345, 111 P. 92, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 16, the court said: "It is the settled law that an assessment can be legally levied upon the capital stock of a corporation by the board of directors only at a regular meeting of the board or at a special meeting thereof regularly called. (Citing cases.) As all proceedings whereby an assessment is levied upon the stock of a corporation, and under which a forfeiture of the stock of the stockholders may be had are in invitum, it is elementary law that they must be strictly followed. The levy of such an assessment can only be accomplished legally by a strict compliance with the statutory provisions relative thereto, or with the provisions of the charter of the corporation upon the subject."

[3] Even if it be assumed that such an exception to the established rule as is here contended for could be sanctioned in an emergency where the necessity for immediate action is sufficiently great, we cannot agree that the existence of such a necessity here appears. Regardless of the general emergency that unquestionably existed, it appears without dispute that the superintendent of banks closed the bank in question and took charge thereof on April 21, 1919. It is apparent that the conditions were then known, and a regular meeting of the directors could have been held on May 3, 1919, no notice of such meeting being required by their by-laws. It also appears that the order, directing the repairment of the impaired capital by an assessment, was made by the superintendent of banks on May 24, 1919, and that another regular meeting, no notice of which was required, could have been held on June 7th, just eleven days later. Even if the proceedings were not started on May 3, 1919, and if 60 days' time following May 24, 1919, was not sufficient to enable the assessment to be levied and collected, if proceedings were begun at the next regular meeting, the bank superintendent had the power, under section 136 of the Bank Act (St. 1909 p. 115), to take possession of the bank and "retain such possession until such bank shall resume business or its affairs be finally liquidated, as herein provided." The bank was already closed, and the superintendent of banks was vested with a certain discretion in the matter. It is not to be assumed, with his order being complied with as rapidly as legally possible, that, if a brief further delay appeared necessary, his action would have been any different than it apparently was in other phases of this case, where every effort seems to have been made to co-operate and assist in the early opening of the bank. We feel that no sufficient necessity is here shown for holding this meeting, other than in a legal manner. It must therefore be held that, because of the failure to give a notice to all of the directors of the bank, in accordance with the by-laws, no legal meeting of the board of directors of defendant bank was held on May 27, 1919, and, therefore, that the purported assessment then levied was void.

However, a further question arises, namely, whether one may, under such circumstances as existed here, come into a court of equity, seeking its broad and liberal relief, while basing his claim on the strictest possible interpretation of law, without himself offering to do equity. If the offending president, Moffere, had himself filed this action asking the relief here prayed for, having by his own theft created this situation, which more or less naturally led the defendants in good faith to put into the corporation $40,000 in cash, in an apparently honest desire to save the bank and serve the community, can it be imagined that a court of equity, which, as has been said, "is founded in conscience," would have heard him, and extended its broad powers to assist him, unless, at least, he offered to return the $40,000, thus mistakenly but honestly furnished by the defendants for the benefit of the bank? We think not.

[4-6] It is not in every case where there is a strict legal right to set aside a sale that a plaintiff may have relief in equity. His own actions are of the greatest importance. In Sayre v. Gas-Light & Heat Co., 69 Cal. 207, 7 P. 437, 10 P. 408, a sale of stock under an assessment was held invalid. But the plaintiff's assignor had considered the stock as practically valueless, and had waited until a reorganization of the company through the efforts of others had made the stock valuable, and it was held that, although his legal right existed, it was incumbent upon him to act with diligence; and in equity he could not acquiesce as long as the stock was worthless, but seek the aid of equity to reclaim it after it had become valuable through the exertion of others. It is the action of the party that is important, and, while a different rule here applies, the actions of the defaulting president in this case were far more inequitable than the actions of the stockholder in the case just mentioned. While time does not confirm a vold act (Civ. Code, § 3539), no one can take advantage of his own wrong (Civ. Code, § 3517). Nor is it merely in cases where the acts complained of are voidable and not void that this rule applies. An illegal contract is void; yet a party otherwise entitled to profit by this fact cannot be heard in equity if by his own acts he has participated in the wrong. In a proper case, equity may set aside the effect of a statute, in order to prevent an unconscionable thing, when the party seeking relief is an actor in the wrong involved. It would be hard to imagine a case where the conduct of a party seeking relief involves greater fraud or criminality than that found in the transaction that was the beginning and cause of the acts here complained of.

[7] There is no rule of equity more firmly established than the one which says that "he who seeks equity must do equity." This maxim means "that whatever be the nature of the controversy between two definite parties, and whatever be the nature of the remedy demanded, the court will not confer its equitable relief upon the party seeking its interposition and aid unless he has acknowledged and conceded, or will admit and provide for, all the equitable rights, claims and demands justly belonging to the adversary party, and growing out of or necessarily involved in the subject-matter of the controversy." Cox v. Hughes, 10 Cal. App. at page 561, 102 P. 956, 959.

[8] Nor is this rule that one who seeks equity must do equity confined to cases which were formerly cognizable only in equity. It applies as well to actions authorized by statute, and a plaintiff may be forced to do equity, as a condition of claiming rights fixed by statute and established law. Benson v. Shotwell, 87 Cal. 49, 25 P. 249, 681; Hancock v. Plummer, 66 Cal. 337, 5 P. 514; Brandt v. Wheaton, 52 Cal. 430; Holland v. Hotchkiss, 162 Cal. 366, 123 P. 258, 261, L. R. A. 1915C, 492. In the last-named case, which was a suit to quiet title as against certain tax deeds, the court said:

"Where the owner comes into equity asking equitable relief to remove or cancel a tax deed or sale as a cloud upon his title, or to obtain a judgment which, in effect, will invalidate such sale or deed, the court should refuse any relief except upon the condition that he first repay to the tax purchaser, or his grantee or assignee, the taxes, penalties, interest, and costs justly chargeable upon the land and which the purchaser has paid at the sale, or afterward upon the faith of it, with legal interest from the time of such payment, less rents received, if any, if the purchaser has been in possession. * * *

"It will be observed from the statements of the rule above given that the defendant who has removed encumbrances or paid claims which the plaintiff ought justly to repay to him as a condition of obtaining the equitable relief sought by the suit is entitled to interest on the sums so paid, and to have the repayment secured to him in some manner."

[9] The particular kind of equitable remedy applied for is immaterial. Couts v. Cornell, 147 Cal. 560, 82 P. 194, 109 Am. St. Rep. 168. The rule is applied where a debt has been barred by the statute of limitations. Puckhaber v. Henry, 152 Cal. 419, 93 P. 114, 125 Am. St. Rep. 75, 14 Ann. Cas. 844. It applies where a party, as actor, is appealing to a court of equity in order to obtain some equitable relief. It may apply to, and its operation may obtain for a defendant, an equitable right or equitable relief which he could not otherwise have obtained, in cases where even equity would not have assisted him in a suit brought by him as plaintiff, for that purpose. Holland v. Hotchkiss, supra; Coleman v. County of Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 714, 182 P. 440. Irrespective of the illegality of the assessment in the case at bar, it is obvious that, without the assessment and its payment, the stock concerned would have been valueless. It is worth contending for now, because the defendants paid a large sum of money to remove a condition as serious and as inescapable as that in the cases where taxes or assessments are justly due and a proper burden on the property involved and which must be repaid before an owner can, through the aid of equity, reclaim his property. Had Moffere protected his interests at the time, he would have had to return or pay a similar sum to meet the conditions he himself created. The amount having been paid for him by the defendants, for the benefit of his stock, under the peculiar circumstances here existing, we feel that the rule under discussion would apply to him if he were himself the plaintiff in this action.

[10] Another rule closely associated with the one just mentioned is that, "he who comes into equity must come with clean hands." In Allstead v. Laumeister, 16 Cal. App. 59, 116 P. 296, 297, the court quotes with approval the following explanation of the meaning of this rule, from Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence:

"It says that whenever a party, who, as actor, seeks to set the judicial machinery in motion and obtain some remedy, has violated conscience, or good faith, or other equitable principle, in his prior conduct, then the doors of the court will be shut against him in limine; the court will refuse to interfere on his behalf to acknowledge his right, or to award him any remedy." * * *

"Any really unconscientious conduct, connected with the controversy to which he is a party, will repel him from the forum whose very foundation is good conscience."

The same opinion closes with this statement: "In any event, as stated, a court of conscience cannot consistently with the very principles which have occasioned its existence lend its aid to relieve a party from the results of his own fraud."

In Chateau v. Singla, 114 Cal. 91, 45 P. 1015, 1016, 33 L. R. A. 750, 55 Am. St. Rep. 63, which was an action in equity brought by one partner in an illegal business against another partner, the court said "Equity would no more entertain an action founded upon such contract, for the relief of either of the parties to it, than it would entertain an action between two thieves for an equitable division of their plunder." It appears to us it would very closely approximate the situation just quoted, as an illustration of the ultimate extreme, if one who, by his own theft, has created a situation that has quite naturally led other interested parties to put into a corporation $40,000 in cash, to protect themselves and others from the result of his robbery, all to the great benefit of the corporation, could come into a court of equity and ask to have their rights ended and the property turned over to him, without any offer of reimbursement, on the ground that, under a strict and stringent rule of law, the proceedings under which they had so acted, although apparently followed in an effort to comply with the law, were in fact and unfortunately illegal. We cannot so hold. If it were a question of comparative equities, the fact that defendants had mistaken their strict legal rights would pale into insignificance beside the guilt of the absconder. It is true that, as a general rule, equity will not aid a forfeiture or assist in divesting an estate, but in this case the parties who might be interested in sustaining the legality of the assessment and sale are not the actors. The burden is on the one coming into a court of equity for relief to prove, not only his legal rights, but his clean hands, and he may not rely on any deficiencies that may be laid at the door of the defendants. Unless the plaintiff brings himself within its rules, equity will leave the parties where it finds them.

"A court of equity will not allow itself to become a handmaid of iniquity of any kind. It intervenes, not for the sake of the party who is benefited by the intervention, but for the sake of the law itself. It matters not that no objection is made by either party; when the court discovers a fact which indicates that the contract is illegal, and ought not to be enforced, it will of its own motion instigate an inquiry in relation thereto." Kreamer v. Earl, 91 Cal. 112, 27 P. 735, 737.

[11] This rule applies not only to illegal contracts, but to illegal transactions. Equity will not aid the plaintiff when he has been guilty of merely fraudulent acts in the original transaction, which constitutes the foundation out of which the action for relief grows. Jose v. Utley, 185 Cal. 656, 199 P. 1037; Powell v. Bank of Lemoore, 125 Cal. 468, 58 P. 83; Brandt v. Krogh, 14 Cal. App. 39, 111 P. 275. The reasons for such a rule would seem even more potent where the guilt involved consists of acts, not only fraudulent, but criminal. The proceedings, which it is the object of this action to set aside, were the natural result of the attempt of the defendants to remedy the effects of a crime.

In Fritz v. Mills, 170 Cal. 449, 150 P. 375, 377, where a party paid a mortgage in accordance with the directions of a judgment, and where the judgment was later reversed, the Supreme Court said: "Upon these facts, we are of the opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to relief on account of the payment of said mortgage out of the money deposited in court, * * * The payment was made in good faith for the purpose of complying with the judgment given by the court and with the agreement which that judgment purported to enforce. The plaintiff cannot justly be made to suffer loss by such compliance, and it would be inequitable to allow the defendants to profit by a successful appeal taken after the plaintiff, relying on that judgment, had complied with its terms by paying money on the defendant's debt which the plaintiff was otherwise under no obligation to pay."

And, in a later hearing of the same case (Fritz v. Mills, 48 Cal. App. at page 335, 192 P. 92, 95), the District Court of Appeal uses this language: "If plaintiff shall now be denied the amount of money originally invested by her in this transaction, which is represented by the present judgment, and if appellants are allowed to take the property free and clear of a lien, toward the liquidation of which they contributed nothing, it would be manifestly unjust and contrary to the established principles of equity and justice. We can find no merit in the contention of appellants that the respondent does not come into court with clean hands."

[12] While ordinarily money paid under a mistake of law, is to be considered a voluntary payment, it may not always be inequitable if the inability of the plaintiff to establish his own case should result in protecting one who has made such an advance. It would be manifestly unjust and contrary to the principles of equity if one who, acting in good faith and on what, without doubt, appeared to be the best advice obtainable at the time, in an honest effort to protect himself, other stockholders, depositors, and the public, has paid a large sum of money to meet such a serious emergency, as here existed, could, after several years, be dispossessed and compelled to surrender what has been built up and made valuable by his own money, in an action in equity brought by the very one whose wrongful acts caused the emergency, and who contributed nothing to remedy it, unless the guilty party be compelled to restore the money so paid in. This is especially true when he had himself received and kept the money for which the payment so made was a substitute. And in this action we are asked, not only to allow the wrongdoer to keep his plunder, without restoration, but to still further profit him by compelling his victims to pay an almost equal amount of his other debts.

[13, 14] If it be true that the attachment debtor, the absconder in this case, could not himself maintain this suit, without bringing himself within the rules of equity, we think the plaintiff here is in the same position. The lien of an execution and attachment proceedings attaches to the real and not to the apparent interest of a judgment debtor in and to his property, and the purchaser at an execution sale takes subject to such existing liens and equities as the property was subject to in the hands of the debtor, unless he can show he purchased the same without notice, either actual or constructive, of the existence of such liens or equities. Whitney v. Sherman, 178 Cal. 435, 173 P. 931; Riley v. Martinelli, 97 Cal. 575, 32 P. 579, 21 L. R. A. 33, 33 Am. St. Rep. 209; De Celis v. Porter, 59 Cal. 464; Weston v. Bear River, etc., Co., 6 Cal. 425. The general rule has been applied to various kinds of cases. An execution sale of land in which the debtor has only an equitable estate operates only as an assignment of the equitable estate. Le Roy v. Dunkerly, 54 Cal. 452. Where the debtor is actually but a partial owner, the purchaser gets only his interest. Clark v. Cushing, 52 Cal. 617. An execution purchaser takes subject to a prior recorded mortgage, even though the record may not show a valid mortgage, as he is bound to make inquiry as to whether or not the record speaks the truth. Meherin v. Oaks, 67 Cal. 57, 7 P. 47. If the attachment creditor has no notice or knowledge to the contrary, he may rely on the entries on the books of a corporation as to who is the owner of the stock. West Coast Safety Faucet Co. v. Wulff, 133 Cal. 315, 65 P. 622, 85 Am. St. Rep. 171. We think the converse is also true, and that, where the stock has been transferred on the books of the corporation, an attachment creditor takes subject to any existing equities; that, if he desires to obtain the benefits of the stock as it actually is, he must also assume its burdens as actually existing. A pledgee is protected in his rights as against attaching creditors if he has caused to be entered in the books of the corporation a statement of his interest in the stock. Spreckels v. Nevada Bank, 113 Cal. 272, 45 P. 329, 33 L. R. A. 459, 54 Am. St. Rep. 348.

[15, 16] The plaintiff had no rights in this matter prior to the levy of his attachment. It is probably a reasonable inference from the facts that he had actual notice at that time, as it is improbable he would have attached stock standing in the name of other people on the books of the corporation, claiming the real owner to be Moffere, unless he had theretofore investigated and found out the actual situation. In any event, he must be held to have had constructive notice. Constructive notice in relation to interests in corporation stock is given, not by instruments filed in the office of the county recorder as in the case of interests in real estate, but by entries in the books of the corporation. The possession and control of the stock here in question and the business of the corporation, by the defendants, and the entries in the books, including the purported cancellation of Moffere's stock and the reissue of the substituted stock to the defendants, were constructive notice to plaintiff of any defects in Moffere's title, and of any equities existing against his interest, arising out of the transaction involved in this proceeding. Moffere had the right, subject to the rules of equity, to set aside the purported sale of his stock. The plaintiff acquired this same right, but subject to, and not in disregard of, those same rules.

The plaintiff is claiming under a certificate based upon a sale under execution. Such a certificate conveys to him all the right which the debtor had in the property in question on the day the attachment was levied (Code Civ. Proc. § 699), and nothing more. The plaintiff stands in the shoes of the debtor. Such rights as the debtor had were limited by such restrictions as are placed upon their enforcement by the rules of equity. Long before the attachment was levied, the debtor had himself taken the real value of his holdings, leaving only what was worse than an empty shell. The debtor having, by his own acts, placed himself where he must do equity before asking for relief, has to the same extent tied the hands of the plaintiff. "He who takes the benefit must bear the burden." Civ. Code, § 3521. The plaintiff is asking a court of equity to give him, not only the benefits, without the burdens, of his debtor's position, but to include benefits created and put in by others.

On the first appeal of this case, when only the facts alleged in the complaint were before it, the court remarked that this was one of the "hard" cases that make "bad law." This was the case when, as then appeared, the defendants had voluntarily stepped in and, in a misguided manner, attempted to assist a bankrupt institution when the judgment debtor appeared blameless, with no equities appearing against him. It now appears that the judgment debtor is not merely the unfortunate owner of stock in a bank that has become involved in difficulties, but is himself guilty of robbing the bank. When such equities as have been enumerated appear, and there appears such a failure to come within the rules of equity on the part of plaintiff's predecessor, which failure is binding on the plaintiff, it becomes unnecessary and impossible to so hold as to violate the conscience of a court of equity. When a man who has obtained control of the majority of the stock in a bank, robs the bank, wrecks the institution, paralyzes the community, and jeopardizes the rights of other stockholders and depositors, secretes himself so that notice of meetings may not be served on him, and, when other interested parties have in good faith taken effective, but unfortunately not strict legal, measures to meet the emergency, and have replaced the money out of their personal funds, under such circumstances as exist in this case, his creditor may not, after waiting for years, during which time values have increased, come in and, although having constructive, if not actual, notice of the existence of the equities, take the results of the labor and money of others, without doing the equity he asks for himself. To hold otherwise would be to hold that a court of equity is too feeble and impotent to do justice and to require justice in so new and so unusual a situation. We think that, while the facts are new and passing strange, the fundamental principles of equity are broad enough to meet the situation. The framers of our statutes cannot foresee such contingencies as this, but equity opens many a door closed by the strict rules of law. To apply the strictest rules of technical law alone, to this case, as demanded by the plaintiff, would work an injustice, and would give to him, not only the pound of flesh he claims, but also innocent blood to which he is not entitled.

[17] Respondent contends that this action is barred by section 341, subd. 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 347 of the Civil Code. There is no merit in this contention. Herbert Kraft Co. Bank v. Bank of Orland, 133 Cal. 64, 65 P. 143; Cheney v. Canfield, 158 Cal. 342, 111 P. 92, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 16; Richmond v. Bank of Perris, supra.

[18] The only other point calling for attention is one raised by a supplemental brief filed by appellant, in which attention is called to the case of Wood (State Superintendent of Banks) v. Hamaguchi et al. (Cal. Sup.) 277 P. 113. It is argued that in this case it was held that the State Bank Act is void, and therefore, since the act under which the whole proceedings were taken resulted in the sale of the stock involved in this action is void, the purported sale of stock herein is also void, and the plaintiff entitled to recover. A casual inspection shows the fallacy of this argument. It was held in the case cited that Act 653 of Deering's General Laws 1923, is void and unconstitutional, being in conflict with section 3, art. 12, of the Constitution, because it attempts to create a personal liability for corporation debts, even when not incurred during the time the stockholders sought to be charged held the stock. But this case pointed out that provisions for assessments upon paid-up stock, enforceable only by the sale of the stock, do not deal with the personal liability of the stockholder, and hence are not in conflict with this section of the Constitution. All of the proceedings in this case were taken, or attempted to be taken, under section 133 of Act 652 of the same General Laws, which provides only for the enforcement of assessments by the sale of the stock, with no attempt to create a personal liability. Not only does the case relied on not apply to the case at bar, but the plaintiff, in asking equitable relief, subjects himself to the requirements of equity, as above set forth.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

IRWIN v. NEWBY et al. (Civ. 7099.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 20, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 19, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 16, 1930.

1. Libel and slander ☞80—Complaint alleging libel in "pretended" cross-complaint, not uniformly so characterized, held not demurrable, in view of allegations showing that it was in a pleading filed by defendant.

Complaint stating that alleged libelous matter was in "pretended" cross-complaint, filed by defendant in former action by plaintiff held not demurrable because not uniformly so characterizing cross-complaint, in view of other allegations showing that libelous matter was in a pleading filed by defendant.

2. Libel and slander ☞80—Plaintiff alleging publication of libel in pleading filed in judicial proceeding was bound to allege facts disproving privilege (Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 2).

Where face of complaint showed that alleged libelous matter was published in cross-complaint or other pleading filed by defendant in judicial proceeding against her by plaintiff, it was incumbent on plaintiff to allege facts showing that matter was not privileged under Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 2.

3. Libel and slander ☞97—Privilege may be raised by demurrer to complaint showing publication of alleged libel in judicial proceeding (Civ. Code, § 47, subds. 1, 2).

While plea of privilege is a defense to action for libel, the privilege may be raised by demurrer when complaint shows that alleged libel was published in a judicial proceeding or comes under either subdivision 1 or subdivision 2 of Civ. Code, § 47.

4. Libel and slander ☞80—Allegation that court struck out alleged libelous matter in pleading as immaterial, irrelevant, and sham held insufficient, in absence of allegation that order had not been vacated or become final.

Allegation of complaint, in action for libel, that court struck out libelous matter, alleged to have been published in pleading filed by defendant in plaintiff's former action against her, on ground that it was immaterial, irrelevant, and sham, held insufficient allegation of finality to make order binding judgment against defendant, in absence of allegation that it had not been vacated or set aside, nor become final.

5. Libel and slander $\Rightarrow$ 38(3)—Mere fact that defamatory matter, published in judicial proceeding, is irrelevant or insufficient defense, does not destroy privilege (Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 2).

Mere fact that alleged defamatory matter, published in pleading of defendant in former action between parties, is irrelevant as matter of law or insufficient as defense, does not bring it within exception to privilege given by Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 2, but it must have no reasonable pertinency to matter involved in subject-matter of pending action and no relation or reference to cause in hand.

6. Libel and slander $\Rightarrow$ 38(3)—Wife's cross-complaint, alleging that plaintiff fraudulently proceeded with sheriff's sale to rob her of interest in stock levied on as husband's held privileged (Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 2).

Wife's cross-complaint, alleging that plaintiff and others fraudulently proceeded with pretended sheriff's sale of husband's stock in corporation to satisfy judgment against him for purpose of robbing her of her interest therein, held within privilege accorded publications in judicial proceedings by Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 2, even if insufficient as matter of law.

7. Libel and slander $\Rightarrow$ 129—Each of several defendants is entitled to \$100 attorney's fee on dismissal of single plaintiff action for slander (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 4317, § 7).

St. 1871-72, p. 534, § 7 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 4317, § 7), does not require that $100 attorney's fee, allowed as costs, be divided among several defendants appearing separately, on dismissal of action by single plaintiff for slander; each defendant being entitled to such fee.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Action by Harry M. Irwin against Nathan Newby and others. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. A. Alderson and John C. Packard, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Newby & Palmer and Newby & Newby, all of Los Angeles, for respondent Stockwell.

Dee Holder, of Los Angeles, for respondents Palmer and Newby.

KOFORD, P. J. In this action defendants' demurrer to plaintiff's complaint was sustained. A judgment of dismissal followed, and the plaintiff has appealed. The action was for libel. The main point of the demurrer was that the complaint showed upon its face that the alleged defamatory matter was privileged under the provisions of subdivision 2 of section 47 of the Civil Code, which makes a publication privileged if made in a judicial proceeding. It appears from the face of the complaint that the alleged libelous matter was published in the allegations of a cross-complaint filed by the respondent B. C. Stockwell and respondents Newby and Palmer, her attorneys, in a previous action entitled McAlvay v. Consumers' Salt Company (a corporation) and B. C. Stockwell. The appellant contends that the privilege given by subdivision 2 of Civil Code, § 47, has an exception, and that the alleged defamatory matter comes under the exception. The exception is that such privilege given to judicial proceedings will not be allowed to serve as a cloak to conceal a palpable libel where not necessary to preserve the legitimate freedom of action of the parties in a judicial proceeding. In Carpenter v. Ashley, 148 Cal. 422, 83 P. 444, 445, 7 Ann. Cas. 601, it is stated: "The great weight of authority, however, is that this privilege is not absolute, but is limited to words which have some reasonable pertinency, or relevancy, or reference to the matter involved as the subject-matter of the pending action. * * * 'The privilege of counsel in the trial of a cause is not absolute and unqualified, and slanderous words spoken by him having no relation or reference to the cause in hand or to any subject-matter involved therein are actionable.'"

The complaint tells the following things about the litigation leading up to the alleged libel: B. D. McAlvay obtained a judgment of $10,000 against V. E. Stockwell in action No. 147367. Under execution issued in that case the sheriff sold all the interest of said V. E. Stockwell in 225,000 shares of the capital stock of Consumers' Salt Company. In all the proceedings in said action the plaintiff and appellant herein was the attorney for the plaintiff McAlvay therein. Said McAlvay next instituted action No. 184338 against said Consumers' Salt Company and B. C. Stockwell, and "the sole issue made by the pleadings in said action number 184338 is whether at the time of the levy of the said execution * * * said B. C. Stockwell was the owner of said 225,000 shares * * * as her separate property or whether said V. E. Stockwell was the owner of said 225,000 shares at said time either as his separate property or as community property." In said action B. C. Stockwell, defendant therein, filed a cross-complaint signed by herself and the other defendants, her attorneys therein. It contained the matter which is alleged to be libelous. We quote it as it is quoted in the complaint herein:

"Cross complainant avers that the said B. D. McAlvay and the said Harry M. Irwin and A. H. Rose fraudulently proceeded with said pretended sheriff's sale with the intent and purpose of robbing this cross complainant of her interest in the said two hundred twenty-five thousand (225,000) shares of the capital stock of said Consumers Salt Company. * * * and as the price and award for a successful conspiracy to wrongfully deprive this complainant of her property."

[1] Emphasis is made of the fact that the complaint states that the libelous matter was in a pretended cross-complaint, but the cross-complaint is not so characterized uniformly in the complaint. Whatever force should be given to the adjective "pretended" in this case, the other allegations in the complaint show that the libelous matter was in a pleading filed by the defendant in an action which put in issue the title to certain capital stock in which said defendant claimed an interest. It is of no consequence in this action whether it was stated in a cross-complaint or stated in an answer as a matter of defense.

[2, 3] It fairly appears from the face of the complaint that the alleged libelous matter was published in a judicial proceeding either in a cross-complaint or some other pleading filed by B. C. Stockwell, a defendant therein. From this fact it follows that the matter was privileged, unless the matter was such as to come within the claimed exception to the privilege granted by Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 2. It was therefore incumbent upon appellant herein to go still further with allegations of fact in his complaint in order to show that the matter was not privileged. While the plea of privilege is a defense, the privilege may be raised by demurrer when the complaint shows that the publication of the alleged libel was made in a judicial proceeding or comes under either subdivisions 1 or 2 of Civil Code, § 47. Stevens v. Snow, 191 Cal. 58, 64, 214 P. 968, and cases cited; Reid v. Thomas (Cal. App.) 279 P. 226.

[4, 5] Appellant claims that his complaint meets this test. He does not rely upon the general allegations in the complaint which allege that the libelous matter was not pertinent, relevant, material, or a matter of defense which said B. C. Stockwell was entitled to file in said action. These allegations would not overcome statements of detailed facts in the complaint, if such facts would make the matter privileged. There is also an allegation in the complaint herein that the court struck out the alleged libelous matter upon the ground that it was immaterial, irrelevant, and sham, but the allegation falls short of alleging such finality to the order as would make it a binding judgment against B. C. Stockwell. It is not alleged that said order has not been vacated or set aside nor has become final. To show that the matter was irrelevant and immaterial, appellant especially relies upon the point that the sheriff is alleged to have sold all the interest of said V. E. Stockwell in said shares of stock. It is argued that this means that the interest of B. C. Stockwell was not affected; that, because her property was not sold, she could have no cause of action on account of the sale. The mere fact that the alleged defamatory matter is irrelevant as a matter of law or that it is insufficient as a defense does not bring it within the exception contended for by appellant. It must go further. As stated in Carpenter v. Ashley, supra, it must have no reasonable pertinency to the matter involved in the subject-matter of the pending action and have no relation or reference to the cause in hand. In Taylor v. Iowa Park Gin Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 199 S. W. 853, at page 855, the kind of relevancy meant by the rule is thus explained: "As to the degree of relevancy or pertinency necessary to make alleged defamatory matter privileged, the courts favor a liberal rule. The matter to which the privilege does not extend must be so palpably wanting in relation to the subject-matter of the controversy that no reasonable man can doubt its irrelevancy and impropriety. In order that matter alleged in a pleading may be privileged, it need not be in every case material to the issues presented by the pleadings. It must, however, be legitimately related thereto, or so pertinent to the subject of the controversy that it may become the subject of inquiry in the course of the trial. The fact that the person alleged to have been defamed in the pleadings is not a party to the proceedings has been held not to detract from the privileged character of the publication."

[6] Measured by the rule as thus explained, it follows that the respondent B. C. Stockwell, as a defendant in the previous action, and her attorneys therein, were acting within the privilege accorded judicial proceedings. The judgment sought against her in that action would estop her from asserting title to the capital stock sold under execution. She claimed an interest in it. She claimed the sale was a fraud upon her. She had a right to say so and plead it in her defense. In doing so she was acting within the privilege, even though her pleading may have been insufficient as a matter of law.

[7] In taxing costs the court awarded $100 attorney fees to each of two defendants who appeared separately. Such attorney fees are allowed as costs under the terms of St. 1871-72, p. 533, Deering General Laws 1923, part one, p. 1620. The constitutionality of this law has been upheld. Smith v. McDermott, 93 Cal. 421, 29 P. 34; Gaffey v. Mann, 5 Cal. App. 712, 91 P. 172. The fact that there is but one plaintiff and two or more defendants does not require an interpretation of the statute which will permit a total of but $100 attorney fees for defendants to be divided amongst them. While appellant states that such a construction is necessary in order to avoid an unconstitutional discrimination between parties plaintiff and defendant, the respondents state that the construction contended for by appellant would itself lead to such a discrimination by giving a successful plaintiff more for his attorney than a successful defendant who might be jointly sued with others without any choice on his part. The interpretation asked for by appellant was disapproved in Hills v. Schaeffer (Cal. App.) 274

P. 388. The $100 attorney fees is properly awarded as costs to any successful party.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. OLIVER.★ (Cr. 2.)

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California. Nov. 15, 1929.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 14,

1. Licenses ⇨40—Promoter accused of selling securities without permit held bound by signature to contract, where his name was signed by another in his presence at his express direction (Corporate Securities Act 1917, § 3, and § 2, subds. 3, 6, 8, 9, § 25, amended by St. 1925, pp. 962, 963, 972, §§ 1, 12).

In prosecution for selling securities without permit, in violation of Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 675), § 3, and § 2, subds. 3, 6, 8, 9, § 25, amended by St. 1925, pp. 962, 963, 972, §§ 1, 12, promoter held bound by signature to subscription contract signed by another in promoter's presence and at his express direction.

2. Licenses ⇨42(4)—Testimony of purchasers of subscription contracts held sufficient to sustain conviction for selling securities without permit (Corporate Securities Act 1917, § 3, and § 2, subds. 3, 6, 8, 9, § 25, amended by St. 1925, pp. 962, 963, 972, §§ 1, 12).

Evidence consisting of testimony of three purchasers of subscription contracts for stock issued by promoter held sufficient to sustain conviction for sale of securities without permit, in violation of Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 675), § 3, and § 2, subds. 3, 6, 8, 9, § 25, amended by St. 1925, pp. 962, 963, 972, §§ 1, 12.

3. Licenses ⇨40—Contracts of promoter to organize corporation, license it to his patent rights in return for stock, and to deliver some of such stock to subscriber, under which contract subscriber made payments, held illegal (Corporate Securities Act 1917, § 3, and § 2, subds. 3, 6, 8, 9, § 25, amended by St. 1925, pp. 962, 963, 972, §§ 1, 12).

Contracts of promoter to organize corporation, to license corporation to use his patent rights, and to issue and deliver certain stock to subscriber, in consideration of payments of money made by subscriber, which stock was to come from that received by promoter for his license to use patent rights in California, constituted agreement of promoter's own issue rendering him liable for selling securities without permit, in violation of Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 675), § 3, and § 2, subds. 3, 6, 8, 9, § 25, amended by St. 1925, pp. 962, 963, 972, §§ 1, 12, since contracts were preorganization subscriptions to capital stock of foreign corporation, not set forth in articles of incorporation, and since promoter collected thereunder portion of consideration.

4. Licenses ⇨40—That corporation, contemplated in subscription contracts, was not then in existence, did not relieve promoter from liability of unlawfully selling securities; "security" (Corporate Securities Act 1917, § 3, and § 2, subds. 3, 6, 8, 9, § 25, amended by St. 1925, pp. 962, 963, 972, §§ 1, 12).

Contract of promoter to organize corporation and issue stock therein to subscriber, in return for which subscriber made payments, constituted sale of "security" within meaning of Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 675), § 2, subd. 8, as amended by St. 1925, pp. 962, 963, § 1, defining security as present right to present or future participation in income or assets of business carried on for profit, and fact that stock was to be issued and delivered at future date, and that the delivery was contingent also on promoter's sale to corporation of interest in patent, did not relieve promoter from liability for violation of Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 675), § 3, and § 2, subds. 3, 6, 8, 9, § 25, amended by St. 1925, pp. 962, 963, 972, §§ 1, 12.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Security.]

5. Licenses ⇨40—Interest in corporation's assets or income not returning profit until performance of future act may be a "security" (Corporate Securities Act 1917, § 3, and § 2, subd. 8, amended by St. 1925, pp. 962, 963, § 1).

Fact that interest given subscriber in assets or income of corporation will not return profit until performance of a future act, such as the sale of an interest in the patent, or a grant to the licensee of a right to use it, does not prevent interest from being a security within definition of term contained in Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 675), § 3, and § 2, subd. 8, as amended by St. 1925, pp. 962, 963, § 1, prohibiting sale of securities without authority from commissioner.

6. Criminal law ⇨137(5)—Defendant's counsel who permitted witness to testify that his contract was similar to another could not on appeal object that secondary evidence was admitted.

Defendant's counsel having permitted witness to testify that he had read another contract which was introduced in evidence, and that his own contract was similar, could not complain for first time on appeal, in prosecution for illegal sale of securities, that secondary evidence was admitted in trial court.

7. Licenses ⇨40—Unit representing division of assets of business carried on for profit is "security" within statute licensing sale of securities (Corporate Securities Act 1917, § 3, and § 2, subd. 8, as amended by St. 1925, pp. 962, 963, § 1).

Unit issued by individual representing a division of the assets of a business carried on for profit or right to participate in profits, earnings, or income derived from such assets is a security under Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 675), § 3, and § 2, subd. 8, amended by St. 1925, pp. 962, 963, § 1, defining term security and requiring license from commissioner for sale thereof; capital stock not being limited to amount derived from issuance of shares in corporation, but including money invested in business operations of individual or partnership.

8. Licenses $\S$ 40—Contracts for subscription to units in syndicate to be organized constituted "sale of securities" by company within statute requiring permit (Corporate Securities Act 1917, $\S$ 3, and $\S$ 2, subds. 3, 6, 8, amended by St. 1925, pp. 962, 963, $\S$ 1).

Contract entered into by promoter with subscriber on organization of syndicate for issuance of unit therein to subscriber constituted contract for sale of securities under Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 675), $\S$ 3, and $\S$ 2, subd. 8, amended by St. 1925, pp. 962, 963, $\S$ 1, defining term "security" and requiring permit from commissioner for "sale of securities," since syndicate possessed all necessary characteristics of company as defined by section 2, subds. 3, 6, as amended by St. 1925, pp. 962, 963, $\S$ 1.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Third Series, Sale of Securities.]

9. Licenses $\S$ 42(4)—Admission of articles of newly organized corporation bearing name of that set forth in subscription contracts, but organized in different state, held admissible in prosecution of promoter for selling securities without permit (Corporate Securities Act 1917, $\S$ 3, and $\S$ 2, subds. 3, 6, 8, 9, $\S$ 25, amended by St. 1925, pp. 962, 963, 972, $\S\S$ 1, 12).

In prosecution of promoter for violation of Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 675), $\S$ 3, and $\S$ 2, subds. 3, 6, 8, 9, $\S$ 25, amended by St. 1925, pp. 962, 963, 972, $\S\S$ 1, 12, requiring license from commissioner before any company may sell its securities, admission in evidence of exemplified copy of articles of incorporation of corporation organized in Nevada bearing same name as corporation referred to in subscription contracts entered into by promoter, except for state of domicile designated, held not error.

10. Criminal law $\S$ 878(4)—Acquittal on counts charging promoter with selling corporation's securities and conviction for issuing and collecting for subscription agreements held not inconsistent, where promoter agreed to deliver stock which he should obtain from sale of patent rights (Corporate Securities Act 1917, $\S$ 3, and $\S$ 2, subds. 3, 6, 8, 9, $\S$ 25, amended by St. 1925, pp. 962, 963, 972, $\S\S$ 1, 12).

In prosecution of promoter for violation of Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 675), $\S$ 3, and $\S$ 2, subds. 3, 6, 8, 9, $\S$ 25, amended by St. 1925, pp. 962, 963, 972, $\S\S$ 1, 12, verdicts of guilty on counts charging promoter with selling and issuing subscription agreements and collecting therefor held not inconsistent with verdict of not guilty on counts charging sale of securities of corporation, where contract entered into by promoter provided for his organization of corporation and for issuance to subscribers, in return for present payments, of stock which promoter was to receive for transfer of patent right to corporation.

11. Criminal law $\S$ 1167(2)—Where trial court pronounced sentence on only one count, defendant could not complain that more than one penalty was inflicted.

Where trial court suspended judgment on five of six counts of information, under which defendant was convicted, and imposed sentence on remaining count, defendant could not object on appeal that all of counts charged only a single offense, for which but one penalty could be inflicted.

12. Criminal law $\S$ 1144(17)—It must be assumed that trial judge suspending sentence would not subsequently impose double penalty for single offense.

Where several counts under which defendant was convicted charged single offense, but trial court suspended pronouncement of judgment on all of counts but one, it must be assumed that trial judge, in case of defendant's violation of probation, would not impose double penalty for single offense.

13. Criminal law $\S$ 1144(1/2)—Appellate court cannot anticipate error on part of trial court.

Appellate court cannot anticipate that trial court will commit error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. A. Leonard, Judge.

Dew R. Oliver was convicted of violation of the Corporate Securities Act, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Theodore Stensland, of Los Angeles, and Trent Penland and J. R. Le Gallez, both of San Bernardino, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

MARKS, J. By an information, filed by the district attorney of Riverside county on the 23d day of April, 1929, appellant was accused of violation of the Corporate Securities Act in nine counts thereof, and of grand theft in two counts thereof. Count 11, charging grand theft, was dismissed. The jury found the appellant guilty on counts 1, 3, 4, 6, 8, and 10, all of which charged violations of the Corporate Securities Act; and not guilty on counts 2, 5, and 9, charging violations of the same act, and also not guilty on count 7, charging grand theft. After the verdict was entered, appellant filed his motion for new trial, which motion was denied. He then applied for probation, which was granted on counts 1, 3, 6, 8, and 10, for the period of two years with the ordinary requirements and restrictions, and pronouncement of judgment was suspended. On count 4, the trial court sentenced appellant to two years in the county jail, and granted him probation, in which he suspended one year and nine months of the jail sentence, and imposed the other conditions of probation applying to the other counts. The offenses of which the appellant was convicted were committed during the months of May, June, and July, 1927.

Counts 1 and 3 of the information are based upon a transaction between appellant and Grant Powell, which is evidenced by a written contract, dated July 5, 1927, and entitled "Memorandum of Agreement for the promotion of The Oliver Electric Power Corporation of California or State of Delaware." Stripped of its verbiage, this contract provided: That appellant was the owner of certain patents and patent rights; that it was proposed to organize a corporation to which appellant agreed to transfer and assign the exclusive right to use said patent rights for the state of California, retaining, as a consideration for such assignment, one-third of the capital stock of the corporation; in consideration of the payments of money to him by Powell, appellant agreed to deliver, assign, and cause to be transferred to Powell certain shares of stock of the corporation when organized out of stock which appellant was to receive for his license to use the patent rights in California.

Powell paid Oliver $50 on July 5, 1927, the date of the contract, $50 on August 1, 1927, $50 on September 23, 1927, and $50 on October 16, 1927. According to the contract, the money was to be used by appellant in advertising the merits of his patents, organizing the corporation, and interesting the public in the purchase of stock therein.

[1] The contract bears the signature "Dew R. Oliver by Frank S. Trump." Trump testified that he signed the name "Dew R. Oliver" to the contract in appellant's presence and at his express direction, and that the payments made by Powell were all paid to Oliver. Appellant contends that under these circumstances the signature to the contract is not his, and that he cannot be held bound by it. In this state the law is too well settled to the contrary to need the citation of authorities.

In the first count of the information appellant is accused of having sold and issued to Powell one subscription agreement purporting to convey an interest in a business to be carried on for profit without a permit from the commissioner of corporations, and in the third with collecting the sum of $50 from Powell on said contract at the same time without having any permit so to do.

Counts 4 and 6 of the information probably are based upon a contract, signed by appellant and Frank S. Trump, different from the Powell agreement. The record is not clear as to whether this contract was similar to the Powell agreement or to the one issued by appellant to Josephine Roach Trump, wife of Frank S. Trump. The opening paragraphs of this agreement are as follows: "Pre-organization Syndicate. Oliver Electric Power Corporation of Delaware. To be incorporated under the laws of Delaware. Capital Stock $25,000,000.00. Divided into 250,000 shares. Par value $100.00 each. Organization stock 82,500 shares. Syndicate stock 5,000 shares. Treasury stock 162,500 shares. This syndicate is being organized for the purpose of underwriting a block of five thousand shares of the capital stock of the above proposed company at ten dollars per share. To provide immediate funds for the incorporation, organization and promotion of a parent holding and operating company, and the building of demonstration models, etc. Capital of Syndicate $50,000.00 divided into five thousand equal units of $100.00 each. Subscription contract to Dew R. Oliver. * * * I hereby subscribe for thirty units, or shares, of the preorganization syndicate being organized by you, to underwrite a block of five thousand shares of the capital stock of the proposed Oliver Electric Power Corporation of Delaware * * * and agree to pay you three hundred dollars for same upon the following express terms and conditions, to wit: One. The sum of $300.00 upon the signing of this subscription, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged." The contract is long and verbose. It provides for the exchange of units for stock in the corporation, for additional subscriptions in excess of $300, and that all payments be made to Dew R. Oliver, syndicate manager. Trump made several payments to appellant; the one in question being paid on May 25, 1927.

The eighth and tenth counts are based on a sale to Frank Cessna on June 19, 1927. The Cessna contract was not in evidence, but he testified, without objection, that it was similar to the Powell contract, which he had read. He paid appellant $50 on the last-named date.

In the fourth and eighth counts of the information appellant is accused of the sale of securities to Trump and Cessna, respectively, and in the sixth and tenth counts with the collection of money from these two purchasers in connection with the same sales and at the same time.

Appellant urges four grounds for reversal as follows: (1) That the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict; (2) that the court erred in rulings on questions of law during trial; (3) that the court erred in its instructions to the jury, and in refusing to give, and in modifying, the instructions proposed by appellant; (4) in denying appellant's motion for new trial. The grounds urged under the fourth assignment of error were the same as those presented under the other three, so it will not be necessary to consider it separately.

[2] Under his first assignment of error appellant insists that the evidence was not sufficient to justify the verdict, because the three purchasers were the only witnesses produced against him, and because the contracts issued by appellant were not in violation of the Corporate Securities Act.

The testimony of one competent witness, when accepted by the jury, is sufficient to sustain a verdict. The testimony of Powell, Trump, and Cessna was each corroborated by the other, and was also supported by documentary evidence and other evidence. It was not contradicted, and amply supports the verdict.

[3] We also conclude that appellant's second contention under this assignment of error is without merit. The Corporate Securities Act (Stats. 1917, p. 673, c. 532), as amended by the Legislature in various sessions down to and including the one in 1925 (St. 1925, p. 962, c. 447), in so far as it applies to this case, provides as follows:

Section 2, subd. 3: "The word 'company' includes all domestic and foreign private corporations, associations, joint stock companies, and partnerships, of every kind, trustees, as hereinafter defined, and also individuals as hereinafter defined; * * *."

Subdivision 6: "The word 'individual' in so far as it is included in the definition of a 'company' includes only persons selling, offering for sale, negotiating for the sale of, or taking subscriptions for any security as hereinafter defined in subdivision eight of this section, of their own issue."

Subdivision 8: "The word 'security,' in so far as it applies to 'individuals' includes: * * * (c) Any instrument offered for sale, or sold, or issued, to the public by an 'individual,' evidencing or representing any right to participate or share in the profits, earnings or income, gross or net, derived from the assets, or any thereof of any business carried on for profit or in the distribution of such assets; excepting therefrom any lease, not offered to the public, whereby the lessee obtains the right to use or control the property leased and to receive for his use, in whole or in part, the profits, earnings or income derived from the property so leased."

Subdivision 9: "A 'sale,' within the meaning of this act, includes every contract, by which, for a pecuniary consideration, called a price, one transfers to another an interest in property, and also an exchange, a pledge, a hypothecation, and any transfer in trust or otherwise as security for the performance of an obligation, and also any issue of any security by a company; and the word 'sell,' as used in this act, includes every act by which such sale is made; * * *."

Section 3 (St. 1917, p. 675): "No company shall sell * * * or offer for sale, negotiate for sale of, or take subscriptions for any security of its own issue until it shall have first applied for and secured from the commissioner a permit authorizing it so to do."

Section 25 as amended (St. 1925, p. 972, § 12): "Neither this act nor any provision hereof shall be deemed to prohibit subscriptions for shares of a domestic corporation made prior to the incorporation thereof and set forth in the articles of incorporation; but such subscription shall be deemed to have been made and accepted upon the condition that such corporation shall be incorporated within ninety days thereafter and, when incorporated, shall with reasonable diligence apply for and secure from the commissioner a permit authorizing the issue of the shares so subscribed for, in accordance with such subscriptions; provided, however, that except as may be specifically required by any law of this state, nothing herein contained shall be construed as permitting the collection of any portion of the consideration to be paid on account of such subscriptions, unless and until a permit shall have been issued by the commissioner authorizing such collection; nor except as may be specifically required by any law of this state, nothing herein contained shall be construed as permitting the taking of subscriptions for any security of any company other than a domestic corporation or to make collection of any portion of the consideration to be paid on account of subscriptions unless and until a permit shall have been issued by the commissioner authorizing the taking of such subscriptions or the collection thereof."

The record before us shows that the appellant stipulated that neither he nor the Oliver Electric Power Corporation ever applied for or received a permit to sell stock.

Appellant attacks the verdict under the Powell contract, asserting that he could not be deemed a "company" under the definition of the Corporate Securities Act, either by reason of acting as a "trustee" or an "individual" as therein defined. For the purpose of this opinion it is not necessary to decide whether or not appellant acted as a "trustee" in this transaction.

In the Powell contract appellant entered into a personal obligation to organize the Oliver Electric Corporation, to license this corporation to use his patent rights in California, and to issue and deliver certain stock in the corporation to Powell, which stock was to come out of certain stock to be issued to appellant by this corporation for the license to use the patent rights. Certainly this was an agreement of "appellant's own issue." He was the chief party to benefit by it, if the patents proved successful. The contract was a pre-organization subscription to the capital stock of a foreign corporation not set forth in the articles of incorporation, and under which appellant collected a "portion of the consideration on account of such subscription," both acts being prohibited by section 25 of the Corporate Securities Act as amended.

[4, 5] Appellant contends that, because the proposed corporation was not in existence, and might never be organized by appellant, no crime was committed in agreeing to sell its stock and accepting payment therefor. This is indeed a novel contention. If the corporation were formed and the stock were available, the sale without a permit would be admittedly illegal, but, if the corporation were not formed, the promoter would escape punishment because of his own fraud in refusing to organize it, one of the very things for which he accepted the money from his purchaser. We cannot subscribe to any such doctrine.

If the instrument of sale creates a present right to a present or a future participation in either the income, profits, or assets of a business carried on for profit, it is a "security," as defined in the Corporate Securities Act. Because the interest created will not return a profit until the performance of a future act, such as the sale of an interest in a patent, or the grant to a licensee of the right to use it, does not bring it without the provisions of this act. Agnew v. Daugherty, 189 Cal. 446, 209 P. 34. To hold otherwise would make the real test of the legality or illegality of the sale the ultimate success or failure of the venture. The law was passed to protect the investors against unprincipled promoters, as well as to keep valueless securities off the market. It is the act of selling that is primarily placed under the examination of the commissioner of corporations, and his action in granting or withholding his permit to sell cannot be made contingent upon the future success or failure of the business venture. To hold otherwise would put a premium on fraud and permit a promoter to sell a mythical security without any intention of ever attempting to engage in the business in which he purported to sell an interest.

Because the stock in a corporation was to be issued and delivered at a future date is no defense to this action. Tatterson v. Kehrein, 88 Cal. App. 34, 263 P. 285.

In the case of Reno v. American Ice Machine Co., 72 Cal. App. 409, 237 P. 784, 785, the court used the following language: "No application to issue the stock attempted to be sold to plaintiff, and containing a copy of the contract for the sale thereof, was ever made to the commissioner of corporations prior to the commencement of this action, and it was never possible for the defendant company to have lawfully issued its stock to plaintiff. That being true, we think it must follow that the contract for the sale of the same was void. Section 12 of the Corporate Securities Act provides that any security issued without a permit shall be void. But appellant contends that this provision does not apply to a contract for the sale of stock. Can it be contended seriously that, while an executed contract forbidden by statute is void, the same contract, while executory, is valid? If the issuance of the stock to plaintiff during the term of his employment by the defendant would have been void, certainly the contract for the issuance of the same was equally void."

[6] Appellant complains of the verdict on the two counts in the Cessna transaction because Cessna's contract was not produced in evidence. It appears that it could have been obtained by Cessna, but, without objection, counsel for appellant permitted him to testify that he had read the Powell contract, and that his was similar to Powell's. Counsel cannot be heard to complain here for the first time that this secondary evidence was admitted in the trial court when by objection there they could have kept it out of the record and compelled the introduction of the written agreement.

It appearing that the Cessna contract was similar to Powell's, it will not be necessary to consider it further. The same is true of the Trump contract, if the Powell form was used. If, however, the form of the contract between appellant and Mrs. Trump were used, it needs further consideration. In so far as this contract provided for the purchase of stock in the Oliver Electric Power Corporation, by Trump and others from Oliver, what has already been said concerning the Powell contract will apply.

[7, 8] This contract went further than the Powell contract, in that it purported to organize a syndicate, with a capital of $50,000, divided into 5000 equal units of $100 each. The contracts were signed by appellant, and the subscriptions were paid to and expended by him. The syndicate was a child of his brain, and the contracts were of his own issue. He undoubtedly expected to profit by the undertaking by using the money paid to him by the subscribers, to build demonstration models of his invention, and to organize, incorporate, and promote the corporation that would put his invention to practical use in the industrial life of the state. The subscribers undoubtedly expected to share these profits in participating in stock of the corporation which they were to receive at a price much below par.

This syndicate possessed all of the necessary characteristics of a "company" as defined in the Corporate Securities Act. It had a capital stock of $50,000, divided into 5,000 units of the par value of $100 each, which were sold in blocks of 30 for $300, and were exchangeable on the basis of one unit for 10 shares of the capital stock of the Oliver Electric Corporation of Delaware. The mathematics of the proposed transfer were not carefully worked out by appellant. According to his contract, he proposed to set aside only 5,000 shares of the corporate stock with which to effect the exchange when 50,000 shares would have been necessary. This, however, only changes the amount to be received by the subscribers, and not the general plan of operation which must control. If a unit issued by an individual represents a division of the assets of a business carried on for profit, or in the distribution thereof, or the right to participate in the profits, earnings, or income derived from such assets, it is a security under the definition of subdivision 8, section 2, of the Corporate Securities Act as amended. In re Girard, 186 Cal. 718, 200 P. 593. "While the term 'capital stock' is often used in the sense of the amount derived from the issuance of shares in a corporation, still its significance is by no means limited to that definition. On the contrary, it has been defined to be 'money invested in business operations, whether that business is conducted by a single individual, partnership, corporation, or a government.' 9 C. J., p. 1280. It has been said to be 'the amount fixed upon by the partners or associates as their stake in the concern' (Hightower v. Thornton, 8 Ga. 486, 52 Am. Dec. 412); also as the fund or property belonging to a firm or corporation and used to carry on its business (Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. 56, 23 L. Ed. 220)." People v. Main, 75 Cal. App. 471, 242 P. 1078, 1081.

[9] Under his second assignment of error appellant complains of the introduction in evidence of an exemplified copy of the articles of incorporation of the Oliver Electric Power Corporation, a Nevada corporation. Articles of incorporation were filed in Nevada on July 9, 1928. The record does not show that appellant had any direct connection with the organization of this company. The Powell contract was headed "Memorandum of Agreement for the promotion of the Oliver Electric Power Corporation of California or State of Delaware," and provided for the organization of the corporation. Some time after July 10, 1928, Powell received a certificate of stock in the Nevada corporation through the mail. The same general state of facts apply to the Trump and Cessna cases, except that under the Mrs. Trump contract the corporation was to be organized under the laws of the state of Delaware. The name of the corporation organized was identical with the one set forth in the contracts except the state of its domicile, and its purpose and powers were the same. Appellant promised the three purchasers stock in the Oliver Electric Power Corporation of either California or Delaware, and they received stock in the Oliver Electric Power Corporation, a Nevada company. We believe that the objection of appellant went more to the weight and sufficiency of the evidence than to its admissibility, and that the trial court properly submitted the same to the jury.

The instructions given by the trial court complained of by appellant correctly paraphrased the sections of the Corporate Securities Act quoted in this opinion. The instructions of the trial judge and his rulings on questions of law during the trial were fair to the defendant, and we can find no error in them.

[10] Appellant contends that the verdicts of not guilty under counts 2, 5 and 9 of the information are inconsistent with the verdicts of guilty on counts 1 and 3, 4 and 6 and 8 and 10 of the information. Counts 2, 5, and 9, charged appellant with selling and issuing a security of the Oliver Electric Power Corporation to Powell, Cessna, and Trump, respectively, while, as we have seen, counts 1, 4, and 8 of the information charge him with selling and issuing subscription agreements to the same persons, and counts 3, 6, and 10 with collecting money therefor. In this case, if any corporate security was sold by appellant, it was the stock of the proposed corporation.

Where a promoter conceives a plan to obtain money from others for his own use in advertising the merits of patents secured by him, in organizing a corporation to put them into operation in a single state, and in interesting the public in the purchase of the corporate stock, and issues a contract over his own signature proposing to do these things, the contract itself forms a security of his own issue, even though it offers to the subscriber shares of stock in the corporation to be organized, as it goes beyond the mere sale of stock in the proposed corporation. In the sale of corporate stock the original price goes, or is supposed to go, into the treasury of the corporation, less permitted expenses of sale. In the instant case the money went into the pockets of the promoter, not only to defray the expenses of the organization of the corporation, but to make possible the very marketing of his patent rights, not only in California, where the corporation was presumed to operate, but in any other place that might be chosen by him. If the promotion had been successful and the invention of practical value, the profits from the sale of the patent rights or the licensing of their use in any place outside of the state of California would have gone to appellant in their entirety. No subscriber would have had any claim thereon. The fact that the subscriber was to receive shares of stock of the corporation does not make the transaction one of the mere sale of the corporate stock which was but one of its incidents. The security sold was one of the issue of appellant himself and not of the Oliver Electric Power Corporation. Such being the case, the verdict of not guilty of the charge of the sale of the corporate security is not inconsistent with the verdict of guilty of the sale of the security issued by appellant. People v. Day, 199 Cal. 78, 248 P. 250; People v. Vanderbilt, 199 Cal. 461, 249 P. 867.

[11-13] Appellant urges with great earnestness that counts 1, 4, and 8 of the information charge three several sales of securities, and that counts 3, 6, and 10 charge collection of money from each respective purchaser at the time and place of the sale, and therefore constitute a part and parcel of the one transaction; that therefore each sale, and the collection of money therefor, constituted but one offense, for which but one penalty could be inflicted. He cites the case of People v. Clement (Cal. Sup.) 280 P. 681, decided on September 14, 1929, in support of this contention.

In the case of People v. Clement, supra, the information contained two counts, which the Supreme Court held were based upon but one offense. The jury returned separate verdicts of guilty on both counts, and the trial court sentenced the defendant on both. The Supreme Court affirmed the judgment on one count, and reversed on the other. The vice is not the charging of the offense in two counts, but in judgment and sentence on both, thereby inflicting double punishment for one offense. In the case before us the trial court suspended the pronouncement of judgment on all five counts and imposed sentence in one. In each case the two offenses charged relate to the same transaction, and neither is inconsistent or repugnant to the other. Should the appellant violate his probation, and be brought back into court for sentence, we will assume that the trial judge will follow the doctrine of People v. Clement, if it applies to this case. Appellant has suffered no injury from the returning of verdicts on the various counts of the information (People v. Vanderbilt, supra). We cannot anticipate error on the part of the court below.

Judgment affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. SEYMOUR et al. (Civ. 3908.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 29, 1929.

As Modified, on Denial of Rehearing Dec. 28, 1929.

1. Trial ⇨12(1)—Placing cause on short cause calendar is within discretion of trial court.

Where, in civil action, trial by jury is not demanded, and taking of testimony and argument will not exceed one hour, placing cause on short cause calendar is within discretion of trial court.

2. Trial ⇨106—Time allowed for presenting case is within discretion of trial court.

Time allowed party to present evidence and argument is within discretion of trial court.

terest in said trust, which negotiations were, with consent of the trustee, consummated by the formal assignment of respondents' beneficial interest in said trust to Wheat, and was by him accepted in writing. When the note above referred to, and which was secured by the property acquired by Wheat, became due, he paid it; but the bank, instead of satisfying such note, indorsed the same without recourse and delivered it to Wheat, who thereupon, retaining the interest in the trust, transferred the note to appellant, and an action was commenced thereon to recover the amount due under said note. The trial court held that, the note having been paid, appellant, who was the plaintiff below, was entitled to nothing, and judgment was given for defendant.

[1, 2] Appellant claims that he did not have sufficient time to present his case before the trial court, for over his objection this cause was placed upon the short cause calendar, as the same is designated under the rules of the superior court for Los Angeles county, to which calendar any civil action in which a trial by jury is not demanded, and in which the taking of testimony and argument will not exceed one hour, may be assigned. The trial consumed more than one hour for the testimony and argument, but an examination of the record shows that appellant was accorded sufficient time to present his evidence, and that he did present the facts in the case. Such matters as are here complained of are within the discretion of the trial court. No abuse of discretion is shown, and the objection is without merit.

From the foregoing it appears that the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Action by Abram C. Denman, Jr., against the City of Pasadena and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Bertrand J. Wellman, of Los Angeles, and Geo. W. Padgham, of Pasadena, for appellant.

Harry M. Ticknor and R. Maxwell, both of Pasadena, and John Perry Wood and Paul Sandmeyer, both of Los Angeles, for respondent Tournament of Roses Association.

Harold P. Huls, City Atty., of Pasadena, for respondent city of Pasadena.

NOURSE, J. The plaintiff sued for damages for personal injuries resulting from the collapse of a temporary wooden "grand stand" erected for the convenience of spectators at festivities known as the "Tournament of Roses," held in the city of Pasadena. Demurrers to the complaint were sustained without leave to amend. A motion for leave to amend was later denied, and judgment was entered for the defendants. The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment upon a typewritten transcript.

The plaintiff sued the city of Pasadena, its "board of directors," the city manager, chief of police, and the chief inspector, the Tournament of Roses Association, a corporation, its directors, and all members of the association, Paul F. Mahoney, who constructed the grand stand under permit of the city authorities, and E. H. Lockwood, the owner of the land upon which the grand stand was erected and maintained. The defendant city officials (other than the chief inspector) joined with the city of Pasadena in a demurrer to the complaint. The directors and members of the Tournament of Roses Association joined with the corporation in a demurrer to the complaint. The other defendants named in the complaint do not appear to have been served with process, and are out of the case so far as this appeal is concerned.

The two demurrers mentioned came on for hearing at the same time, and both were sustained without leave to amend. The plaintiff then moved for leave to file an amended complaint, and this motion was denied. The respondents argue that on this appeal we may not consider the substance of the proposed amended complaint, because the appellant has failed to follow the settled rule of section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure, requiring the printing of such portions of the typewritten record as are desired to be called to the attention of the court.

[1] When the appeal is from a judgment following an order sustaining a demurrer without leave to amend, and the appellant urges as one of his grounds that the trial court abused its discretion in denying leave to amend, it is incumbent on the appellant to show error in that regard. Here the appellant, without claiming or making any showing of an abuse of discretion, merely argues that the trial court "should have" granted leave to amend. But with no record to support the argument we cannot say that error was committed. Stewart v. Douglass, 148 Cal. 511, 512, 83 P. 699; Philbrook v. Randall, 195 Cal. 95, 104, 231 P. 739; Duvall v. White, 46 Cal. App. 305, 307, 189 P. 324; Farber v. Greenberg (Cal. App.) 277 P. 534, 538.

But, aside from the absence of affirmative evidence of error in this respect, we are unable to perceive how the appellant could amend his complaint to state a cause of action against any of these respondents, if the facts alleged in his complaint be true. This seems to be conceded by the appellant in his reply brief, wherein he states that the proposed amendment complaint was no different than the original, "except as to a more correct statement therein of the defendant city's financial interests." Thus as to all defendants other than the city of Pasadena the issues here are confined to the propriety of the order sustaining their demurrer to the original complaint. The virtue of the proposed amendment as to the city alone can be considered more logically in the discussion of the pleadings in relation to that defendant.

[2] The demurrer of the Tournament of Roses Association, and of the members thereof who joined with the corporation, was properly sustained without leave to amend. The complaint plainly fails to state a cause of action against any of them, and, assuming, as we must do, that the facts alleged therein are true, no cause could be pleaded by amendment. The facts alleged are that the grand stand was erected by a private individual upon private property with the consent of the property owner. The Tournament Association had nothing to do with the use of this private property, nor with the construction, maintenance, or operation of the grand stand. It had no supervision over the sale of seats in the grand stand, no direction or control over the number of people permitted to occupy it, and no participation in the profits from seat sales.

Briefly, the appellant sought to fix liability for his injuries on these respondents by the allegations that they had staged the tournament festival; that through their efforts a large number of people were invited to and did come into the city to view the spectacle and to attend a football contest, which was conducted in a stadium constructed by the association for that purpose; that the financial interest of these respondents in the tournament was in the large profit they received from this contest; that prior to the football game, and as an inducement to people to purchase tickets therefor, these respondents conducted a spectacular parade through certain designated streets of the city; that, by occupying the entire width of these streets for the purposes of this parade, these respondents forced and "invited" spectators to purchase tickets for seats on the viewing grand stands; and that these respondents knew or "should have known" that this particular grand stand was dangerous, a public nuisance, and a menace to the lives and safety of those who occupied it.

[3] Aside from the allegations of knowledge, or means of knowledge, of the unsafe condition of this particular grand stand, every other allegation of the complaint relating to these respondents pleads this and nothing more—a situation whereby these respondents made it possible for the appellant to put himself in a position in which, wholly through the act of another, he was injured. Thus the complaint merely pleads facts which would tend to charge these respondents with the remote cause of appellant's injuries, while also pleading facts which show beyond doubt that another's acts were the sole proximate cause of such injuries. The rule is settled that, "if injury has resulted in consequence of a certain unlawful act or omission, but only through or by means of some intervening cause, from which last cause the injury followed as a direct and immediate consequence, the law will refer the damage to the last or proximate cause, and refuse to trace it to that which was more remote." Cooley on Torts (2d Ed.) p. 73, quoted in Trice v. Southern Pacific Co., 174 Cal. 89, 96, 161 P. 1144.

[4, 5] The reason for such a rule is well illustrated by the efforts of appellant to attach liability upon these respondents. Their "act of negligence" was in inviting a large concourse of people into the city and in leading a parade along a city street in front of the lot on which the grand stand was erected. But if, without having any supervision or control over the grand stand, they are to be held responsible for any injuries caused by the negligence of the owners thereof, they would likewise be liable for all injuries arising out of the negligence of all railroads and other public conveyances bringing people into the city on this same "invitation." Likewise it is possible that people stood upon the housetops of private dwellings, and that many hung out of private windows to see the spectacle. Some boys might have climbed trees or telephone poles to get a better view. Would there be any reason in a contention that these respondents would be liable for injuries resulting under such circumstances?

In Wright v. City of Pasadena (U. S. Dist. Court, Aug. 19, 1929) 36 F.(2d) —, Judge McCormick, in sustaining a demurrer to a complaint identical with the proposed amendment filed herein, held that it failed to allege any act or acts of the association which operated to cause the injuries complained of as a proximate cause, and that "it appears to the court that every merchant of Pasadena who financially contributed to the success of the Tournament of Roses, and every property owner thereof who shared in the emoluments of such event, would be liable to plaintiff for damages if the theory of liability as set forth in the amended complaint were tenable." We might add, what is a matter of common knowledge, that public fairs, festivals, and celebrations have been held in this country since the days of the first Indian war dance; that many of these affairs have been conducted for profit, while many (as the complaint alleges was the case here) have been conducted to advertise or "boost" a particular locality. Likewise, football games have been held for the financial profit of the management and as a means of education and training of the participants, and these have attracted large crowds of people. It is also a matter of common knowledge that in many of these events accidents have occurred to the guests while either going to or returning from the place of amusement. If those managing such events are legally liable for personal injuries to their guests, which are received on private property over which the management has no control, and which are the result of the negligence of private individuals over whom the management has no supervision or control, we would expect to find some judicial expression recognizing such liability.

[6] As appellant has failed to cite any decision in support of his theory, and as we have found none, we may assume that the point should be decided on the general principle that liability rests on negligence, that negligence is "the want of such care as a person of ordinary prudence would exercise under the circumstances of the case" (19 Cal. Jur. p. 548), and that a person of ordinary prudence under these circumstances would not assume the burden of controlling the activities of every property owner in the locality, nor would he hold himself out as an insurer of the safety of all visitors while engaged in their private amusements. Therefore, when through a long period of years a particular mode of conduct has been followed as the proper and reasonable mode for a prudent man to follow under particular circumstances, one cannot be charged with negligence in following that mode of conduct alone. The proper conduct of "a person of ordinary prudence" may thus be established by long-approved practice and custom, and this becomes just as potent as a standard of conduct prescribed by law. Manifestly a complaint which merely alleges that a defendant had done the very acts which the law prescribes he must do under the circumstances fails therein to charge negligence on his part. And since "the test of negligence with respect to instrumentalities, methods, etc., is the ordinary usage and custom of mankind" (20 R. C. L. p. 27), a complaint which discloses that the parties merely followed such recognized usage and custom, and which does not plead any departure therefrom, or any other act or omission which a prudent person would not have done or omitted under the same circumstances, does not state a cause of action for negligence. The rule of law is succinctly stated in Tallman v. Nelson, 141 Mo. App. 478, 125 S. W. 1181, 1183, as follows: "If one does what the great body of other prudent men do, in a like situation, he is not negligent." And in Brands v. St. Louis Car Co., 213 Mo. 698, 112 S. W. 511, 514, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 701, it is said: "No jury can be permitted to say that the usual and ordinary way commonly adopted by those in the same business is a negligent way for which liability shall be imposed."

[7, 8] But it is argued that, as these respondents knew "or should have known" that this particular grand stand was unsafe, they come within the rule of Indianapolis St. Car Co. v. Dawson, 31 Ind. App. 605, 68 N. E. 909. In that case the street car company was held liable for injuries to a colored man and woman whom they had conveyed to a park where they were assaulted by whites. Liability was attached to the car company, because it knew that there was an intense feeling against colored people at the park, but failed to impart this information to its passengers. This rule simply goes back to the general principles which we have been discussing. An ordinarily prudent person would not invite, urge, or carry another into a known place of danger without warning. But the difficulty with the complaint in this respect is that it is so inconsistent and contradictory in its allegations that it does not come within the rule. To say that the defendant knew this grand stand was unsafe is more or less a conclusion of the pleader; but to say in the same sentence that he "should have known" it is to say that he did not know.

Further inconsistencies appear from the allegations of specific facts which contradict this general allegation of knowledge. Thus it is alleged that this grand stand was erected, maintained, and controlled by a private individual on private property for "his own pecuniary benefit and profit," pursuant to license therefor by the municipal government, and subjected to inspection as to its safety by the proper public officials. To plead generally, in face of these specific facts, that these respondents should have known that this grand stand was unsafe, compels us to presume, contrary to the legal presumptions found in the Code, that these public duties were not performed, and that the public officials were guilty of fraud. But "where a conclusion is alleged, and also the special facts from which the conclusion is drawn, if the special facts are inconsistent with and do not support the conclusion, the former control, and the sufficiency of the complaint is to be determined from the special facts pleaded." Little v. Union Oil Co. of Cal., 73 Cal. App. 612, 619, 238 P. 1066, 1068, where many cases are cited.

[9] It is argued that the averment that "the said defendants" caused the grand stand to be constructed and to remain in a dangerous condition is broad enough to include the Tournament Association, its officers and members. But this allegation follows the paragraphs which are definitely tied down to the city of Pasadena and its officers, and the expression "said defendants" has no reference to the association, its officers, or members. Furthermore, this general averment is in direct conflict with the pleading that the defendant Lockwood, "caused" this particular grand stand to be erected "for his own pecuniary benefit and profit, and had the right and authority to control the construction, use, and seating capacity thereof." Here again the averment of specific facts must control over the general conclusions of the pleader. Taking these allegations together, it is apparent that the pleader means that the association, by staging the festival and inviting guests to witness the parade, offered an inducement to Lockwood to obtain pecuniary profit by constructing the grand stand, but that the latter did this for his own benefit, and had sole supervision and control over it. Here again these respondents are merely charged with the remote cause of the injury to appellant, while the proximate cause is definitely laid to others, over whom these respondents had no control.

Appellant cites a large number of cases, generally referred to in the briefs as the "Bathing Beach" and "Amusement Park" cases, holding that those conducting such places of amusement are liable for injuries to patrons on the premises. Some of these cases hold that the owner is liable where the injury is the result of the negligence of a concessionaire. It would serve no purpose to refer to these cases, other than to say that without exception they place liability on the party who had the supervision and control of the premises, and upon whom rested the legal duty to keep the premises in a safe condition. Thus, in Johnstone v. Panama-Pacific I. E. Co., 187 Cal. 323, 329, 202 P. 34, 36, it is said "there was a duty imposed upon respondent [Exposition Company] to use ordinary care to keep its grounds, including the thoroughfares, in a safe condition for its invitees." In that case the exposition company had granted a concession to another to rent electric vehicles to visitors, to be operated by the party renting them throughout the exposition grounds. The plaintiff, while walking along one of the paths maintained in the grounds by the exposition company for pedestrians, was injured by being struck by another visitor while operating one of these electric vehicles. The ruling followed the great weight of authority—that the owner was responsible for the premises under its control.

This rule is clearly stated in Thornton v. Main State Agr. Soc., 97 Me. 108, 53 A. 979, 981, 94 Am. St. Rep. 488, 493, where it was said: "Therefore, having invited the public to its fair, it was the duty of the defendant to use reasonable care to keep its grounds, and the usual approaches to them, so far as the approaches were under its control, in a safe condition—safe for all who were invited." The bathing beach cases follow the same principle. Even where the injury occurred in the public water of the ocean it was held that the proprietor of the beach resort was bound to exercise reasonable care for the safety of those he invited to patronize his resort. But none of the cases cited supports the theory of appellant that the owner or proprietor is liable for injuries arising beyond the premises and on private property over which another has full supervision and control.

What has been said concerning the allegations relating to the Tournament Association applies equally to its directors and members, and the demurrer on their behalf was properly sustained.

The demurrer of the city of Pasadena involves a consideration of the capacity in which it was acting at the time of the injury. Appellant takes the position that the city was financially interested in the tournament, and hence was acting in a proprietary capacity. The argument is that the proprietary capacity of the city is disclosed in the averments of the complaint that the city received a large annual profit from pay features of the festival, including the football game, and that the tournament parade and the football game were held "for the immediate financial benefit and profit of said defendant city of Pasadena's citizenry and tradespeople, * * * and for the future and ultimate pecuniary profit of its landholding and real estate property owning class." But it is also alleged that said city issued permits for the building of grand stands to seat the guests, and "supervised, inspected, and approved the security, safety and carrying capacity of said grand stands." We may concede that the complaint is sufficient to charge the city with acting in a proprietary capacity in conducting the football game and other pay features of the festival, but so far the city is merely charged with the remote cause of appellant's injuries—furnishing the occasion whereby the appellant found himself in the city on the day of the injury. The proximate cause of these injuries—the collapse of the grand stand—is alleged to have been due to the city's employment of unskillful and incompetent inspectors.

[10] Manifestly the granting of a permit to construct a grand stand on private property and the supervision and inspection of its construction is a governmental function. That a municipality is not liable for the carelessness of its officers or employees under such conditions is settled by the authorities. Wickstrom v. City of Laramie, 37 Wyo. 389, 262 P. 22, 23; Miller v. City of Palo Alto (Cal. Sup.) 280 P. 108.

[11] Through the maze of inconsistencies and contradictions in the complaint the real charge against the municipality is that, in permitting the Tournament Association to conduct its parade along the public streets, it indirectly invited the pedestrians to purchase seats in the grand stand, the better to view the spectacle. The parade is said to be the inducement for the spectators to enter the stadium and purchase tickets for the football game. In the sale of these tickets the city is said to have had a direct financial interest. The positive allegations that the grand stand which collapsed was erected and maintained for the pecuniary profit and benefit of the defendant Lockwood, who had the control over its construction and use, negatives the general innuendoes that the city had some part in the construction and use of it.

[12] Thus, so far as the city is sought to be charged with any liability for the injuries in its proprietary capacity, the complaint pleads the most remote cause that might be imagined. If the city is liable under such conditions, then the doctrine of proximate cause becomes a mere shadow. It might as well be said that one holding a ticket to this football game and injured while traveling on the public highway, hundreds of miles from the place of the contest, could hold the city liable because he had been induced to travel by the city's advertisement of its New Year's climate.

In answer to the city's demurrer, the appellant again cites a number of "Bathing Beach" and "Amusement Park" cases. In the former the owner of the resort is held liable for injuries to his guests, received while bathing in the waters adjoining the resort. The rule of these cases is that, because the patrons paid for the privilege of bathing in the adjoining waters, the proprietor owed them the duty of keeping the waters reasonably safe, or of providing life guards or other means of protecting the patrons from injury.

The rule of the amusement park cases is stated in Stickel v. Riverview, etc., Park Co., 250 Ill. 452, 95 N. E. 445, 446, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 659, where it is said: "In amusement places where space is granted for conducting attractions * * * there is unanimity of authority that the owner assumes an obligation that the devices and attractions operated by the concessioners are reasonably safe for the purposes for which the public is invited to use them." In each group of cases there is authority holding that the owner of private property is liable for injuries received on public property adjoining when the use of such public property is a necessary incident to the use of the private property. But none of the cases hold the converse of this—that the public as the owner of the public property is liable for injuries received on private property, over the use of which the public had no control.

It is argued that the rose festival was a joint enterprise, and that, because the city expected some profit from the football game, it must be held to have been jointly interested with Lockwood and Mahoney in this grand stand. The answer to the argument is that the specific allegations are that the city did not have any such interest. If the general allegations of the complaint are true, all "florists, hostleries, theaters, sweet shops, cafes, food venders, drink dispensers, * * * vacant lot owners, * * * and real property owning class" would be jointly interested in the enterprise because it is alleged the festival was held for their "immediate financial benefit and profit." But, if the city were held liable for every act of negligence of its citizens under such circumstances, then it would become an insurer of the safety of the individual far beyond anything contemplated in its incorporation.

[13] As to the city officials and employees who are joined as parties defendant, the complaint does not pretend to state any cause of action against them. There is not a word in appellant's briefs defending his action in joining them, and we may therefore treat the point as having been abandoned, because the duty is on appellant to show that error has been committed. Etienne v. Kendall, 202 Cal. 251, 257, 259 P. 752.

Ralph West was convicted of forgery and grand theft, and he appeals. Affirmed.

E. L. Johnson, of San Diego, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

YORK, J. Appellant was charged by an information filed by the district attorney of San Diego county with the crimes of grand theft and forgery, and also with having suffered a prior conviction in the state of Ohio. Appellant admitted the prior conviction, and after trial by jury was found guilty of the crimes of forgery and grand theft, as charged in the information. From the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial, this appeal is taken by the appellant.

There was sufficient evidence to justify the jury in bringing in its verdict, but the sole questions are whether the court erred in denying defendant's application for a continuance, and whether certain errors were committed by reason of the fact that the defendant appeared as his own counsel at the time of his trial. When a continuance was asked the first time, his then attorney withdrew from the case, stating that he had been dismissed. The court thereupon appointed another attorney as appellant's counsel, and continued the case to the next day. On the next day the attorney so appointed withdrew, saying that the defendant desired him to do so. Appellant then stated that he wished to employ another attorney, Mr. Ludwig, and also stated that Mr. Ludwig would consent to defend him in the matter, but that a continuance was necessary, in order that he might familiarize himself with the case. The court denied the application for continuance, and the trial proceeded forthwith; the defendant acting as his own attorney.

Upon an examination of the entire case, we cannot say that the defendant suffered any prejudicial injury by reason of any ruling of the trial court. No objections were made having relation to certain points that appellant is attempting to raise at this time through his attorney, who is now appearing for him, and we cannot pass upon the objections made herein by reason of the fact that the record is not in such condition, because of appellant's failure to object at the time of the hearing, that such matters can now be considered by this court.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

RICHARDS, J. The petitioner applied for and was granted a writ of review herein upon its application therefor, wherein it sought to have reviewed and annulled a decision and award of the Industrial Accident Commission wherein it finally granted to one Pete Sertok, an employee, a disability award. The facts upon which the application of the petitioner is predicated are not disputed and may be briefly summarized as follows: Pete Sertok had been in the employ of the petitioner herein for a number of years prior to his illness and application for an award. In July, 1927, he became ill with a disorder which was either due to a rheumatic fever or which was the result of lead poisoning received in and as a consequence of his employment. He lingered along in the employ of the petitioner, doing different and easy jobs until the month of March, 1928, when, upon a physician's report as to his condition, he was obliged to cease work. Thereafter and within the statutory time he filed with the commission his claim for compensation, alleging that he was suffering from lead poisoning, which, it is admitted, was an industrial disorder. A hearing was held, as a result of which the commission on June 22, 1928, made its original findings and decision, wherein it found that the status of employer and employee existed, but that the evidence presented before it was "insufficient to establish that the employee received an injury arising out of and in the course of said employment, or that the disability complained of was caused by said employment." It was therefore ordered that the applicant take nothing. Thereafter and on July 12, 1928, the employee filed a petition for rehearing, based upon certain new and further medical examinations and reports which were attached to his petition. On August 11, 1928, this petition for rehearing was denied by the commission. On August 25, 1928, the employee filed a further petition before the commission to reopen the case and to set aside not only the original award on June 22, 1928, but also the order denying a rehearing, made on August 11, 1928, basing his application upon the alleged inadvertence and mistake of the commission in denying his said petition for a rehearing, under the mistaken belief that the medical department of the commission had reviewed and rendered an opinion on the new medical reports attached to the petition for rehearing adverse to the petitioner; whereas in truth and fact no opinion of the medical department based upon this new evidence had been up to that time filed. The commission, upon inquiry, discovered that the applicant was correct in the foregoing regard and that the opinion of its medical department, which was for the first time filed upon August 30, 1928, was favorable to the petitioner. Thereupon and on September 6, 1928, a hearing was held before the commission, all parties being present, at which Commissioner Trowbridge stated the conclusion of the commission to the effect that the petition for rehearing had been denied upon the mistaken impression that a report of its medical department had theretofore been filed. Thereupon, and upon a further investigation confirming that situation, the commission on October 24, 1928, made its order reopening the case, which order was made within the period during which the applicant might otherwise have applied for a writ of review, and on the latter date the report of the medical department having been considered by it, the commission made its findings and award granting to the employee compensation for an occupational disease or injury, to wit, lead poisoning sustained by him in the course of his employment. On November 10, 1928, the petitioner herein filed a petition for rehearing with the commission, alleging lack of due process of law, in that it had been given no opportunity to cross-examine the medical referee, which petition the commission found it necessary to grant for the reason stated, and on December 19, 1928, a further hearing was held wherein, all parties being present, the medical referee was cross-examined and other medical testimony was adduced by the employer. On January 11, 1929, the commission filed its final decision, adopting, with certain amendments, its findings of fact and award made and entered on October 24, 1928, but otherwise confirming its said decision and award in the applicant's favor. A petition for rehearing being denied, the petitioner herein on February 9, 1929, first appealed to the District Court of Appeal, First Appellate District, Division 1, for a writ of review, which application was denied without an opinion, and after petition for rehearing therein the petitioner applied for and was granted a hearing in this court, and the matter being thereafter argued herein was submitted for decision.

The fundamental error of the petitioner herein consists in its assertion that the Industrial Accident Commission by its first decision adverse to the applicant, based upon the ground that the evidence thus far presented before it was insufficient to show that the employee was suffering from an occupational disease, had thereby divested itself of jurisdiction over the applicant's case and that it was therefore without power either to entertain a petition of said applicant for a rehearing or to further reopen the matter, under the provisions of section 20(d) of the Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 850), and that the only remedy of the applicant after this first decision by the commission was that of an application for a writ of review.

The commission upon its first hearing found that the relation of employer and employee existed; that the employment was such as came within the beneficial provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended); that the disorder of the employee was one which had arisen during the course of his employment. The applicant alleged his illness to have been caused by lead poisoning, which was admittedly an industrial disorder. Upon the face of the employee's application, therefore, a perfect case for the exercising of the jurisdiction of the commission attached, under the terms of section 55(a) of the Workmen's Compensation Act. It is true that upon such first hearing the commission found that the evidence which the applicant had thus far introduced was insufficient to show that he was suffering from a compensable injury. Its finding to this effect and its decision based thereon that the applicant was not entitled to an award were thus strictly within the exercise of the commission's jurisdiction. Having made such decision against the applicant, he was entitled under the express terms of the act to apply for a rehearing and by so doing to enable the commission upon the evidence already adduced to change its ruling, or to so far eke out the insufficiency of his former showing by new and additional proofs to make out a sufficient case for a decision in his favor. The applicant tendered such proofs, but through a misapprehension as to the state of the record before it the commission failed to consider these, and consequently denied the petition for a rehearing. Had the applicant upon such denial presented another petition for rehearing, the case of Crowe Glass Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 84 Cal. App. 287, 258 P. 130, upon which the petitioner herein relies, would doubtless have had application to the case. The applicant, however, did not so apply; but, as the record discloses, he did make timely application to the commission for an order vacating and setting aside its order denying his petition for a rehearing based expressly upon the provisions of section 20(d) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, under the terms of which the commission is given a continuing jurisdiction "over all its orders, decisions and awards made and entered under the provisions of sections six to thirty-one, inclusive, of this act and may at any time, upon notice, and after opportunity to be heard is given to the parties in interest, rescind, alter or amend any such order, decision or award made by it upon good cause appearing therefor," and which continuing jurisdiction extends over a period of 245 weeks from the date of the injury. In the case of Bartlett Hayward Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 203 Cal. 522, 265 P. 195, the scope and intent of the foregoing provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act were given very full and careful consideration, especially with reference to what, under the terms of said section, would constitute such "good cause" as would call in to exercise the powers of the commission thereunder, and it was therein held that the mistake or inadvertence of the commission in giving an injured workman a certain rating, when as a matter of law upon the undisputed facts he was entitled to another and better rating in determining his permanent disability, would constitute "good cause" for the exercise of the continuing jurisdiction of the commission. If a mistake or inadvertence of this character on the part of the commission would suffice to furnish good cause for this exercise of its extended jurisdiction, it would seem to follow inevitably that the mistake and inadvertence of the commission, in overlooking the fact that the applicant upon his petition for rehearing had presented certain cogent evidence upon which the medical department of the commission had not as yet but was about to render a favorable report, would be amply sufficient to justify the commission in setting aside its order denying the petition for rehearing based solely upon its aforesaid misapprehension as to the state of the record before it. Brunski v. Industrial Accident Commission, 203 Cal. 761, 265 P. 918; United States & F. G. v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. Sup.) 266 P. 805; Kennedy v. Industrial Accident Commission, 50 Cal. App. 184, 195 P. 267; Colorado F. & I. Co. v. Industrial Comm., 85 Colo. 237, 275 P. 910; Southern Mining Co. v. Collins, 222 Ky. 388, 300 S. W. 896; Hanson v. No. Dakota W. C. Bureau, 56 N. D. 525, 218 N. W. 215. We therefore hold that the commission was justified in the exercise of its aforesaid continuing jurisdiction in setting aside its order denying the applicant's petition for a rehearing, and was also justified upon such new and further hearing in making its order based upon the report of its medical department favorable to the applicant granting him the award which the petitioner herein, after a vain attempt to seek a further hearing before the commission, seeks to have this court set aside.

The foregoing consideration answers, we think, every insistence made by the petitioner herein upon its application for a writ of review, and it therefore follows that the award of the commission should be and is hereby affirmed, and that the petition and order for a writ of review herein should be and the same are hereby discharged.

BERGHAUSER v. GOLDEN STATE ORCHARDS (MOORE, Intervener).
(Sac. 4302.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 5, 1929.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 907(3)—Where appeal is presented on judgment roll alone, finding of trial court must be taken as supported.

Finding of trial court must be taken as supported, where case is presented on appeal on judgment roll alone.

2. Parties $\S$ 40(5)—In action on notes wherein plaintiff attached moneys and credits due defendant in hands of third person, one claiming such credits under assignment from defendant could intervene (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 387).

In action on notes in which plaintiff sought to attach moneys and credits due defendant in possession of third party, one claiming such moneys and credits under assignment from defendant had right to intervene to assert claim to property attached under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 387, though claimant had no interest in notes sued on.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Claude F. Purkitt, Judge.

Action by J. H. Berghauser against the Golden State Orchards, in which a writ of attachment was issued, and Caroline Moore intervened. From a judgment for intervener, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

For opinion of District Court of Appeal, see 279 P. 463.

Ware & Ware, of Chica, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. After a careful reconsideration of this cause, particularly in the light of the authorities especially urged by appellant, we find ourselves wholly in accord with, and are pleased to adopt as the opinion of this court in bank herein, the following opinion written by Mr. Justice Plummer of the Third Appellate District, supplemented, however, by a more extended review of the authority upon which it is based:

[1] This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover judgment against the defendant, Golden State Orchards, a corporation, upon two promissory notes. Upon the filing of the complaint a writ of attachment was issued, by virtue of which the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco was commanded to attach all moneys and credits due to the defendant, owing from and in the possession of the California Packing Corporation. The defendant Golden State Orchards, a corporation, had sold and delivered to the California Packing Corporation a large quantity of dried prunes, etc., and at the time of the levy of the attachment the California Packing Corporation had not paid the amount of the purchase price of said dried fruit. The record further shows that, after the sale of said prunes and other fruits by the defendant to the California Packing Corporation, and before the beginning of this action and the service of the writ of attachment herein referred to, the defendant had sold and transferred to the intervener its claim against the California Packing Corporation for the moneys due and unpaid on account of the purchase price of said fruit. After the beginning of the action by the plaintiff and the issuance and service of the writ of attachment as just stated, the intervener, Caroline Moore, sought and obtained from the court permission to intervene and set up her claim and right to the money and credits in the possession of the said California Packing Corporation. The court found in favor of the intervener to the extent of her claim, to wit, that said intervener was the owner of all and singular the amount of money owing by the said California Packing Corporation on account of its purchase of dried fruits from the defendant Golden State Orchards Corporation, and that the intervener was entitled to have paid to her the whole amount of said moneys. The plaintiff demurred to the complaint in intervention, and, upon his demurrer being overruled, filed an answer to the complaint in intervention, and raised the question that the assignment had been made to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors. The court found against this contention, and, as the cause is here upon the judgment roll alone, the finding must be taken as supported.

[2] Upon this appeal, the appellant contends that, under the provisions of section 387 of the Code of Civil Procedure, Caroline Moore had no legal right to intervene, and that the court erred in permitting her so to do. In support of this contention, a number of cases bearing upon the right of intervention are cited to the point that the intervener must have some interest in that which is involved in the litigation, and, as the suit is upon two promissory notes, the promissory notes only are involved in this action. We do not need to review the cases cited, for the simple reason that they are not really in point in this controversy. The question presented for us to decide upon this appeal may be stated as follows: Has the claimant to property which has been attached in an action between other parties to recover upon an indebtedness in which such claimant has no interest a right to intervene in defense of his own claim of ownership to the property attached? Or, to state the question as presented by the record in this case—the plaintiff has sued upon two promissory notes executed by the defendant, and has attached moneys and credits in the possession of a third person, claimed by the intervener. Under such circumstances, is intervention permissible, and can the alleged owner of such credits be permitted to come in and set up such ownership? That a claimant to property attached under such circumstances has a right to intervention is no longer an open question in this state. Carter v. Garetson, 56 Cal. App. 241, 204 P. 1090; Bonfiglio v. Bonfiglio, 203 Cal. 409, 264 P. 747; Dennis v. Kolm, 131 Cal. 91, 63 P. 141. It would serve no useful purpose to incumber the record with a review of the cases just cited. We may, however, state that the question raised upon this appeal as to whether an intervention lies under the circumstances involved herein is fully covered and completely answered in the case of Carter v. Garetson, supra. The opinion in that case cites a number of authorities from other states supporting the same rule, and the cases just cited are conclusive of the question raised upon this appeal.

Appellant complains of failure of the court to recognize the distinction sought to be preserved by the parallel line of decisions (Horn v. Volcano Water Co., 13 Cal. 62, 73 Am. Dec. 569; Davis v. Eppinger, 18 Cal. 379, 79 Am. Dec. 184; Drumhiller v. Wright, 64 Cal. App. 498, 222 P. 166; Elliott v. Superior Court, 168 Cal. 727, 145 P. 101; and Isaacs v. Jones, 121 Cal. 257, 53 P. 793, 1101), which he contends announce an opposite rule to that above set forth, under which the right of this claimant to intervene should be denied. Said distinction is recognized, the doctrine announced by said cases is commented upon at length and properly distinguished in Carter v. Garetson, supra. We therefore set forth as additional authority and further reasoning upon which to base our holding herein, the following quotation from the opinion of Mr. Justice Richards in said case (Carter v. Garetson, supra, at pages 241, 242, of 56 Cal. App., 204 P. 1091):

"The first contention of the appellant here is that the trial court was in error in permitting Josephine Garetson to file her complaint in intervention in this action for the reason that a claimant to property which has been attached in an action between two other persons to recover upon an indebtedness, in which action the claimant of the property attached has no interest, has, under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state relating to intervention, no right to intervene. The appellant, with a fairness which is quite unusual, has cited the court to a long line of cases in this and other jurisdictions upholding the right of a third party to intervene in an action wherein the title to property of which he claims to be the owner is in danger of being injuriously affected by the proceedings in said action; the purpose of his intervention being that of preventing a cloud upon his title to said property. The cases referred to and commented upon by the appellant are Horn v. Volcano Water Co., 13 Cal. 62, 73 Am. Dec. 569; Speyer v. Ihmels, 21 Cal. 281, 81 Am. Dec. 157; Coffey v. Greenfield, 55 Cal. 382; Kimball v. Richardson, 111 Cal. 386, 43 P. 1111; and Dennis v. Kolm, 131 Cal. 91, 63 P. 141. The distinction which the appellant seeks to draw between the foregoing cases and the case at bar is that in each of the earlier of such cases the action was one directly involving the property of which the intervenor claimed to be the owner. The language of the court in such earlier cases does not, however, preserve this distinction, while in the last case above cited it would seem to have been entirely lost, since the court in that case held that a claimant of a sum of money which had been attached in an action to which she was not a party had a right to intervene for the purpose of protecting her interest in said fund against attachment. Dennis v. Kolm, supra. In so deciding the court refers to the cases decided by the courts of Louisiana applying the right of intervention as given by the Code of Procedure of that state, from which the provisions of our own Code relating to intervention were substantially taken, in which cases the right of a party whose property has been seized or attached in a suit between other parties to intervene for the protection of his interest in said property as against such attachment has been uniformly upheld. Yale v. Hoopes, 16 La. Ann. 311; Letchford v. Jacobs, 17 La. Ann. 79; Field v. Harrison, 20 La. Ann. 411. In line with these authorities it appears that in those states whose statutes upon the subject of intervention have embodied the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure of California the same rule has been applied. In the case of Moreland v. Monarch M. & M. Co., 55 Mont. 419, 178 P. 175, it was decided, after a very full review of the decisions of the courts of California and other states upon the subject, that the owner of property attached in an action for debt between two other parties had a right to intervene in defense of his property against such attachment. The same rule has been enunciated by the courts of Idaho, Utah, and Washington. Potlatch L. Co. v. Runkel, 16 Idaho, 192, 18 Ann. Cas. 591, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 536, 101 P. 396; Houston, etc., Co. v. Hechler, 44 Utah, 64, 138 P. 1159; Langert v. Brown, 3 Wash. T. 102, 13 P. 704; 2 Ruling Case Law, p. 880, § 94. This being the state of the law, we find no merit in the appellant's said contention.

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 5, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 2, 1930.

1. Attorney and client ☞38—Preparing defamatory affidavit, withholding same from filing after ordered sealed, and communicating contents to newspaper, held to warrant suspension (Code Civ. Proc. § 282, subd. 6, and § 287).

Preparing affidavit, in action for breach of contract against actress and others, setting forth defamatory and scandalous matter and containing allegations of scurrilous, immoral, and perhaps fictitious matter prejudicial to honor and character of actress, publication of which would injure her reputation and destroy her earning capacity, and withholding affidavit from filing for five days after court ordered it sealed, and during that time communicating contents to newspaper correspondent and furnishing him with copy thereof, held violation of duties as attorneys, as defined by Code Civ. Proc. § 282, subd. 6, and to involve moral turpitude and dishonesty within meaning of section 287, warranting suspension from practice for six months.

2. Attorney and client ☞58—Suspending attorneys for six months for preparing defamatory affidavit, withholding same from filing after ordered sealed, and communicating contents to newspaper, held not excessive punishment.

Suspension from practice of law for six months for preparing defamatory and scandalous affidavit in action against well-known actress, and withholding same from filing after ordered sealed, and communicating contents to newspaper correspondent, constituting violation of duties as attorneys and involving moral turpitude and dishonesty, held not excessive punishment.

Separate applications by Harry G. Sadicoff and by A. L. Abrahams for review of an order of the Board of Governors of the State Bar of California recommending suspension of applicants from practice of law for a period of six months. Affirmed.

Paul Barksdale D'Orr, Minor Moore, and Francis J. Heney, all of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Julius V. Patrosso, of Los Angeles, for State Bar of California.

PRESTON, J. On December 12, 1927, a member of the Los Angeles County Bar Association addressed a letter to it, in which he complained of misconduct on the part of petitioners, while acting as attorneys for plaintiff, in a case pending in the superior court of that county, wherein he himself represented certain defendants. Under a stipulation that the matter should be heard and determined as though it had been initiated before the State Bar, said letter was treated as a complaint, answers thereto were filed by petitioners, and the case was assigned to Local Administrative Committee No. 4 of the county of Los Angeles, before whom the hearing was conducted.

Said local committee found that petitioners were guilty of violation of their duties as attorneys as defined by section 282, subd. 6, of the Code of Civil Procedure, also that their acts and conduct as disclosed by the evidence involved moral turpitude and dishonesty within the meaning of section 287 of said Code, and recommended their suspension from the practice of law for a period of two years. The Board of Governors thereafter duly approved the findings of said local committee, but modified its recommendation to one that petitioners be suspended for a period of six months only. A review of such action is here sought by petitioners.

Their attack upon the constitutionality of the State Bar of California Act (St. 1927, p. 38) may be dismissed, as this is no longer an open question. State Bar, etc., v. Superior Court, etc. (Cal. Sup.) 278 P. 432; State Bar of California v. Jones (Cal. Sup.) 280 P. 964, and cases there cited.

The other assignments, which in reality amount to a claim that the evidence is insufficient to justify said recommendations of suspension or support the findings and action of the Board of Governors, with an added plea for leniency, we believe should also be disposed of briefly. In our opinion the record, despite some conflict in the evidence, furnishes full support and justification for the action taken.

The reprehensible conduct with which petitioners are charged relates to certain acts done by them upon their substitution as attorneys for plaintiff in an action for breach of contract theretofore instituted in the Los Angeles superior court against a certain publicly known motion picture actress and others. At the time of said substitution of attorneys, proceedings were pending to restrain the taking of a certain deposition upon the ground that the matters there involved were res adjudicata by reason of a judgment entered in the United States District Court of New York in a similar action, to which these same persons were parties, wherein the pleadings contained such scandalous matter that they were ordered sealed by the court and this same plaintiff and his attorneys were enjoined from disclosing their contents. Said Los Angeles counsel for defendant actress, fearing a repetition of these salacious and scandalous statements, to the detriment of her reputation and honor, sought by conference with petitioners to have a certain other deposition taken before a superior judge in such a manner as to avoid publicity. During this period of pendency, petitioner Sadicoff, with the knowledge of petitioner Abrahams, prepared an affidavit setting forth at length said defamatory and scandalous matter, containing allegations of scurrilous, immoral, and perhaps fictitious matters prejudicial to the honor and character of said actress, publication of which would injure her reputation and could even destroy her earning capacity, which affidavit, ordered sealed by the trial court, was served by petitioners upon opposing parties, but, for no good purpose, was withheld by them from filing for five days, and its contents were communicated by petitioner Sadicoff to an Eastern newspaper correspondent, who was thereafter furnished with a copy of it.

Said local committee, with ample evidence to impel such conclusion, was of the opinion that petitioner Sadicoff, during said five-day period between its service and filing, wilfully withheld said affidavit from the court records for the purpose of securing an advantage for his client, either by forcing a compromise or otherwise deliberately intending to harm said actress through the danger incident to possible publication of its contents; that petitioner Abrahams was familiar with all these proceedings; knew of the preparation of said affidavit, its contents, that it had been ordered sealed, and that counsel for said actress were exerting every endeavor to prevent a repetition of what had happened in the New York case; and that he also knew of its intended use, and approved the action of petitioner Sadicoff.

[1] We do not believe an extended résumé of the matters brought out upon the hearing would be of any benefit here. Section 282 of the Code of Civil Procedure enjoins upon attorneys the duty "abstain from all offensive personality, and to advance no fact prejudicial to the honor or reputation of a party or witness, unless required by the justice of the cause with which he is charged." Section 287 of said Code authorizes removal or suspension of an attorney for "willful disobedience or violation of an order of the court requiring him to do or forbear an act connected with, or in the course of his profession, which he ought in good faith to do or forbear, * * * or "for the commission of any act involving moral turpitude, dishonesty or corruption. * * *"

The evidence adduced fully warrants the conclusion that said acts of petitioners and especially their conduct with respect to said affidavit and the motives and purposes which actuated them during said period constituted a violation of their duties as attorneys. In an action of the character established by the complaint in said case, references such as those contained in said affidavit to certain of the parties obviously were not justified, but were inexcusable, vindictive, and deliberately offensive—in fact, clear evidence of bad faith on the part of counsel both toward the parties themselves and the court.

[2] We may further state that the punishment suggested is not excessive or disproportionate to the offense. The facts surrounding the connection of petitioner Abrahams with preparation of said objectionable affidavit, his claims relative thereto, the youth of petitioner Sadicoff, his alleged belief in the propriety of his conduct, and his stated regret therefor, all received due consideration by said local committee, and, considering the seriousness of the offense, were undoubtedly factors which led to the suggestion by the Board of Governors of a suspension of merely six months. We have also given these factors due consideration.

It is therefore ordered that the action and recommendation of the Board of Governors in this matter be, and it is hereby, approved, and that the petitioners herein, Harry G. Sadicoff and A. L. Abrahams, be, and they are hereby, suspended from the practice of the law in this state for the period of six months from and after the date of filing of this order.

CONSUMERS' SALT CO. et al. v. RIGGINS.
(L. A. 11592.) ★

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 4, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 2, 1930.

1. Corporations ⇨289—Directors declared elected at annual meeting of stockholders held de facto directors, although legality of election was questioned.

Persons declared elected directors of corporation at annual meeting of stockholders and purporting to act as directors under color of election held to be de facto directors if not de jure, and as such their acts in electing new secretary were binding on corporation, although right to vote of party representing majority of stock, certificate of which had been deposited in court pending judgment in certain other case, was disputed.

2. Corporations ⇨289—Acts of de facto officers could not be collaterally attacked by corporation or by third persons (Civ. Code, § 315).

Acts of persons declared elected directors of corporation at annual meeting of stockholders could not be collaterally attacked by corporation or by third parties, since directors were at least de facto officers, and proceeding has been provided by Civ. Code, § 315, whereby right of person claiming to have been elected director of corporation may be inquired into.

3. Mandamus ⇨168(4)—Right of petitioners to performance of acts sought to be compelled must be clear to entitle petitioners to mandate.

To entitle petitioners to writ of mandate, legal right of petitioners to performance of acts sought to be compelled must be clear and complete, and petitioners must prove every fact that forms basis of their claim to issuance of such writ.

4. Mandamus ⇨129—Secretary elected by directors elected by stockholders held entitled to mandate requiring former secretary to deliver corporate seal, books, and records, although legality of election of directors was questioned.

Where secretary was elected at meeting of board of directors of corporation which board had been declared elected at annual meeting of stockholders, secretary and directors held entitled to writ of mandate requiring former secretary to deliver corporate seal, books, and records, although right of party representing majority of stock, certificate of which had been filed with clerk of court pending judgment in certain cases, was disputed.

Application by the Consumers' Salt Company and another for writ of mandate requiring J. R. Riggins to deliver corporate seal, books, and records to newly elected secretary of corporation. Writ granted.

Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal in 277 P. 352.

Harry M. Irwin, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Newby & Newby and Dee Holder, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. The facts in this case are not in dispute. Prior to the commencement of this action, one B. D. McAlvay brought an action against B. C. Stockwell and the Consumers' Salt Company for the purpose of quieting the title of the former to 225,000 shares of the capital stock of said Consumers' Salt Company, a corporation. These shares of stock then stood in the name of Stockwell upon the books of said company, and were evidenced by certificate No. 40. That action resulted in a judgment in favor of McAlvay quieting his title to said stock as prayed for. Stockwell appealed from the judgment, and, for the purpose of staying execution and in pursuance of the terms of section 944 of the Code of Civil Procedure, Stockwell surrendered said certificate No. 40 and had issued in the place thereof certificate No. 47 for a like number of shares of the stock of said company. This last-named certificate was issued in the name of B. D. McAlvay and was by Stockwell deposited with the clerk of the court with whom judgment was entered to abide the judgment of the appellate court as provided by said last-mentioned section of the Code. A written statement to this effect was entered upon the stock books of the company and also upon said certificate No. 47. Thereafter and while said appeal was pending, the regular annual meeting of the stockholders of said corporation was held for the purpose of electing a board of directors. The issued capital stock of said corporation at the date of said meeting consisted of 300,010 shares, 75,000 of which were held by C. L. Mullholand, one of the petitioners herein, 225,000 shares were represented by said certificate No. 47, and the remaining 10 shares were held by various other persons for the purpose of qualifying them to act as directors. At this meeting of the stockholders just referred to, McAlvay and Mullholand and three other stockholders attended. Stockwell was not present. Those present, including McAlvay, purported to elect a full board of directors, and later the persons declared elected directors at said stockholders' meeting met and elected Mullholand secretary. The respondent Riggins had, prior to said meeting, been the secretary of said company. Mullholand, after he had been declared elected secretary of said corporation, demanded of Riggins possession of the office, books, records, and other paraphernalia of said company, which demand was refused by Riggins, who now holds the possession of the said office, books, records, and other paraphernalia, claiming that Mullholand was never legally elected secretary of said company, and therefore, has no legal right to any property of the company. This proceeding was therefore instituted in the District Court of Appeal for the purpose of compelling Riggins by writ of mandate to deliver to Mullholand the office and paraphernalia of said company which were then in his possession by virtue of his having been secretary of said company. After decision by the District Court of Appeal (277 P. 352), the proceeding was transferred to this court.

It is conceded that whoever is the legally elected and acting secretary of the company is entitled to the office and records of said company. The case, therefore, hinges upon the question as to who was the legally elected and acting secretary of said company at the time said demand was made upon Riggins for the surrender of the possession of said office and property. It is not questioned but that Riggins, prior to the meeting of the board of directors of said corporation at which Mullholand was declared elected secretary, was the legally elected and acting secretary of said company. If therefore Mullholand was, at said meeting of the board of directors of said company, legally elected secretary, then the term of office of Riggins as secretary terminated at Mullholand's election, and Mullholand would be entitled to exercise from the date of his election all the rights and privileges of said office, including the right to the possession of the office and records of said corporation. On the other hand, if the election of Mullholand was not legal, then the respondent Riggins would continue as such secretary and he would be invested with all the rights, privileges, and responsibilities of said office.

[1] As we have already seen, Mullholand was elected secretary by the same persons who had been declared elected directors of said company at the annual meeting of its stockholders. At the meeting at which Mullholand was elected secretary these persons purported to act as the board of directors of said corporation under color of their election by the stockholders thereof. Even if we assume that their election as directors was illegal, and therefore they were not de jure directors, they were, nevertheless, under the facts just stated, de facto directors of said corporation, and as such their acts were binding upon the corporation in all respects as if they were the de jure directors thereof.

"Where a person not eligible to the office is declared elected, and no stockholder objects or takes legal proceedings to test the right to the office, and such person is allowed to perform the duties of his office, he becomes an officer de facto. As such his acts cannot be objected to on the ground that he was not a legally elected director. Neither corporate creditors, nor the corporation, nor the stockholders, nor the director himself, are allowed to raise this objection in that manner. The remedy is to oust him by quo warranto or to enjoin him as a usurper. But after he is allowed to become a de facto director, his title to office cannot be attacked collaterally, nor can his acts be repudiated on that ground. A director, as a de facto director, may bind the company by his acts, if allowed to continue in his position." Cook on Corporations (7th Ed.) vol. 2, p. 1894. "A de facto officer is one who has the reputation and position of the officer he assumes to be, and yet is not entitled to the office in point of law. A de jure officer is one who has the lawful right to the office, but who has either been ousted from it or has never actually taken possession of it. An officer is de facto when the statute under which he holds office is unconstitutional, or when he was elected but was ineligible, or was irregularly or illegally elected. * * * A director as a de facto director may bind the company by his acts, if allowed to continue in his position. And, in general, the contracts of all officers de facto, acting within the sphere of their office, are binding upon the corporation." Cook on Corporations (7th Ed.) vol. 3, pp.

2442, 2443, 2444. "Persons who hold office as directors, with the consent of the corporation and under color of an election or appointment, are de facto officers, although their election or appointment may have been illegal, and their acts as such in so far as third persons are concerned, are just as valid and binding upon the corporation as if they were directors de jure. * * * Assessments or calls by a de facto board of directors are valid. Appointment of an agent or subordinate officer by a de facto board of directors has the same effect as if made by a de jure board." Clark & Marshall, Private Corporations, vol. 3, § 662, p. 2035.

The courts of this state have consistently held in accordance with the rule enunciated by the authors of these two well-known textbooks. San Jose Savings Bank v. Sierra L. Co., 63 Cal. 179; San Joaquin, etc., Co. v. Beecher, 101 Cal. 70, 35 P. 349; Barrell v. Lake View Land Co., 122 Cal. 133, 54 P. 594; Balfour-Guthrie Co. v. Woodworth, 124 Cal. 169, 56 P. 891; Sherwood v. Wallin, 154 Cal. 735, 99 P. 191; Chandler v. Hart, 161 Cal. 405, 119 P. 516, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1094; Hygienic Health Food Co. v. Grant, 187 Cal. 431, 202 P. 653; Jones v. Peck, 63 Cal. App. 397, 218 P. 1030.

In Balfour-Guthrie Co. v. Woodworth, supra, the court, at page 172 of 124 Cal., 56 P. 892, of the opinion, stated the rule of this state in the following language: "The objection of the defendant to the regularity of the stockholders' meeting at which the directors were elected was properly overruled. For the purposes of this action, it was immaterial whether this meeting was properly called or not, or whether the election was by the stockholders in person or by proxy, or whether the proxies were sufficient in form to entitle the holders to vote at the election. The records of the corporation show that five persons were elected at that meeting to serve as its directors, and, whether their election was regular or not, they assumed the trust, and became at least de facto directors. So long as they held this position unchallenged by any member of the corporation, their acts as directors were binding upon the corporation, and upon strangers dealing with it. San Jose Sav. Bank v. Sierra Lumber Co., 63 Cal. 179."

[2] This language is most apt when applied to the facts in this case. For the purpose of this action it is immaterial whether McAlvay had the right to vote at the annual meeting of the stockholders, of said corporation the stock represented by said certificate No. 47 or not. He was present at said meeting with the other stockholders, and they proceeded without objection from any one, so far as the record shows, to elect a board of directors of said corporation. The persons so chosen thereafter organized as the board of directors of said corporation and at a meeting of said board elected the petitioner Mullholand secretary of said company. In acting under their purported election at said stockholders' meeting, they assumed to act as such directors and were at least de facto directors of said corporation. Their acts, as we have seen, cannot be collaterally attacked by the corporation or by third persons.

A summary proceeding has been provided by section 315 of the Civil Code whereby the right of a person claiming to have been elected a director of a corporation existing under the laws of this state can be inquired into, and if found to be illegal, it may be set aside and a new election called. Originally quo warranto proceedings were the sole remedy whereby the right of a person assuming to act as a director might be tested. Whether these are the only proceedings now open to one "grieved by any election held by any corporate body," it is not necessary for us to here decide. These proceedings just mentioned are direct proceedings brought for the purpose of determining the legality of the election of one purporting to be a director. By means of those proceedings, and particularly by that provided by section 315 of the Civil Code, any stockholder dissatisfied with the result of any election may have his grievances inquired into by a court and the validity of the election determined. But this cannot be done by a collateral attack upon the officer's right to hold his office like that now before us. The authorities already mentioned support this statement, especially the case of San Jose Sav. Bank v. Sierra Land Co., supra, where we find the following statement of the law by this court: "It may be that on a direct proceeding to determine Hayward's right to hold the position of director a judgment of ouster would have been entered against him, but his title to the place cannot be tried in this action, or impeached collaterally. Until he was ousted on a direct proceeding he was a director de facto."

[3] It is true that in the proceeding the petitioners are asking for a writ of mandate and that in order to entitle them to this extraordinary remedy the legal right of petitioners to the performance of the act sought to be compelled must be clear and complete. In such a proceeding, the petitioners must prove every fact that forms the basis of their claim to the issuance of the writ. 16 Cal. Jur. p. 869. But this the petitioners have done by showing that Mullholand had been elected secretary at a meeting of the board of directors of the corporation, which board of directors, at the annual meeting of the stockholders, had been declared elected directors.

[4] Under these authorities, we are satisfied that this petition for a writ of mandate must be granted. In arriving at this conclusion, we are aware of the fact that this point was only faintly urged by the petitioner, and that counsel on neither side has appeared to consider this question of controlling importance in the case. Their briefs have been principally devoted to the question as to the right of McAlvay to vote the 225,000 shares of stock represented by certificate No. 47 at the meeting of the stockholders called for the purpose of electing a board of directors. As already indicated, this question is not before us in the present proceeding.

Let the writ of mandamus issue as prayed for.

STOCKWELL et al. v. McALVAY.
(L. A. 11548.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 4, 1929.

1. Appeal and error $\Rightarrow$ 781(4)—Appeal from action to enjoin voting of certain corporate stock could not be dismissed because annual stockholders' meeting had been held.

Appeal, in action to enjoin voting of certain shares of corporate stock during pendency of appeal of certain action involving such stock, could not be dismissed because annual meeting of stockholders had been held, where appeal in the other case was still pending, since future meeting of stockholders might be held before determination of such appeal.

2. Appeal and error $\Rightarrow$ 790(2)—That question presented would be determined by decision in another action pending in Supreme Court furnished no grounds for dismissal of appeal.

Fact that decision in another action pending before Supreme Court would be determinative of question presented on appeal in action to enjoin voting of certain shares of corporate stock furnished no grounds for dismissal of appeal.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Georgia P. Bullock, Judge.

Action by B. C. Stockwell and others against B. D. McAlvay. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. On defendant's motion to dismiss appeal. Motion denied.

Newby & Newby, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Andrew H. Rose and Harry W. Irwin, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Motion to dismiss appeal on the ground that the questions involved therein have become moot. There is no merit in the motion and it is denied.

[1] Respondent contends that this action was brought to enjoin the voting of certain shares of stock of the Consumers' Salt Company at the annual meeting of the stockholders of said company and that as the annual meeting of said company was held on July 16, 1928, and said shares of stock were voted at said meeting, the question of respondent's right to vote said stock presents merely an academic question after the election has been held. The action, however, was brought to restrain respondent from voting said shares of stock during the pendency of the appeal of an action entitled B. D. McAlvay, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. Consumers' Salt Company et al., Defendants and Appellants, L. A. No. 10684. Said appeal is still pending, and it does not appear that there may not be meetings of said stockholders held in the future before the determination of said appeal, and that the right to vote said shares of stock at the future meeting of said stockholders may not be determined by the decision of the present appeal.

[2] Respondent advances another ground for the dismissal of said appeal for the reason that the questions involved herein have become moot. This ground is based upon the fact that there is still a third action now pending on appeal in this court, and that the sole question involved in the appeal of this third action is the right of the respondent herein to vote said shares of stock, and that a decision of this question in that action will be determinative of the question presented on the appeal in the present action. Conceding this to be true, it furnishes no ground for the dismissal of the present appeal. We might say at this time that the action to which respondent refers is L. A. No. 11592, and is entitled Consumers' Salt Company et al. v. J. R. Riggins, 204 Cal. —, 282 P. 954. It was instituted for the purpose of obtaining a writ of mandate directed to one J. R. Riggins, commanding and directing him to turn over and deliver, to the secretary of the Consumers' Salt Company the office, records and other property of said company. We have just filed our opinion in said action and have decided the same in favor of the petitioners therein. In doing so, we followed the contention of said petitioners made in their petition for hearing after decision by the District Court of Appeal (277 P. 352), that the right of McAlvay to vote said stock, or the validity of the election of the directors, declared elected at the stockholders' meeting on July 16, 1928, could not be raised in said mandamus proceeding.

KERR v. MILATOVICH. (Civ. 6879.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 5, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 4, 1930. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Feb. 3, 1930.

1. Quieting title $\S$ 44(4)—Degree of proof necessary to sustain ownership of plaintiff's transferors, in action to quiet title to gold bullion, was only that which produced conviction in unprejudiced mind.

In action to quiet title to bars of gold bullion, ownership of plaintiff's transferors need not be demonstrated, but only that degree of proof was necessary which produced conviction in an unprejudiced mind.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 1012(1)—Whether evidence offered in action to quiet title to gold bullion was convincing was question for trier of fact.

In action to quiet title to bars of gold bullion, whether or not evidence offered in regard to ownership by plaintiff's transferors was convincing was question for jury or trial court sitting as jury.

3. Quieting title $\S$ 44(4)—Evidence in action to quiet title held to sustain conclusion that gold bullion was stolen from mines and that defendant knew such fact.

In action to quiet title to bars of gold bullion, evidence held sufficient to sustain conclusion that bullion was stolen from mines of plaintiff's transferors, and that defendant knew such fact.

4. Evidence $\S$ 314(1)—Defendant's written statement held admissible, in action to quiet title to gold bullion, though containing hearsay (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1870, subd. 2).

In action to quiet title to gold bullion, defendant's written statement, though containing matters of hearsay, held properly admitted, in view of Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1870, subd. 2, providing that act, declaration, or omission of party are admissible as evidence against him.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Robert I. Kerr against M. Milatovich, alias D. M. Melatovich, also known as Al Muller. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing granted by Supreme Court; PRESTON, J., not participating in decision.

Robert E. Hatch, of San Francisco, for appellant.

A. H. Ricketts, of San Francisco (G. K. Burgren, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The above action was brought to quiet plaintiff's title to four bars of gold bullion now in the custody of the United States Branch Mint in San Francisco. The defendant denied the alleged ownership of plaintiff. After a trial, judgment was entered for the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed therefrom. It is urged as grounds for a reversal of the judgment that the evidence was insufficient to support the finding that plaintiff was the owner of the bullion, and that certain written statements by the defendant were erroneously admitted in evidence over objection.

Certain corporations, namely, Central Eureka Mining Company, Kennedy Mining & Milling Company, and Argonaut Mining Company, before the suit was brought, transferred their interests in the bullion in question to the plaintiff, who sues as their successor in interest. The corporations mentioned own producing gold mines in the vicinity of Jackson, Amador county, Cal., and the bullion was shown to have been deposited in the United States mint by the defendant under the assumed name of Al Muller. The evidence shows that no license to purchase gold or gold ores was ever issued to the defendant by the state of California. According to two witnesses who testified for the plaintiff, the defendant admitted to them that the bullion in question came from Amador county, Cal., and that he had purchased the same from miners who worked in the Argonaut, Kennedy, and Central Eureka mines, situated near Jackson in that county. Subsequently the defendant, in a written statement signed and sworn to by him, stated that he purchased the bullion from miners working in the vicinity of Jackson and shipped the same to the United States Mint at San Francisco. He further stated therein that "affiant has reason to believe that the gold bullion in Jackson, Amador county, California, and which gold bullion represented the bullion made in the above mentioned shipments, came from mines in the vicinity of Jackson, Amador county, California, namely, the Argonaut, Kennedy, and Central Eureka; that affiant is without sufficient information at this time to state definitely and accurately the precise amount of said gold bullion that came from any of the particular mines mentioned, or that it all came from said mines." It was also shown that thefts of ore from the mines mentioned by the miners employed therein had been frequent, and, according to the defendant's testimony as shown by his deposition, which was read at the trial, he purchased the bullion from various miners in California and Nevada. He further testified that he asked no questions as to how the gold was obtained, but assumed that the portion bought in California was produced there and the balance in Nevada.

[1-4] Defendant claims that the foregoing evidence was insufficient to support the finding that plaintiff's transferors owned the bullion. Demonstration was not required, but only that degree of proof which produces conviction in an unprejudiced mind, and whether or not the evidence offered was convincing was a question for the jury or the trial court sitting as a jury. Estate of Pepper, 158 Cal. 619, 112 P. 62, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1092. The evidence was reasonably sufficient to sustain the conclusion that the bullion was stolen from the mines of plaintiff's transferors and that the defendant knew the fact. It is further claimed that defendant's written statement contained matters of hearsay and was for that reason improperly admitted. The same was clearly admissible under the provisions of subdivision 2 of section 1870 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

We find no merit in the appeal, and the judgment is accordingly affirmed.

McCARL et ux. v. KROUPA et al. (Civ. 7023.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 3, 1929.

Brokers  37—Vendors cannot recover money received by broker and retained as commission under agreement to purchase, where not ratifying such agreement.

Under contract to produce purchaser ready, able, and willing to purchase vendors' property, and authorizing broker to retain a commission of $1,000, to be paid out of money received from purchasers, vendors held not entitled to recover sum of $1,000 received by broker from purchaser, where there was no allegation that agreement to purchase was ratified by vendors.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by John A. McCarl and wife against R. W. Kroupa and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Kington & Cunningham, of San Francisco, for appellants.

H. S. Craig, of Oakland, for respondent Kroupa.

R. P. Wisecarver, of San Francisco, for respondent National Surety Co. of New York.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiffs sued the defendants for moneys received. The defendants filed separate demurrer to plaintiffs' amended complaint, the demurrers were sustained without leave to amend, and judgment was entered in favor of the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed and have brought up the judgment roll. The record does not show that the plaintiffs asked leave to amend, and we may therefore assume that they did not ask leave.

In their amended complaint the plaintiffs allege: That they are husband and wife. That the defendant Kroupa is a licensed real estate broker. That the National Surety Company is a corporation, and is the bondsman of Kroupa. That on November 25, 1925, the plaintiffs, as owners, delivered to Kroupa a writing authorizing him to sell their lands.

In that document the lands are described, and Kroupa is authorized to sell the lands for $21,000. It is provided in the writing that the first payment will be not less than $1,000, and to be considered as a deposit on the sale and that the balance of the purchase price of $20,000 will be secured by a first deed of trust on the lands. There is a covenant that the purchaser will give a bond indemnifying the sellers against liens arising for improvements to be made. No time is fixed as to when the plaintiffs will execute their deed, nor when that bond will be given. The buyers are to have 30 days, after the agent notifies the sellers a sale has been made, within which they can examine the title. The writing provides that the broker is entitled to a commission of $1,000, which shall be paid out of the money received from the purchasers. The writing is signed by the sellers. There is appended to it a writing, signed by Margaret Hubbert. That writing is as follows:

"The undersigned, designated as the purchaser, herein agrees to purchase the hereinabove described property under the terms and conditions hereinabove set forth, and has this date deposited with the agent $250.00 as a deposit and part payment of the purchase price of $21,000.00. Should the search of title to the hereinabove described property not prove valid, said deposit shall be returned to the purchaser and this contract become null and void. Should the purchaser not live up to the terms and conditions of this contract as hereinabove set forth, said purchaser shall forfeit said deposit and any and all rights given said purchaser under this contract.

"Margaret Hubbert."

The latter instrument is not signed by the sellers and there is no allegation that it was ratified by the sellers. Notwithstanding the recitals in said writings, the plaintiffs allege that Margaret Hubbert accepted said offer and paid the defendant Kroupa $1,000 as the first payment and deposit; that Margaret Hubbert did not perform, and that she is not ready, able, and willing to purchase; that the defendant Kroupa did not produce a purchaser, and is not ready, able, and willing to produce one; that on March 1, 1926, the plaintiffs demanded of the defendants that they pay the plaintiffs $1,000, but that the defendants have not paid it; that at all times the plaintiffs were ready, able, and willing to perform the contract, but that they have been prevented by defendants from doing so. Bearing in mind that the action is between the sellers and their broker, it will be noticed at once that the complaint of the plaintiffs contains many irrelevant allegations. Assuming, as alleged in the pleading, that the broker found no purchaser, then he is not entitled to make any demand on the plaintiffs. But he is not doing so. The plaintiffs are making a demand on him. But he had made no contract, express or implied, to pay the plaintiffs anything. Under the written authorization he was authorized to collect in cash $1,000—no more and no less. Of that sum he was authorized to retain the whole if he found a purchaser ready, able, and willing to purchase. If he did not find that kind of a purchaser, he was not authorized by the contract to receive anything. If, nevertheless, he did receive certain moneys, and the receipt thereof was not ratified by the plaintiffs, then the plaintiffs were not interested parties and may not recover any part of such moneys.

The judgment is affirmed.

MEILI et al. v. CRANE et al. (GOODWIN et al., Interveners). (Civ. 3912.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 23, 1929.

1. Receivers ⇨200—Neither receiver nor those obtaining his appointment are liable for expenses of receivership when receipts are insufficient to cover disbursements.

It is a general rule that neither receiver nor those obtaining his appointment are personally responsible for expenses of receivership when receipts are insufficient to cover disbursements.

2. Receivers ⇨200—Parties obtaining appointment of receiver may be liable for his expenses and compensation, where proceedings for appointment were irregular or they obtain special benefits.

Where proceedings for appointment of receiver are irregular or where parties who obtained receivership derived special benefits therefrom, receiver may under certain circumstances recover his expenses and compensation from those who obtain his appointment.

3. Mortgages ⇨474—Parties obtaining appointment of receiver held not liable for deficiency, where appointment was regular, and they did not benefit beyond their right.

Parties obtaining appointment of receiver on foreclosure of mortgage held not liable for deficiency found to exist where receiver was regularly appointed, and those obtaining his appointment did not benefit beyond their right.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by J. J. Meili and another against J. A. Crane, Grace E. Tooker, and others, wherein certain defendants filed a cross-complaint, and Timothy Goodwin and others intervened. From the judgment, the interveners appeal. Affirmed.

J. Vincent Hannon, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Harry Lyons, Edward T. Sherer, and Welburn Mayoock, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PULLEN, Justice pro tem. To secure the repayment of a promissory note to J. J. Meili and O. W. Fry, respondents, J. A. Crane and Evangelyn Crane executed two mortgages, one a second mortgage on a piece of orchard land in the county of Los Angeles and the other a chattel mortgage on certain furniture and equipment in an apartment house in the city of Los Angeles, together with their leasehold interest therein. Upon default on the note, respondents brought this action, praying, among other things, that the mortgages be foreclosed, and that a receiver be appointed pendente lite to take over the leasehold interest and the furniture and equipment therein, and that the receiver be empowered to enter said premises, operate and manage the same, collect the rents therefrom, and hold the proceeds for the benefit of all parties interested. A receiver was appointed and took charge of the apartment house and furniture, entering into possession in December, 1925, and remaining in possession until dispossessed under an unlawful detainer action brought by the interveners herein, as owners of the apartment house referred to, who recovered judgment against the receiver, as such, for rentals and penalty amounting to $4,810.20. Pending the unlawful detainer action, the receiver, under order of the court, sold the furniture for $1,000. The net result of the operations by the receiver of the apartment house was a balance in his hands of $21.90 realized from rentals which, with the sum of $1,000 realized on the sale of the furniture and equipment, was applied by the court as a credit upon interveners' judgment, leaving a substantial amount of the judgment in favor of interveners unpaid.

While the action in intervention was pending, the real property referred to herein was sold under a decree of foreclosure of the prior mortgage, which sale realized a surplus of $5,992.45 over and above the amount necessary to satisfy such prior mortgage, which sum was paid into court subject to the outcome of this litigation. Thereupon interveners herein sought to recover the sum of $1,000 in the hands of the receiver and to be awarded a lien prior to plaintiffs herein on the real property in question, and that, out of the proceeds of the sale thereof, there be paid to interveners the balance remaining on their judgment against the receiver.

The trial court allowed the interveners the sum of $1,000, being the proceeds of the sale of the furniture by the receiver, and the net balance of $21.94 in the hands of the receiver, but refused to allow the interveners anything out of the proceeds from the foreclosure of the real property. From such order and judgment the interveners prosecute this appeal.

[1] Appellants' contention is not supported by the law. It is the general rule that neither the receiver nor those who obtained his appointment are personally responsible for the expenses of the receivership, when the receipts are insufficient to cover the disbursements.

[2, 3] If the proceedings for the appointment of the receiver are irregular, he may under certain circumstances recover his expenses and compensation from those who obtained his appointment, and also, where the parties who obtained the receivership have obtained special benefits, they may in equity be required to satisfy the expenses of the receiver, but neither of these special situations are applicable to the facts here. Ephraim v. Pacific Bank, 129 Cal. 589, 62 P. 177. The receiver was regularly appointed, and those who obtained his appointment have not benefited beyond their right.

The rule is well stated in the case of Atlantic Trust Co. v. Chapman, 208 U. S. 360, 28 S. Ct. 406, 408, 52 L. Ed. 528, 13 Ann. Cas. 1155, appealed from the Ninth Circuit to the Supreme Court of the United States, where Mr. Justice Harlan, speaking for the court, said:

"We are of opinion that the court of appeals erred in holding that the trust company was liable for the deficiency found to exist. No such liability could arise from the simple fact that it was on plaintiff's motion that a receiver was appointed to take charge of the property pending the litigation. The motion for a receiver was to the end that the property might be cared for and preserved for all who had or might have an interest in the proceeds of its sale. The circumstances seemed to have justified the motion, but whether a receiver should have been appointed or not was in the sound discretion of the court. Immediately upon such appointment and after the qualification of the receiver, the property passed into the custody of the law, and thenceforward its administration was wholly under the control of the court by its officer or creature, the receiver. In Booth v. Clark, 17 How. 322, 331, 15 L. Ed. 164, 167, it was said: 'A receiver is an indifferent person between parties, appointed by the court to receive the rents, issues, or profits of land, or other thing in question in this court, pending the suit, where it does not seem reasonable to the court that either party should do it. Wyatt, Practical Reg. 355. He is an officer of the court; his appointment is provisional. He is appointed in behalf of all parties, and not of the complainant or of the defendant only. He is appointed for the benefit of all parties who may establish rights in the cause. The money in his hands is in custodia legis for whoever can make out a title to it. Delany v. Mansfield, 1

Hogan (Ir.) 234. It is the court itself which has the care of the property in dispute. The receiver is but the creature of the court; he has no powers except such as are conferred upon him by the order of his appointment and the course and practice of the court. Verplanck v. Mercantile Ins. Co., 2 Paige [N. Y.] 452.' In Porter v. Sabin, 149 U. S. 473, 479, 37 L. Ed. 815, 818, 13 S. Ct. 1008, 1010, the court said: 'When a court exercising jurisdiction in equity appoints a receiver of all the property of a corporation, the court assumes the administration of the estate; the possession of the receiver is the possession of the court; and the court itself holds and administers the estate, through the receiver as its officer, for the benefit of those whom the court shall ultimately adjudge to be entitled to it'"—citing cases.

Without further elaboration or further citation of authorities, we are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

CROCKETT v. DOWLING. (Civ. 6893.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 2, 1929.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 237(2)—Plaintiff's immaterial testimony relative to insurance held not to require reversal, where defendant failed to request that testimony be stricken or that jury be cautioned.

Plaintiff's testimony as to conversation on part of defendant relative to his carrying insurance held not to require reversal in action for injuries based on defendant's negligent operation of automobile, where plaintiff testified as to this matter after plaintiff's counsel had indicated readiness to permit cross-examination, and where defendant failed to request that testimony be stricken and failed to request that court instruct the jury to disregard it.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 170(9)—Instruction requiring defendant to prove plaintiff's negligence "directly" or proximately contributed to injury held not reversible error (Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½).

Instruction, in action for injuries, requiring defendant to show affirmatively that negligence of plaintiff directly or proximately contributed to the cause of the injury, held not to require reversal because of addition of word "directly," in view of Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½, relative to harmless error, and in view of fact that another instruction given at defendant's request directed jury that plaintiff could not recover if his negligence contributed to accident.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; H. C. Lucas, Judge.

Action by William Crockett against S. W. Dowling. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Griffith R. Williams, of San Francisco (George Allan Smith, of Monterey, of counsel), for appellant.

Rittenhouse & Snyder, of Santa Cruz, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. An appeal by the defendant from a judgment entered against him in an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by his negligence. The injuries followed a collision in the city of Santa Cruz between two automobiles driven by the respective parties to the action. The defendant denied that the injuries and damage complained of were due to his negligence, and pleaded contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff. The action was tried before a jury, which rendered a verdict for the plaintiff. As grounds for reversal it is contended that the conduct of plaintiff's counsel in connection with the giving of certain testimony by the plaintiff constituted prejudicial misconduct, and that the court instructed the jury erroneously.

In the course of the direct examination of plaintiff the following occurred:

"(Direct Examination by Mr. Snyder): Q. Mr. Crockett, following this collision which you testified to yesterday, was there any conversation had between you and Dr. Dowling at the time of the accident or afterwards? In referring to this conversation I will ask you to first specify, as nearly as you can, where it was had, and also whether any persons were present besides yourself and Dr. Dowling? A. Well, he came to the house that evening four days after.

"Q. That would be February 8, 1927? A. Yes, I believe it was about—I think it was about four days—I wouldn't say positively, but around about that time; and he asked me there in the house—there were Mrs. Crockett and the doctor and myself—he asked me if I put on my brake, and I told him no, and he said he was thinking about running in front of me, and then he thought he might get rammed in the center.

"Mr. Snyder: I think that is all. The witness (continuing): And he said further he would write to his company and tell them that it was an unavoidable accident, and he said 'I have paid out thousands of dollars for insurance to be protected.'

"Mr. Wyckoff: I assign counsel's bringing that out as misconduct, and prejudicial error.

"Mr. Snyder: May it please your Honor, your Honor will notice that I said 'that is all' and was waiting for the cross-examination. There is no misconduct there.

"Mr. Wyckoff: I will assign it anyway."

[1] The record discloses no evidence that plaintiff's counsel suggested or intended to elicit the immaterial portions of plaintiff's testimony. No request that the same be stricken out was made by the defendant, nor did he request the court then or thereafter to instruct the jury to disregard it. Under similar circumstances, it has been held that alleged misconduct was not ground for reversal, if an admonition to the jury would have removed the effect thereof. Scott v. Times-Mirror Co., 181 Cal. 345, 184 P. 672, 12 A. L. R. 1007; Olsen v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 20, 204 P. 393. We cannot say that such an admonition would have been ignored by the jury, nor was the question of negligence so close or the amount of the verdict such as would raise the presumption that the verdict was influenced by this testimony or based upon prejudice or passion.

[2] The following instruction was given at plaintiff's request: "You are instructed that it is sufficient for the plaintiff to show by the evidence in the first instance that the injury resulted from the negligence of the defendant, and the plaintiff need not show a want of contributory negligence on his part; contributory negligence is an affirmative defense to be established by the defendant, unless the evidence on the part of the plaintiff shows contributory negligence on his part; and in order to defeat a recovery by the plaintiff where the evidence shows that the injuries complained of by plaintiff were proximately caused by the negligence of the defendant, the defendant must affirmatively show that the negligence of the plaintiff directly or proximately contributed to the cause of the injury." Defendant contends that in order to defeat a recovery by the plaintiff he was not required to prove that the plaintiff's negligence directly and proximately contributed to cause the injury, but that it was sufficient to show that his negligence proximately contributed thereto. While such is the rule (Merrill v. Los Angeles Gas, etc., Co., 158 Cal. 499, 111 P. 534, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 559, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134; Dowd v. Atlas Taxicab Co., 69 Cal. App. 9, 15, 230 P. 958), it has nevertheless been held that an instruction that contributory negligence was not a defense unless it also appeared from the evidence that such negligence of the plaintiff, if any, directly and proximately contributed to the accident, was not a sufficient ground for a reversal of the judgment in view of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, even if the instruction failed by the addition of the word "directly" to the word "proximately" to state precisely the causal relation between the negligent act and the injury (Olsen v. Standard Oil Co., supra).

Moreover, the misleading effect of the instruction, if any, was overcome by the following instruction which was given at the request of the defendant: "As to the defense of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, I instruct you that if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was negligent in the operation of his car and that his negligence was a contributing cause of the collision and consequent injury, he cannot recover. It is not necessary to this defense that the negligence of plaintiff should be the sole cause of the accident. It is sufficient if it was a contributing cause. So that if you find that the defendant was negligent, and plaintiff was also negligent, and that plaintiff's negligence was one of the contributing causes of the collision, then plaintiff cannot recover. Neither are you permitted, if you find both parties were negligent, to base your decision upon which was the more negligent. If you find that the plaintiff was negligent in the operation of his car and that his negligence contributed to the accident in however small a degree, he cannot recover."

After an examination of the entire record, including the evidence, we are satisfied that the verdict of the jury was fully sustained and that no error appears which would justify a reversal of the judgment. The judgment is affirmed.

Mr. Justice KNIGHT, deeming himself disqualified, did not participate in the decision this day rendered in the above-entitled cause.

Proc. $\S$ 675, presumption that written instrument deliberately executed correctly expresses intention of parties held sufficient to support implied finding that assignment of another judgment did not include judgment under which execution was issued.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Action by Theodore J. Welk against W. J. Conner and Newton J. Skinner. From orders denying motions to recall and vacate writ of execution procured by plaintiff's administrator and to declare judgment satisfied, the last named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. C. Routhe, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
Parker, Moote & Longcroft, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem. On November 13, 1913, Theodore J. Welk recovered two judgments in the superior court in separate actions in each of which the appellant Newton J. Skinner was a defendant. On March 14, 1927, Welk having died, his administrator procured from the superior court an order for the issuance of a writ of execution in one of these actions, No. B3694. Thereafter appellant moved the court for an order recalling and vacating said writ of execution and also for an order declaring such judgment satisfied under section 675, Code of Civil Procedure. These motions were denied, and from the orders denying them this appeal is taken.

While fourteen separate grounds were stated in support of the motion, they are but different ways of stating two grounds: (1) That the trial court committed an abuse of discretion in ordering execution to issue after a lapse of thirteen years from the entry of judgment, and (2) that by agreement of the parties the judgment had been satisfied, though not of record, shortly after its entry.

[1] The first of these grounds may be briefly disposed of by reference to the following decisions: Harlan v. Harlan, 154 Cal. 341, 98 P. 32; Weldon v. Rogers, 151 Cal. 432, 90 P. 1062; Doehla v. Phillips, 151 Cal. 488, 91 P. 330; Demens v. Huene, 89 Cal. App. 748, 265 P. 389. These cases clearly settle the rule that under section 685, Code of Civil Procedure, the mere lapse of time after entry of judgment does not deprive the trial court of the power to order the issuance of execution.

[2, 3] The second ground requires an examination of the evidence before the trial court on the motions. In support of his motions appellant filed two affidavits, both made by himself. From these and the documentary evidence introduced it appears that in action

No. B3694 judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff for $1,760, together with $10.50 costs and $75 attorney's fees. In the other action, No. B3693, judgment was entered for the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage in the amount of $7,406.20, together with $11.25 costs and $350 attorney's fees. On March 14, 1916, the sheriff returned a decree of foreclosure partially satisfying the judgment in the foreclosure proceeding. Thereafter, and on October 27, 1917, Welk executed an assignment of judgment to a corporation, the Foundation Company which assigned "a certain judgment recovered by the party of the first part (Welk) on the 13th day of November 1913 * * * against Newton J. Skinner and W. J. Conner, for the sum of Seven Thousand Four Hundred Six and 20/100 Dollars ($7406.20) Eleven and 25/100 Dollars ($11.25) costs, and Three Hundred Fifty ($350.00) Dollars attorney's fees." It will be observed that these are the exact amounts for which judgment was entered in the foreclosure proceeding, No. B3693.

Subsequently, and on April 12, 1927, the Foundation Company assigned in writing to appellant all its interest in both judgments, Nos. B3693 and B3694.

Appellant in his affidavit stated that the true intention of the parties when the assignment was made to the Foundation Company in 1917 was that both judgments should be assigned; both judgments, so he claims, having been actually paid to Welk and satisfied on that date. This contention is supported in appellant's affidavits by a long, circumstantial recital of fact which, if believed, would support appellant's contention. The only real contradiction of the facts recited in these affidavits is found in the terms of the assignment from Welk to the Foundation Company and the fact that no effort was made to reform that assignment for a period of ten years after its execution. We disregard an affidavit of Welk's administrator setting out certain statements made by Welk before his death tending to show that the judgment in this action was never satisfied, because those statements are clearly self-serving declarations of the decedent.

In this state of the evidence appellant claims that it was an abuse of discretion for the court to disregard his evidence given by affidavit which, according to his contention, was absolutely uncontradicted. With this we cannot agree. There would be no security in any written document if after the death of one party to it the other party, by his own uncorroborated testimony, could compel a court to reform it, unless that testimony was contradicted by the testimony of other witnesses. If this were the law, the very purpose of reducing agreements to writing would frequently be thwarted. Welk, the owner of the judgment, has been removed by death beyond reach of the process of any earthly court. He has left, however, his own written assignment to the Foundation Company, which very clearly operates to assign one judgment, and just as clearly, on its face, does not operate to assign the other. The reference in the assignment to the exact amounts of the judgment in the foreclosure action makes this unmistakable.

While the precise question raised in this case has not been presented to the appellate courts of this state, authority is not wanting from other jurisdictions. In Moore v. Crawford, 130 U. S. 122, 9 S. Ct. 447, 450, 32 L. Ed. 878, the Supreme Court of the United States, quoting with approval from Kent v. Lasley, 24 Wis. 654, said: "It is only when an oral agreement is clearly and satisfactorily proven by testimony above suspicion and beyond reasonable doubt that it will be enforced to establish rights in land at variance with the muniments of title, and it is open to question 'whether, in any case, after the decease of the grantee, the unaided testimony of the grantor alone, however intelligible and credible he may be as a witness, should be held sufficient to set aside and invalidate the title claimed under it.'"

In Harter v. Christoph, 32 Wis. 245, the court said that "it would be an extreme case which would justify the court in reforming or defeating a written instrument for a mistake therein, upon the uncorroborated testimony of a party to it, although such testimony was uncontradicted."

In Zeilda Forsee Inv. Co. v. Ozenberger, 132 Mo. App. 409, 112 S. W. 22, 23, the Missouri Court of Appeals made the following statement: "We are not called upon and do not hold that the testimony of single witness might not be sufficient to support a decree for reformation of a written instrument. But we do hold that, in an instance of that kind, the court should proceed with great care and caution, and, unless the testimony of the witness be very clear and positive and consistent with all the other facts and circumstances, to refuse reformation."

To similar effect see Crilly v. Board of Education of Chicago, 54 Ill. App. 371; 34 Cyc. p. 989.

[4] There is a presumption of law that a written instrument, deliberately executed, correctly expresses the intention of the parties. 22 Cal. Jur. pp. 739, 740, § 22; Penney v. Simmons, 99 Cal. 380, 382, 33 P. 1121; Mathoney v. Bostwick, 96 Cal. 53, 58, 30 P. 1020, 31 Am. St. Rep. 175; Burt v. Los Angeles Olive Growers Ass'n, 175 Cal. 668, 675, 166 P. 993. This presumption, while disputable, is itself evidence sufficient to support the implied finding of the court in this case (10 Cal. Jur., pp. 744-745, § 64; Estate of Wiechers, 199 Cal. 523, 530, 250 P. 397), even though contradicted by the appellant's testimony.

"The courts have frequently held the testimony of a single witness not to be such clear and convincing proof as is required to sustain a verdict or finding where it was offered for the purpose of varying or contradicting a writing, or was opposed by a strong presumption of law, as, for instance, the presumption that a written instrument expresses the real intention of the parties." 23 C. J., pp. 54, 55.

It follows that the trial court was not bound to decide that the assignment from Welk to the Foundation Company did not correctly state the intention of the parties.

The orders appealed from are accordingly affirmed.

WORK v. ASSOCIATED ALMOND GROWERS OF PASO ROBLES. (Civ. 3914.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 29, 1929.

1. Contracts ⇨170(1)—Where language of contract raises question of doubtful construction, courts will follow practical construction of parties.

Where terms of contract or language raises question of doubtful construction, and it appears that parties themselves have practically interpreted their contract, courts will follow that practical construction.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇨61—Purchaser's acts as to possession, payment of taxes, etc., held to estop purchaser from claiming option agreement dealt only with land then owned by vendors, where, before tender, vendors acquired other land within boundaries of ranch.

Acts of purchaser as to possession, payment of taxes, removal of buildings, and preparation of map and retention of additional land held to estop purchaser from claiming that option agreement giving purchaser option on land described, and all that portion of tract of 6,000 acres remaining after selection of described parcels, dealt only with land then owned by vendors, where, before tender, they acquired additional land embraced within exterior boundary fences of vendors' ranch.

3. Accord and satisfaction ⇨11(1)—Compromise and settlement ⇨5(2)—Essential element in accord and satisfaction by tender of check is that tender is subject to condition that acceptance is satisfaction in full.

It is an essential element in accord and satisfaction by tender of check that tender is subject to condition that acceptance of check is satisfaction in full.

4. Accord and satisfaction ⇨26(3)—Compromise and settlement ⇨23(3)—Correspondence did not establish accord and satisfaction of purchase price of land.

Correspondence between vendors and a trust company acting for the parties, showing there was uncertainty as to exact acreage upon which price per acre was to be computed, and stating that, if figures submitted did not agree, statement of amount claimed be sent, so that difference might be checked, did not establish an accord and satisfaction of purchase price of land.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Action to recover the unpaid balance of the purchase price of real property by John Work and another against the Associated Almond Growers of Paso Robles. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. G. Griffith and Griffith & Thornburgh, of Santa Barbara, for appellant.

C. F. Lacey, of Salinas, for respondents.

PULLEN, Justice pro tem. The defendant appeals from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs who sued for a balance on the purchase price of real property. Negotiations were carried on in behalf of the parties to this appeal, which culminated in an option agreement, the portion which is essential to a determination of this appeal being as follows:

"Whereas, the sellers are owners of certain lands in San Luis Obispo and Monterey counties, California, containing approximately six thousand (6000) acres, more particularly described in parcels as follows:

"Parcel No. 1. All that portion of said tract of 6000 acres of land lying south of the county road in sections 27, 33 and 34, and the land in San Luis Obispo county joining said section 33 on the south.

"Parcel No. 2. All of said tract of 6000 acres lying north of the south line of sections 15 and 16 in said township 24 south of range 13 east, M. D. M.

"Parcel No. 3. All that part of said tract of 6000 acres lying south of the north line of section twenty-nine, in township 24 south of range 13 east, M. D. M., and including all lands in township 25 south, in San Luis Obispo county, and that part of section thirty-three lying north of the county road running through said section thirty-three, excepting however all of section 34 embraced in the foregoing description.

"Parcel No. 4. All that part of said tract of 6000 acres lying east of the north and south line between sections 21 and 22 and sections 27 and 28 in said township 24 south of range 13 east, M. D. M.

"Parcel No. 5. All that part of said tract of 6000 acres remaining after the selection of the foregoing described parcels.

"And the said buyer desires an option upon said lands in order that he may be able to sell the same, and have said land planted to fruit and nut trees."

At the time of the execution of this agreement the acreage owned in fee by respondent ents, as ascertained by surveys subsequent to the execution of the option, was considerably less than 6,000 acres, but after the execution of the option, and before tender thereunder, respondents had acquired title to 6,028.15 acres, and claim that was the acreage contemplated, whereas appellant urges that only the land to which respondents had title in fee, together with a portion owned by a son of the respondents, was included in the option, and amounted to 5,708.01 acres. It is true that at the time of the execution of the option respondents had record title to less than 6,000 acres, but embraced within the exterior boundary fences of respondents' ranch, and in his possession for many years, were parcels of land standing in the names of—Pence 160 acres, Colyer 80 acres, 80 acres of unpatented government land, and 597.68 acres in the name of Robert Work, already referred to as a son of respondents. Appellant contends that the option agreement clearly shows on its face that the parties dealt only with the land then owned by respondents, approximating 6,000 acres in extent, situate in the counties named.

The descriptive clause, such as "all lands and real estate belonging to the said party of the first part, wherever the same may be situated," etc., has been held sufficient, in a number of California cases, starting with Lick v. O'Donnell, 3 Cal. 59, 58 Am. Dec. 383, but here, neither the respondents nor appellant ask that the option be given its literal construction, for, as to the 597.68 acres belonging to Robert Work, appellant concedes that title to that did not stand in the name of respondents at the date of the option, but, nevertheless, they claim it was conveyed by the option. Just how appellant differentiates the Robert Work land from the Pence or Colyer land we fail to see.

An examination of the record shows that, when the appellant's representatives went upon the land, they were taken to an elevated point near the center of the ranch, and the fence lines were pointed out, but declined to make a more detailed tour, although urged to do so by respondents; that they had maps prepared for subdivision purposes embracing the entire ranch, which included the Pence, Colyer, and Robert Work tracts; that they paid taxes on the entire 6,028.15 acres for the first two years of their occupancy; that they removed buildings from the Colyer property and planted a considerable portion of the Robert Work tract to almonds and leased a part of the land in dispute to others.

In the particular descriptions included in the parcels 1, 2, 3 and 4, the boundaries are given with reference to roads or section lines, paragraph 5 using the language, "all that part of said tract of 6000 acres remaining after the selection of the foregoing described parcels," which clearly indicates some physical external boundaries within which the approximate 6,000 acres lay, and undoubtedly that boundary was the exterior fence seen by the parties at the time the ranch was viewed. It also appears in evidence that the appellant, in its maps and correspondence, referred to the tract as the "Independence Ranch," which was the familiar neighborhood name given to the entire tract occupied by respondents, and within their exterior fence lines.

[1, 2] In determining the meaning of a written agreement, the courts have always given the utmost consideration to the interpretation which the parties themselves have placed upon it, as evidence of their acts, "and in all cases where the terms of their contract, or the language they employ, raises a question of doubtful construction, and it appears that the parties themselves have practically interpreted their contract, the courts will follow that practical construction. It is to be assumed that parties to a contract best know what was meant by its terms, and are the least liable to be mistaken as to its intention; that each party is alert to his own interests, and to insistence on his rights, and that whatever is done by the parties contemporaneously with the execution of the contract is done under its terms as they understood and intended it should be. * * * In its execution, every executory contract requires more or less of a practical construction to be given it by the parties, and when this has been given, the law, in any subsequent litigation which involves the construction of the contract, adopts the practical construction of the parties as the true construction, and as the safest rule to be applied in the solution of the difficulty." Mitau v. Roddan, 149 Cal. 14, 84 P. 145, 150, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 275. In the case just cited it is also said: "Parties to a contract have a right to place such an interpretation upon its terms as they see fit, even when such an interpretation is apparently contrary to the ordinary meaning of its provisions." The unequivocal acts on the part of the appellant, as to the possession, payment of taxes, removal of buildings, and preparation of maps, and the retention of the Robert Work land, are sufficient in themselves to defeat the contention it now advances, and to estop the defendant from insisting upon its present interpretation of the option.

[3, 4] Appellant also contends that, based upon certain correspondence and payments between respondents and a trust company acting for the parties herein, an accord and satisfaction has been established, but an examination of the correspondence does not justify such conclusion. "It is an essential element in accord and satisfaction by tender of a check, that the tender is subject to the condition that the acceptance of the check is satisfaction in full. This condition is not shown by the mere fact that the debtor accompanies the check with an account showing a balance equal to the amount of the check, and it is disproved where the giving and acceptance of the check is followed by such conduct of both parties as clearly shows that they did not consider the check a final settlement of the debt." 1 Cal. Jur., par. 10; Lapp v. Muscoy, 166 Cal. 27, 134 P. 989; Duncan v. F. A. Hihn Co., 27 Cal. App. 155, 148 P. 971; 1 Cor. Jur., p. 558. An examination of the correspondence between the parties shows that there was still an uncertainty as to the exact acreage upon which the price per acre was to be computed, and, in substance, practically all the letters from the trust company addressed to the bank acting for respondents stated that, if the figures submitted by the trust company did not agree with the figures of respondents, a statement of the amount claimed be sent, so that the difference might be checked. This falls considerably short of the requirement to establish an accord and satisfaction.

The court below computed the balance due upon an exact acreage of 6,000 acres, rather than upon the acreage determined by the survey, to wit, 6,028.15, but, inasmuch as no objection has been urged to the findings in this particular, we adopt the same as a basis of computation, although it is not perhaps strictly in accordance with the testimony or the evidence adduced.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by Raymond Roach and wife against the Wells Fargo Bank & Union Trust Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiffs are husband and wife. The wife joined her husband and commenced an action to recover damages for personal injuries. The defendant answered, and a trial was had before the court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, and, from the judgment entered thereon, the defendant has appealed.

In the complaint it is alleged: That the defendant is a corporation and that it owns and operates an office building at the corner of Montgomery and Market streets in San Francisco. That on the 19th day of March, 1926, it maintained on the tenth floor of said building a restroom for the general use and benefit of women who had occasion to use the facilities of said building. " * * * That on said date said defendant Wells Fargo Bank & Union Trust Company, a corporation, negligently and carelessly maintained the entrance to said rest room in this: that entrance to said rest room was gained from the hallway on said tenth floor of said office building through a doorway in which said doorway was hung a solid panel door, which said door opened inwards from said hallway into said rest room; that immediately inside of the threshold of said doorway was a step about five inches in height down which all persons entering said rest room from said hallway would be compelled to step; that by reason of the construction of said doorway and said step it was impossible for any person, not familiar with said construction of said doorway and said step, to know of the existence of said step located immediately inside of the threshold of said doorway and immediately inside of said door as aforesaid;" that on the 19th day of March, 1926, Clara J. Roach had occasion to call on one of the tenants in said building and while in said building to visit said restroom; that she did not know of the construction nor of the existence of said step; that she attempted to pass through the doorway into said restroom, and in so attempting she fell to the floor inside of said restroom and suffered the injuries for which she asked damages. The defendant answered, and, among other things, pleaded the contributory negligence of the said Clara J. Roach.

[1] Both parties agree that under the facts the defendant owed to the plaintiffs the duty to exercise reasonable care to keep its premises safe, but the defendant asserts that the plaintiffs failed to prove any negligence on the part of the defendant, that is, that the defendant omitted to exercise reasonable care. In making this assertion the defendant fails to appreciate the force and effect of the evidence produced by the plaintiffs. To prove their case the plaintiffs called witnesses and elicited such evidence as showed the accident. They also introduced evidence which showed the exact manner in which the door, the step, and the surroundings were constructed. Having done so, they called Wallace H. Hubbert, an architect. They proved his experience in building and his familiarity with the construction of a great many office buildings in and about San Francisco, and they also proved that he had made an examination of the identical door and step that is involved in this litigation. That witness testified that the customary method of construction under the circumstances involved in this case was to construct a platform on the inside of the door; that it is customary to have a platform at least the width of the stairway; that a platform 7½ inches wide would not be good construction, but would be very poor construction; it would not be the customary and usual construction, and the construction of this particular door and step is not customary. After this testimony had been given, there was sufficient evidence to warrant the trial court in submitting the question of negligence to the jury. Long v. John Breuner Co., 36 Cal. App. 630, 172 P. 1132.

[2] The defendant claims that the plaintiff Clara J. Roach was guilty of contributory negligence. This attack rests upon the contention that Mrs. Roach was looking directly ahead and did not look down at the floor, and, if she had looked down, she would have been able to see that there was a variation in levels between the outside room and the inside room. All of these matters in the instant case presented questions of fact which were properly left to the jury. Long v. John Breuner Co., supra; Siegmán v. Fetters, 59 Cal. App. 114, 210 P. 49.

[3] In short, Long v. John Breuner Co., supra, is determinative of both questions presented in this case. In so holding we have not overlooked the fact that it has been held that a door between two apartments is a warning to those entering, who were not acquainted, to ascertain whether the floors of the two adjoining apartments are on the same level. Hertz v. Advertiser Co., 201 Ala. 416, 78 So. 794, L. R. A. 1918F, 137, and cases there cited; Main v. Lehman, 294 Mo. 579, 243 S. W. 91. Assuming, without deciding, that the door was a warning of change of levels, the plaintiff could assume the change was properly constructed. Madigan v. O. A. Hale & Co., 90 Cal. App. 151, 265 P. 574.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

MARYLAND CASUALTY CO. v. LITTLE
et al. (Civ. 43.)

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California. Nov. 27, 1929.

1. Partnership ⇌259½, 262—Partnership having no fixed term may be dissolved by agreement or by will of one of partners.

Where there is no fixed term for the existence of the partnership, it may be dissolved by the agreement of the partners or by will of one of them.

2. Partnership ⇌296(3)—Agreement of partners or decision of one partner to dissolve firm may be proved by circumstances.

Agreement of partners for dissolution of partnership or will of one partner to dissolve firm may be proved by circumstances as well as direct evidence.

3. Partnership ⇌296(3)—Uncontradicted evidence of complete cessation of partnership business and division of assets without objection forces conclusion of dissolution of partnership by agreement.

Complete cessation of partnership business and division of all or major portion of its assets, without any objection, is sufficient to force conclusion of dissolution of partnership by agreement, if not explained or refuted.

4. Partnership ⇌296(3)—That affairs of partnership are not entirely liquidated cannot overcome satisfactory evidence of dissolution.

Fact that affairs of partnership are not entirely liquidated, and that some bills remain unpaid and some property remains undivided, cannot overcome satisfactory evidence of dissolution, since liquidation generally follows dissolution; dissolution representing demise of partnership, and liquidation the settlement of the estate.

5. Evidence ⇌53—Presumption is dispelled when facts contrary to presumption are proved.

Presumptions are allowed to stand merely in lieu of proof of facts, and, when fact is proved contrary to presumption, presumption no longer exists.

6. Partnership ⇌296(3)—In suit against members of partnership on note given by one partner, evidence required finding of dissolution of partnership prior to execution of note (Civ. Code, §§ 2449, 2450, 2458, 2462).

In suit against members of partnership on note given by one of partners for unpaid premiums on policies written for benefit of partnership, evidence of prior liquidation of partnership held to require finding that on date of execution of note partnership has been dissolved, under Civ. Code, §§ 2449, 2450, so that the note was not binding on the other partner, because not a partnership obligation under sections 2458 and 2462.

7. Partnership ⚡285—Dissolution of partnership terminates authority of one of partners to create new partnership obligation.

When partnership is dissolved, authority of one partner to create new obligation for partnership is revoked, and his agency for his copartner ends.

8. Partnership ⚡286—Silent partner held not estopped from denying liability on note executed by copartner because of prior dissolution of firm, where note was given for premiums charged to copartner, and copartner informed creditor of suit between partners (Civ. Code, §§ 2449, 2450, 2458, 2462).

Silent partner in firm of grading contractors held not estopped to deny authority of copartner to execute partnership note on ground of prior dissolution of partnership under Civ. Code, §§ 2449, 2450, 2458, 2462, where premiums for which note was given had been charged to his copartner, and where copartner informed creditor of pendency of suit between the partners which would determine who would pay for the premiums.

9. Partnership ⚡296(1)—Insurance company suing on note given by one partner for premiums after partnership's dissolution could not recover against remaining partner as on book account by remitting interest and attorney's fees (Civ. Code, §§ 2458, 2462).

Where insurance company, instead of suing members of partnership on book account for premiums, sued on note executed by one partner after dissolution of partnership, no recovery could be had on the note, though insurance company remitted all claim to accrued interest and attorney's fees, since note did not bind remaining partner under Civ. Code, §§ 2458, 2462.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; A. C. Finney, Judge.

Action by the Maryland Casualty Company against Leroy Little and Walter K. Bowker, Sr., copartners doing business under the name of Leroy Little Wo. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant last named appeals. Reversed as to last-named defendant.

Wright & McKee and C. M. Monroe, all of San Diego, for appellant.

Utley & Nuffer, of El Centro, for respondent.

MARKS, J. Respondent instituted this action against defendants to recover judgment upon a promissory note dated August 6, 1923, given by Leroy Little, and signed by him "Leroy Little Wo," by the terms of which the maker promised to pay respondent $2,412.13, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, together with attorney's fees in the sum of 10 per cent. of the principal and accrued interest, in case suit was instituted to collect such note. A second cause of action was abandoned by respondent at the time of trial. Judgment was rendered in favor of respondent for the principal sum of the note only, as it waived interest and attorney's fees.

The complaint alleged that the defendant Leroy Little Wo was a copartnership consisting of Leroy Little and Walter K. Bowker, Sr., and as such executed the note in question. The defendant Leroy Little did not appear, and judgment went against him by default. Appellant, in his answer, alleged that the partnership between himself and Little had been dissolved and ceased to exist long prior to the date of the note, and denied that it was a partnership obligation, and that anything was owed to respondent by him. The trial court found that the partnership had not been dissolved at the date of the note, and that it was a partnership obligation, and rendered judgment accordingly.

The appellant presents numerous assignments of error upon which he relies for a reversal of the judgment, but, as they largely center around the question of the date of the dissolution of the partnership, it will be necessary to consider but three of them, namely: (1) When was the partnership dissolved? (2) Had Leroy Little any authority to sign the partnership name to this note on August 6, 1923? (3) Are there any facts in the record which would estop appellant from asserting the dissolution of the partnership, and the lack of authority on the part of Leroy Little to sign the partnership name to the note?

There was very little conflict in the evidence before the trial court. It was not disputed that in the year 1919 Leroy Little and Walter K. Bowker, Sr., entered into a partnership under the name of Leroy Little Wo for the purpose of conducting business as grading contractors operating in the Imperial Valley and Mexico; that the property of the partnership consisted principally of horses, mules, harness, grading machinery, tools, and other such equipment incident to the partnership business; that all the contracts were taken in the name of Leroy Little, who had active charge and management of the business; that the partnership carried workmen's compensation insurance in large amounts with respondent as insurance carrier; that the policies were written through H. H. Griswold, deceased, at the time of the trial, with Leroy Little named as the sole beneficiary in all of them; that the premiums were all charged on Griswold's books to Little individually; that during the life of the partnership Little carried on farming operations of his own, and also did some grading independent of the partnership work; that the insurance policies covered three classes of work, namely, farm labor, grading, and irrigation work; that the principal sum of the promissory note was computed from the unpaid portions of insurance premiums issued to Leroy Little by the respondent as insurance carrier as follows: Policy No. 150217, term January 24, 1920, to January 24, 1921, balance unpaid, $2,353.75; policy No. 199904, term January 24, 1921, to January 24, 1922, balance unpaid, $152.60; total $2,506.35, less $94.22 unearned portion of the advance premium paid on policy No. 223931, term January 24, 1922, to January 24, 1923, leaving a net balance of $2,412.13 unpaid at the date of the note. The last contract of the partnership was for grading and ditch work in Mexico. The partners evidently had trouble of some kind which resulted in personal feeling between them, and during December, 1920, they commenced to divide their assets. Appellant sent a Mr. Irwin down to represent him in the settlement of the partnership affairs and the division of its property. The last contract was fully performed in February or March, 1921, and none other was taken, and no more work was done by it. Each partner took for himself part of the property belonging to the partnership, and the major part of its assets were divided at the completion of the contract in Mexico. Some litigation, probably a suit for an accounting, was instituted between Little and Bowker which was pending on August 6, 1923, and was apparently compromised in 1926. All of the partnership property had not been fully and finally divided, either on the date of the note or at the time of the trial of this action on March 28, 1927; the amount jointly held not appearing. Little and Bowker were each owners of the capital stock in the Circle Bar Cattle Company, a corporation, but this partnership did not hold any of that stock.

Leroy Little was called as a witness for respondent, and testified in substance to the circumstances under which he gave the note as follows: "I had a conversation with Mr. Wankowski, head of the Maryland Casualty Company, who came over to get a settlement of the insurance. I made arrangements with Mr. Griswold to execute the note. I told them that there was a case in court, and I did not feel like I wanted to settle the bill because it was—Mr. Bowker owed half of it, and when the case would be settled then it would be determined who had to pay this bill. I told Mr. Griswold and Mr. Wankowski that the partnership had quit work."

It appears that in January, 1923, an attorney representing appellant, and W. A. Roberts, who had been bookkeeper for the partnership, called upon Mr. Griswold concerning insurance written by him for Leroy Little, and in substance the following conversation was had: "Mr. Griswold asked Mr. Roberts if, as near as I can recollect it, if this Bowker and Little business, if it hadn't been—If that wasn't all closed up yet, stating that he thought that it had all been closed up and forgotten about long ago." Another witness testified that in this conversation Mr. Griswold asked some other questions about the affairs of Leroy Little, to which Mr. Roberts replied that, of course, they had long ago divided up the property, but that the accounts as between them had not been finally settled.

The trial court found that the entire principal sum of the note was composed of the unpaid premiums on policies written for the benefit of the partnership. A careful reading of the transcript throws serious doubt on the correctness of this finding. Little was engaged in farming and grading operations of his own, and seemed to have no policies of insurance other than the ones in question here covering his personal undertakings. According to the testimony of W. A. Roberts, it would seem that a part of the insurance premiums represented by the note were earned under charges for the private operations of Little. However, there is some testimony in the record supporting the finding, so we will not disturb it here. The action was upon a promissory note, and neither party was prepared with evidence of the exact source of the debt, as this was not one of the issues raised by the pleadings. The action was not one for an accounting between the partners.

Under the law as it existed at the time of the transactions in question, where no general term is prescribed by agreement for the duration of a general partnership, it may be dissolved by a partner or by operation of law. Section 2449, Civ. Code; Ross et al. v. Cornell, 45 Cal. 133; Wagner v. Wagner, 50 Cal. 76. If there is no time prescribed by agreement for the duration of a general partnership, it may be totally dissolved by the expressed will of any partner. Section 2450, Civ. Code; Shuken v. Cohen, 179 Cal. 279, 176 P. 447; McCauley v. Eyraud, 87 Cal. App. 121, 261 P. 760; Wilson v. Brown (Cal. App.) 273 P. 847. After the dissolution of a partnership, one partner cannot create any new obligation in the name of the partnership. Sections 2458, 2462, Civ. Code.

[1-4] Throughout this case respondent has confused the dissolution of a partnership with the liquidation of its affairs. The partnership may be dissolved by agreement of the partners, or the will of one of them, where there is no fixed term of its existence. Such agreement, or the will of one, may be proven by all the circumstances of the case as well as by direct evidence. Complete cessation of partnership business and a division of all, or a major portion of its assets without any objection, express or implied, is strong evidence of an agreement to dissolve. If not explained or refuted, it is sufficient to force the conclusion of a dissolution by agreement. Nielson v. Gross, 17 Cal. App. 74, 118 P. 725. After dissolution, liquidation of the partnership follows. It does not usually precede dissolution, and, because the affairs of the partnership are not entirely liquidated, and some bills remain unpaid, and some property is not divided, cannot overcome satisfactory evidence of dissolution. Dissolution represents the demise of a partnership, and liquidation the settlement of the estate.

[5, 6] Respondent contends that, because the partnership was proven to have once existed, there was a presumption that it continued, sufficient to support the findings of the trial court that it had not been dissolved on August 6, 1923. The law is to the contrary as announced in Maupin v. Solomon, 41 Cal. App. 323, 183 P. 198, as follows: "‘Presumptions,’ such as the one relied on here, ‘are allowed to stand not against the facts they represent but in lieu of proof of facts, and when the fact is proven contrary to the presumption no conflict arises, but the presumption is simply overcome and dispelled.’ (Savings & Loan Soc. v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514, [39 P. 922]). The authorities in this state abundantly support this view.”

[7] The authority of a partner to bind his copartner in the creation of an indebtedness finds its source in the doctrine of agency. When the partnership is dissolved, the authority to create a new obligation is revoked and the agency ends. Steinbach v. Smith, 34 Cal. App. 223, 167 P. 189.

In Rassaert v. Mensch, 17 Cal. App. 637, 120 P. 1072, 1075, it was held as follows: “A mere dissolution has no effect whatever on the property of the partners, or their interest in the joint stock or joint rights, or their power over old existing debts due to them or due from them; excepting always that they all entirely lost the power of acting for each other, any further than all joint debtors or joint creditors may do.”

[8] There is nothing in the record upon which to base the argument that appellant was estopped from denying the authority of Little to execute a partnership note on August 6, 1923. The insurance policies were all written in the name of Leroy Little and the premiums charged to him. Appellant was a silent partner, and it does not definitely appear that respondent or its agents knew that he was a member of the firm. It does appear that before the note was executed Little told both Wankowski and Griswold that a suit was pending between himself and appellant which would determine who would pay it, and that the partnership, Leroy Little & Co., had ceased operating. This was sufficient to put respondent upon its notice.

[9] During the trial respondent remitted all claim to accrued interest and attorney's fees. This was evidently an attempt to reduce the judgment to an amount it might have recovered had the action been brought on the book account and to attempt to avoid the effect of Steinbach v. Smith, supra. The vice of this action at the trial was that it did not change the condition created by the giving of the note. The waiver of a legal right by respondent still left the contract in its original form. Respondent had its choice of remedies when the action was instituted. If it had been based on the book account different issues would have been joined, and appellant would have had the opportunity to present evidence that he clearly did not have at hand during the trial. We do not believe that remitting the interest and attorney's fees cured the mistake of bringing the action upon the note. Respondent's counsel at the trial, and before this court, did not represent it at the time the suit was filed.

The judgment against appellant is reversed.

PEOPLE v. BALL. (Cr. 1861.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 5, 1929.

1. Forgery $\S$ 44(1/2)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of forgery.

Evidence tending to identify defendant as person passing bogus check to merchant held sufficient to sustain conviction for forgery.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 1159(2)—Reviewing court is bound by verdict of guilty based on sufficient evidence, in absence of prejudicial error affecting defendant's substantial rights.

Reviewing court is bound by jury's verdict of guilty based on sufficient evidence, in absence of prejudicial error occurring at trial affecting substantial rights of defendant.

3. Forgery $\S$ 34(1)—Proof of corporate existence of corporation named in information for forgery as having been defrauded was unnecessary, where existence of individual named therein was sufficiently shown.

In prosecution for forgery in which information charged defendant's commission of crime with intent to cheat and defraud certain individual and each of two corporations specified, it was unnecessary to prove the corporate existence of either of the corporations named in the information when the individual named was shown to exist.

4. Forgery $\S$ 44(1)—Proof of forgery sufficiently established intent to cheat or defraud person whose name was forged (Pen. Code, $\S$ 21; Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1962, subd. 1).

Defendant's intent to cheat or defraud person whose name was forged on check was sufficiently shown by defendant's commission of crime of forgery under Pen. Code, $\S$ 21, providing that intent with which act is done is manifested by circumstances surrounding its commission, and Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1962, subd. 1, by which conclusive presumption of malicious and guilty intent follows deliberate commission of unlawful act.

5. Criminal law ⇨369(4)—Evidence that witness' place of business was burglarized and certain blank checks stolen was material in forgery prosecution, where some of such checks were filled out and passed by defendant.

Evidence that place of business of witness had been burglarized and that certain blank checks had been stolen held material to issue in forgery prosecution, where defendant subsequently forged, uttered, and passed several checks executed on the stolen blanks and one of the checks was found on defendant's person.

6. Criminal law ⇨369(4)—Evidence of burglarizing of witness' place of business and theft of blank checks subsequently forged by defendant need not be excluded, in forgery prosecution, as proving another crime.

In prosecution for forgery, evidence that witness' place of business had been burglarized and certain blank checks had been stolen was not required to be excluded as tending to prove defendant guilty of another offense, where it appeared that some of the stolen checks had been filled out and passed by defendant and that one was found on defendant's person.

7. Criminal law ⇨1035(3)—Comment of trial judge on facts shown by undisputed evidence held not to require reversal, where there was no objection.

In forgery prosecution, remarks made by judge of trial court that "the check is a forgery and it was passed on a shoe store; the man received a pair shoes and money," held not to require reversal, where such statement was based on uncontradicted evidence, and judge instructed jury that they were the sole judges of the facts, and there was no objection made by defendant or assignment of misconduct or motion to strike or for instructions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles W. Fricke, Judge.

Bernard Ball was convicted of forgery, and of a prior conviction for forgery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Irvin C. Taplin and Harry M. Hunt, both of Los Angeles, and Will R. King, of Pasadena, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and W. R. Augustine, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant was convicted on each of two counts in an information wherein he was charged with the commission of the crime of forgery and a prior conviction of a charge of forgery, a felony. He appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. Other than as to the second count in the information, no serious effort is made by appellant to show that prejudicial error was committed by the trial court on the trial of the action.

[1, 2] Appellant's first contention is that the evidence adduced on the trial was insufficient to support the verdict. The evidence showed that the defendant Ball operated in company with his codefendant Welch, who confessed his own guilt, but asserted the innocence of defendant Ball. That the check was a forgery and that it was actually passed by some one, if not undisputed, is at least satisfactorily established by the evidence. The only question raised by appellant in that connection is whether the evidence sufficiently identified defendant Ball as the guilty person. The plan pursued by the defendant Welch, as well as by the individual who either accompanied him in his felonious work, or who operated on his own account in the transaction or transactions which were involved in the several charges against the defendant Welch and defendant Ball, was that the purchase of a pair of shoes was made by one of them and an indorsed check purporting to have been executed by Spencer & Morris and G. B. Morris in favor of one W. H. Johnson, for an amount approximating $35, was tendered in payment. In exchange for the check the purchaser obtained from the shoe merchant a pair of shoes and cash representing the difference between the price of the shoes and the face of the check. The evidence which tended to establish the identity of defendant as the passer of the check consisted of the following facts: The clerk in the shoe store to whom the bogus check was tendered testified that Welch was not the man with whom he dealt on the occasion in question, but that defendant Ball "appears to be the same man that gave me the check, but I don't think I am sure; * * * not quite sure. * * * He has a slight resemblance to the man that gave me the check." A police officer, who qualified as a handwriting expert, testified that in his opinion defendant Ball "wrote the face of the check." Three days after the forgery was committed the two defendants were arrested in each other's company. At that time one of the defendants was carrying a pair of shoes either in his hand or under his arm, and on the person of defendant Ball was found approximately $134 in cash and another check identical in form with the check which is the subject-matter of the second count of the information on which defendant Ball was convicted. With relation to the check found in the possession of defendant Ball, the arresting officer testified that at the time he took such check from defendant Ball, he (the officer) said to defendant Ball, "You didn't get this one passed yet, eh? to which defendant Ball replied, "No, we didn't get that one passed." That such evidence, together with the inferences properly deducible therefrom, was sufficient to support the verdict, this court entertains no doubt. The fact that the defendant Welch testified that he alone was the guilty person was not conclusive. The ultimate question of the guilt of defendant Ball was to be determined by the jury from all the evidence in the case, and since the jury by its verdict, based upon sufficient evidence, has declared that Ball was guilty of the offense of which he was accused, in the absence of prejudicial error occurring on the trial of the action affecting the substantial rights of the defendant, this court is bound by the verdict. The contention by appellant that the verdict could be reached only by basing one inference upon another inference is without merit.

[3] Appellant complains that, although by the information he was charged with the commission of the crime of forgery with the intent to cheat and defraud a certain individual and each of two corporations therein specified, no evidence was offered on the trial which either proved or tended to prove the corporate existence of such alleged corporations. However, it is not claimed that the evidence failed to show the existence of the named individual. That in such circumstances it became and was unnecessary to prove the corporate existence of either of the corporations named in the information is settled by the case of People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507, 519, 520. See, also, People v. Hughes, 29 Cal. 257; People v. Barric, 49 Cal. 342; People v. Ah Sam, 41 Cal. 645, 652; People v. Patterson, 42 Cal. App. 37, 183 P. 209; People v. Nelson, 90 Cal. App. 27, 35, 265 P. 366.

[4] It is also urged that no intent on the part of defendant Ball was shown to cheat or defraud either of the persons whose name was forged by said defendant. In that regard, the substance of section 21 of the Penal Code is that the intent or intention with which an act is done or performed is manifested by the circumstances surrounding the commission of such act; and the effect of the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 1962 of the Code of Civil Procedure is that a conclusive presumption of a malicious and guilty intent follows from the deliberate commission of an unlawful act—from which it results that the point presented by appellant is not well taken.

[5, 6] Prejudicial error is predicated upon the action of the trial court in overruling the objection interposed by defendant Ball to a line of questions propounded by the people to a witness regarding the loss by such witness of certain blank checks which included the particular check which was the subject-matter of the second count of the information in the action against said defendant. The evidence showed that the place of business of the witness and his partner had been burglarized and that certain blank checks of the partnership had been stolen. Other than that the defendants subsequently forged, uttered, and passed several checks which were executed on some of the blanks which had been stolen, together with the fact that one of the stolen checks purportedly executed by the partnership in favor of the same individual as was the questioned check was found on the person of defendant Ball, no evidence was introduced which in any way tended to connect defendant Ball with the crime of burglary. It is plain that the evidence to which objection is made, although not essential, nevertheless was material to the issue of the particular forgery for which crime defendant Ball was on trial; and the mere fact that such evidence had a tendency to prove that defendant Ball was also guilty of some other criminal offense presents no sufficient reason for its exclusion. 8 Cal. Jur. 71, and cases there cited.

[7] Finally it is contended by appellant that he was substantially prejudiced in the course of the trial by a remark made by the judge of the trial court that "the check is a forgery and it was passed on a shoe store; the man received a pair of shoes and some money." At the time such remark was made, evidence had been introduced relating to each of its several elements, to wit, that the check in question was a forgery; that it was "passed on a shoe store"; and that a man (not necessarily defendant Ball) "received a pair of shoes and some money." At no time during the course of the trial was any evidence introduced by either of the defendants which in any way contradicted either or any of such facts. Indeed, the defendant Welch, called as a witness in behalf of his codefendant Ball, gave testimony directly in substantiation thereof. In addition thereto, the judge of the trial court expressly instructed the jury in substance that it was the sole judge of the facts in the case and that it should disregard the expression of any opinion by the judge with reference to such facts. Moreover, although not necessarily conclusive against the position now assumed by appellant herein, it appears that neither at the time the remark in question was made, nor at any time thereafter, was any objection made by either of the defendants thereto; nor in that connection was any assignment made of misconduct of the court; nor was any motion made by either of the defendants to strike the remark from the record, or that the jury be either specifically or generally instructed to disregard it. It thus is apparent that appellant has no just cause for complaint.

No prejudicial error appearing in the record herein, it is ordered that the judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial be and they are affirmed.

LASKY et ux. v. AMERICAN INDEMNITY CO. (Civ. 6775.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 27, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 27, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 23, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1)—Appellate court cannot disturb trial court's finding, if supported by any substantial evidence.

Weight of evidence being for trial court to determine, the court of appeal's review is limited to ascertaining whether there is any substantial evidence to support finding, which cannot be disturbed in such case.

2. Mechanics' liens ⇨317—Owner's testimony held sufficient to support finding that owners did not falsely represent to surety on contractor's bond that exchange contract with contractor was no longer in effect (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183).

In owner's action against surety on building contractor's bond, given under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, plaintiff's testimony held sufficient to support trial court's finding that plaintiffs did not falsely represent to defendant, several days after execution and delivery of bond, that their contract to convey their equity in certain flats to contractor in part consideration of his conveyance of vacant lot and construction of apartment house thereon was no longer in effect.

3. Mechanics' liens ⇨317—Evidence warranted inference that owners informed surety on contractor's bond that exchange contract with contractor was still effective.

In owners' action against surety on contractor's bond, evidence of parties' acts and conduct held to warrant inference that plaintiffs informed defendant that contract to convey their equity in certain flats to contractor in part consideration of his conveyance of vacant lots to them and construction of apartment house thereon was still effective, as found by trial court, though there was no direct evidence to such effect.

4. Mechanics' liens ⇨315—Owners' failure to make cash payment, required by exchange contract with building contractor, held not to defeat nor induce recovery from surety on contractor's bond.

Owners' recovery from surety on contractor's bond after abandonment of work held not barred because of their failure to make first payment in cash, as provided by exchange contract with contractor, nor subject to reduction by such sum, in view of findings, supported by evidence, that surety knew of exchange contract, and that contractor realized more than such amount from incumbrances placed on property received in exchange.

5. Appeal and error ⇨877(2)—Surety liable for entire penal sum of contractor's bond cannot complain of judgment ordering payment thereof to clerk for distribution among owners and subcontractors as stipulated because some subcontractors sought no recovery on bond.

Surety liable for entire penal sum of building contractor's bond cannot complain of judgment ordering payment thereof to clerk of court for distribution among owners and subcontractors, as provided in stipulation between them, because some subcontractors sought no recovery on bond, as such arrangement did not increase amount of surety's liability, but merely increased number of persons participating in distribution.

6. Appeal and error ⇨877(2)—Owners could not object to modification of judgment against surety on contractor's bond so far as awarding costs to subcontractors not suing surety or seeking recovery on bond because they filed no cost bills.

Owners not being affected by modification of judgment against surety on contractor's bond so far as awarding costs to five of eleven subcontractors, whose actions to enforce liens were consolidated for trial with owners' action on bond, because four of such five did not sue surety, and the other sought no recovery on bond, were in no position to object on ground that none of the five filed cost bills.

7. Appeal and error ⇨873(1)—Portion of judgment as to costs is reviewable on appeal from entire judgment, though parties awarded costs filed no cost bills.

On appeal from entire judgment, the portion as to costs is subject to review, even if there is no showing that parties awarded costs filed cost bills.

8. Mechanics' liens ⇨310(1)—In equity action, such as suit to foreclose mechanics' liens, court may apportion costs between necessary parties.

In equity action, such as suit to foreclose mechanics' liens, the court, in its discretion, may apportion costs between the necessary parties.

9. Appeal and error ⇨882(1)—Surety moving to consolidate subcontractors' actions to enforce liens with owners' action on contractor's bond for trial invited error in awarding costs to subcontractors not suing surety or seeking recovery on bond.

Surety on contractor's bond invited error, if any, in awarding costs to subcontractors not suing surety or seeking recovery on bond, by moving for consolidation of their actions to enforce liens with owners' action on bond for trial, and hence cannot complain thereof on appeal, though not a necessary party to such subcontractors' actions.

10. Mechanics' liens ⇨310(1)—Award of costs to subcontractors, not suing surety on contractor's bond or seeking recovery thereon, did not deny substantial justice to surety, at whose instance their actions to enforce liens were consolidated with owners' action on bond.

Where subcontractors admittedly had cause of action on subcontractor's bond, and hence might have joined surety thereon as defendant in their actions to enforce liens by appropriate amendments, had they not been misled by consolidation of such actions with owners' action on bond at surety's instance and trial of case on such theory, award of costs to subcontractors not suing surety or seeking recovery on bond did not deprive surety of substantial justice.

11. Appeal and error ⇨768—Appellate court may assume as correct assertion in reply brief that certain fact was not disputed, where no testimony showing dispute was printed in appellant's brief.

Where surety, appealing from judgment on building contractor's bond, failed to print in its brief any portion of testimony showing that costs of completing building after contractor abandoned work was disputed by surety at trial, appellate court may assume as correct owners' assertion in their reply brief that no such dispute occurred, and that case was tried on theory that such cost was certain.

12. Interest ⇨47(1)—Interest was properly allowed from date of filing complaint in owners' action on contractor's bond, where parties treated cost of completing building abandoned by contractor as certain.

Where parties to owners' action against surety on building contractor's bond treated cost of completing building after contractor abandoned work as certain, court properly allowed interest from date of filing complaint rather than from date of judgment.

13. Appeal and error ⇨763—Contention, first urged in appellant's supplemental brief, filed after oral argument, that judgment was erroneous in allowing interest from filing of complaint, held too late for consideration.

Surety's contention, first urged in supplemental brief, filed after oral argument on appeal from judgment for owners on building contractor's bond, that judgment was erroneous in allowing interest from date of filing complaint rather than date of judgment, held too late for consideration, where no excuse was offered for delay.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action by Ben Lasky and wife against the American Indemnity Company, which filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Knight, Boland & Christin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Brownstone & Goodman and Goldman & Altman, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

GRAY, Justice pro tem. Defendant, the surety on a bond, given under the terms of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, appeals, under the alternative method, from a judgment ordering payment of the full penal sum to the clerk of the court, for distribution between the owners of the building and various lien claimants whose respective suits had been consolidated for trial on defendant's motion. But a brief statement of fact is necessary for an adequate consideration of defendant's contentions. Contemporaneously, the owners, hereinafter referred to as the plaintiffs, and a building contractor entered into two written contracts, the first, for the exchange of properties, and the second, for the construction of an apartment house. In the exchange contract plaintiffs agreed to convey to the contractor their equity in certain flats, at an agreed valuation of $10,000, and the contractor agreed to convey to plaintiffs a vacant lot and construct thereon, in accordance with the terms of the building contract, an apartment house at a total cost, for land and building, of $22,300, payable by a credit thereon, of said sum of $10,000, and balance as specified in building contract. It is undisputed that the parties, verbally, segregated the sum of $10,000 into two items; $3,500 for the price of the vacant lot, and $6,500 as the first payment on the cost of the apartment house. The building contract, in the ordinary terms usually used in such contracts, provided that the contractor would construct, according to plans and specifications, an apartment house, and that plaintiffs would pay therefor a total of $18,800, payable $6,500 forthwith, and the balance in four installments as the work progressed. On the next day defendant executed and delivered to plaintiffs its bond in the penal sum of $10,000. The contractor abandoned the work after receiving the second and third installment payments, amounting to $5,100. After notice and demand, defendant refused to complete the building contract, and the plaintiffs finished the building at a cost of $7,857.84 in excess of the contract price. The foregoing facts are undisputed.

[1-3] By way of cross-complaint, defendant sought a cancellation of its bond, alleging, briefly stated, that plaintiffs several days after the execution and delivery of the bond, falsely represented to it that the exchange contract was no longer in effect. The undisputed evidence discloses that, at such time, the plaintiff husband and a companion called at the office of defendant's general agent, at the latter's request, and there delivered to him copies of both contracts, that the agent retired to his private office for fifteen minutes, and, upon returning, conversed with the husband and his companion. What was said and done in this conversation is disputed by the parties. A stenographer of the agent, who died before trial, testified that, in response to the agent's inquiry, the companion said the exchange was no longer in effect, and that the husband concurred therein. Both these gentlemen denied that either made such statement, and both testified that the agent said that the contracts were all right. Upon this conflict the court found that the alleged misrepresentation had not been made. Urging that, as the stenographer's testimony is the more probable, it is entitled to the greater weight, defendant requests that we hold, upon a review of the evidence, that this finding is unsupported. Since the weight of evidence is for the trial court's determination, our review is limited to ascertaining whether there is any substantial evidence to support a finding, and, if there is, we cannot disturb it. 2 Cal. Jur. 935. It is apparent that plaintiff's testimony adequately supports this finding. Defendant further criticizes the court's additional finding that plaintiffs informed it that the exchange contract was still effective, on the ground that there is no direct evidence to that effect. While there is no such direct testimony, yet the trial court might well, as it impliedly did, infer such statement from the acts and conduct of the parties. Ryder v. Bamberger, 172 Cal. 791, 158 P. 753.

[4] In several different ways defendant argues that no recovery can be had on the bond, because plaintiffs did not pay in cash the sum of $6,500 as the first payment or that, if any recovery is had, the amount thereof should be reduced by such sum. This argument entirely ignores the above finding that it knew of the existence of the exchange contract, and, inferentially, contracted on the basis of its continued existence. It also overlooks another finding, not questioned by it, that the contractor, as part of the same transaction in which the two contracts were executed, realized from incumbrances placed by him on the flats money in excess of $6,500. Therefore, indirectly, the contractor did receive from plaintiffs the first payment, and defendant was not injured by the existence of the exchange contract.

[5] Eleven subcontractors sued to foreclose their liens. In six of these actions a cause of action upon the bond was stated, and in four of the six defendant was named as a party. The court found that the claims of plaintiffs in these four actions amounted to $4,559.93, that plaintiffs in the instant case were entitled to recover $7,857.48, and that the aggregate of these two sums exceeded the penal sum of $10,000 named in the bond. Upon defendant's motion these eleven actions were consolidated for trial with the instant case. Pursuant to stipulation between plaintiffs and the eleven subcontractors, the judgment ordered defendant to pay to the clerk of the court the sum of $10,000, and authorized the latter to distribute this sum as provided in the stipulation. Half-heartedly, defendant, ignoring their literal wording, attempts to misconstrue the findings as authorizing judgment against it and in favor of subcontractors who sought no recovery on the bond. By stipulation those entitled to judgment under their pleadings permitted others not so entitled to participate in their judgments. This arrangement followed in the judgment did not increase the amount for which defendant was legally liable, but merely, by way of assignment, increased the number of persons participating in the distribution of the sums legally recoverable. As defendant was not injured thereby, it has no cause of complaint. Robinson v. Western States Gas, etc., Co., 184 Cal. 401, 194 P. 39.

[6-10] Defendant requests a modification of that portion of the judgment awarding costs to all plaintiffs in the consolidated actions, in so far as it awards such costs to five of such plaintiffs, because four of such five did not sue defendant, and the other sought no recovery on the bond. Plaintiffs Lasky, there being no briefs on behalf of any of the subcontractors, object to a consideration of this request on the ground that the record does not show that any of such five plaintiffs filed cost bills. Obviously, since such modification does not affect the objecting plaintiffs, they are not in a position to object. But, as the appeal has been taken from the entire judgment, the portion as to costs is subject to review, even if there is no showing of such filing. White v. Gaffney, 1 Cal. App. 715, 82 P. 1088. In an equity action in which class such consolidated actions to foreclose mechanics' liens fall, the court, in its discretion, may apportion costs between the necessary parties. Clark v. Brown, 141 Cal. 93, 74 P. 548. Technically, defendant was not a necessary party in those actions in which it was not named or in which no recovery was sought, but practically, it was, as it stated in its motion for such consolidation and as the cases were tried after such consolidation. The error, if any, was invited by its own request for such consolidation, and therefore it cannot now complain. McCabe v. Goodwin, 106 Cal. 486, 39 P. 941. As such five plaintiffs admittedly had a cause of action on the bond, they might, had they not been misled by the consolidation and the theory upon which the cases were actually tried, by appropriate amendments, have joined the defendant. Therefore it cannot be said that defendant failed to receive substantial justice as to the awarding of costs. Dunlap v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 50 Cal. App. 476, 195 P. 688.

[11-13] Defendant, for the first time in its supplemental brief, filed after oral argument, urges, upon the authority of Perry v. Magnuson (Cal. Sup.) 279 P. 650, that the judgment is erroneous in allowing interest from date of filing the complaint. The cited case holds that, in an action by an owner to recover the cost of completion of building abandoned by the contractors, from the surety on a bond to save such owner harmless from loss resulting from a breach of the building contract, interest from the commencement of the action should not be allowed, where the evidence is conflicting as to such cost and the amount thereof is uncertain, till determined by the judgment. Since defendant has utterly failed to print in its brief any portion of the testimony showing that the cost of completion was disputed by it at the trial, we may assume as correct plaintiffs' assertion, in their reply brief, that no such dispute occurred, and that the case was tried upon the theory that such cost was certain. Firpo v. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co., 80 Cal. App. 122, 251 P. 657. If the parties treated such cost as certain, the court properly allowed interest from date of filing the complaint. There is also merit in plaintiffs' objection to consideration of this contention because of its lateness without any excuse offered for the delay. 2 Cal. Jur. 734.

HAMILTON v. HOLLMAN. (Civ. 6114.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 26, 1929.

Husband and wife  279(6)—Judgment obtained by wife against husband held not "payment" of amount sued for terminating husband's obligation to make monthly payments pursuant to contract.

Where contract between husband and wife fixing property settlement provided that monthly payments should entirely cease when sum of $8,500, for which husband had given promissory note, was fully paid, husband's obligation to make monthly payments did not terminate on wife obtaining judgment for the $8,500, since such judgment did not have legal effect of constituting a payment of said sum; "payment" being that which parties to contract agree shall be accepted as such.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Payment.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Eleanore E. Hamilton against F. W. Hollman. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Charles W. Byrnes and Robert L. McWilliams, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Harry I. Stafford and Edward A. Cunha, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The parties to the above action, who were formerly husband and wife, made a property settlement on July 14, 1921. The material parts of the agreement in which the defendant is named as the first party and the plaintiff as the second party are as follows: "The parties hereto have agreed and do hereby agree as follows, to wit: 1. That said first party hereby agrees to pay said second party the sum of Fifteen hundred dollars ($1,500) upon the execution of this agreement, and the additional sum of Eight thousand five hundred dollars ($8,500) within three years from the date hereof. Said sum of $8,500 to be evidenced by a promissory note a copy of which is hereto annexed and made a part hereof. * * * 2. That said party of the first part further agrees to pay said party of the second part the sum of $150 per month, in advance, beginning with the date hereof, until the remarriage or death of said second party, or payment of said sum of $8,500. It is further understood and agreed that said payments of $150 per month shall be reduced pro rata with the reduction by payments of the sum of $8,500, and entirely cease when said sum of $8,500 has been fully paid. In the event that said first party fails to pay said monthly payments for three months, said party of the second part may, at her option, declare said sum of $8,500 immediately due and payable."

On March 14, 1925, the plaintiff remarried, thus terminating the defendant's obligation to make further payments. The complaint averred that the defendant during the period between May, 1924, and March 14, 1925, failed to make the monthly payments provided by the contract, amounting to $1,575. Among other defenses to the action the defendant alleged that under the terms of the contract it was agreed that the monthly payments should be applied to and credited toward the payment of the $8,500 evidenced by the note; that so applied $5,300 had been paid on May 1, 1924; and that on June 1, 1924, the defendant tendered to plaintiff the balance of $3,150, thereby terminating his obligations under the contract, and also that previous to the commencement of the present suit the plaintiff recovered a judgment against the defendant for the above sum of $8,500. The trial court adopted the construction of the contract contended for by the defendant, and found that the plaintiff refused to accept the tender of $3,150 made by the defendant on June 1, 1924. It was found that, by reason of the judgment entered in the action to recover the $8,500, the obligation of the defendant to make the monthly payments terminated on July 17, 1924. From the above the court concluded that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. Judgment was entered accordingly, and the plaintiff has appealed therefrom.

In the action referred to in the findings an appeal was taken from the judgment by the defendant, who contended, as in the case at bar, that the parties to the contract intended the monthly payments to apply on the sum evidenced by the note, and that the trial court erred by failing to allow the same as a credit thereon. The Appellate Court, in affirming the judgment, held that the trial court had correctly interpreted the language of the contract; that it was not the intention of the parties that the monthly payments should be credited on the note, but that the latter was an additional and separate obligation. Hollman v. Hollman, 88 Cal. App. 748, 264 P. 289. Respondent concedes that as regards the interpretation of the contract he is concluded by the above decision, but contends that the effect of the judgment in that action was to terminate the plaintiff's right to further monthly payments. The contract provided that the monthly payments should "entirely cease when said sum of $8,500 has been fully paid." Payment is that which the parties to the contract agree shall be accepted as such. Watkins v. Sims, 81 Fla. 730, 88 So. 764. The contract contains no suggestion that the parties intended a judgment for this amount to be equivalent for any purpose to its payment, and such was not its legal effect. Lord v. Bigelow, 124 Mass. 185.

In view of the above construction of the contract and the undisputed facts of the case, the findings of the trial court should have been in accordance with the allegations of the complaint as amended, and judgment entered accordingly. We are authorized to make findings contrary to or in addition to those made by the trial court (Const., art. 6, § 4½; Code Civ. Proc. § 956a; Kirk v. Culley, 202 Cal. 501, 261 P. 994); and the present is a proper case for the exercise of the power. We therefore find that all the allegations contained in plaintiff's complaint as amended are true, and as a conclusion of law therefrom that she is entitled to judgment against the defendant for the sum of $1,575, with interest thereon from March 14, 1925, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, together with her costs and disbursements in the action.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment for the plaintiff in accordance with the views expressed above.

LAUCHERE v. LAMBERT et al. (Civ. 6909.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 23, 1929.

1. Appeal and error ☞494—Trial court's order, although erroneous or void, is to be considered so far as completing record on appeal is concerned.

So far as perfecting and completing record on appeal is concerned, an order of trial court is to be considered, although order be erroneous or void.

2. Appeal and error ☞715(2)—That corrected order showing new trial was granted for insufficiency of evidence was made ex parte and out of time could not be considered by reviewing court, where appearing only by affidavits.

That corrected or changed order to show that new trial was granted because of insufficiency of evidence to sustain verdict was made ex parte, and that it was made more than six months after the original was made, could not be considered by reviewing court, where such facts appeared only by affidavits filed in reviewing court upon motion for diminution of the record, since power of reviewing court to review orders and judgments of the trial court does not include affidavits.

3. Appeal and error ☞609—Order correcting original order to show new trial was granted for insufficiency of evidence should be put in to supplemental transcript and filed with reviewing court (Code Civ. Proc. § 657).

Order correcting or changing original order granting new trial to show that new trial was granted because of insufficiency of evidence to sustain verdict, under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, made after clerk's transcript was filed in reviewing court, should be put in supplemental clerk's transcript and filed in reviewing court.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Jules Lauchere against Charles G. Lambert and another doing business under the name and style of Lambert & Walter. Judgment for plaintiff, and, from an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. On defendants' motion for diminution of record on appeal. Motion granted.

Jackson & Peterson and Clell H. McCredie, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, for respondents.

KOFORD, P. J. Respondents have made a motion in this court for an order for diminution of the record directing the clerk of the trial court to add to the clerk's transcript filed herein on April 5, 1929, a certain order of the trial court made on September 20, 1929, which order the clerk of said court, pursuant to the order of the trial judge, entered nunc pro tunc as of February 21, 1929. The original order made on February 21, 1929, read: "It is ordered that said motion (for new trial) be and the same is hereby granted as prayed for." The nunc pro tunc order of September 20, 1929, which respondents desire incorporated in the clerk's transcript reads:

" * * * The court in open court stated its views in said matter and particularly stated that the evidence introduced was insufficient to justify the verdict and granting said motion upon that ground,

"It is ordered that said motion for a new trial be and the same is hereby granted as prayed for, and particularly upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict."

The order granting a new trial was attacked by appellant in his opening brief filed herein on July 31, 1929. Respondents are now awaiting our ruling upon this motion before filing their brief. The difference in wording between the original and the changed order granting a new trial is important on account of the following requirement of Code of Civil Procedure, § 657: "When a new trial is granted * * * upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, the order shall so specify; otherwise, on appeal from such order it will be presumed that the order was not based upon that ground." Obviously the order of September 20 must be considered upon this appeal or not at all.

Appellant contends that, because the order of September 20, 1929, was made ex parte, without notice, and more than six months after the original order, it is void. Appellant also states that the trial court itself cannot now, after the lapse of six months, change the record on appeal. The trial court has not changed the record on appeal. It has changed its own record. The question before us is whether we should have the record on this appeal show the proceedings which have taken place since the appeal was perfected. Appellant concedes that, under the authority of McMahon v. Hamilton, 202 Cal. 319, 323, 260 P. 793, the appellate court may itself correct a record on appeal by directing the clerk having custody of the requested record to add it to the transcript or otherwise certify it up. He nevertheless contends that the appellate court will not exercise its power to have the said order incorporated into the record on appeal because void for the reasons above stated.

[1, 2] So far as perfecting and completing a record upon appeal is concerned, an order of the trial court is an order, even though it be erroneous or void. To refuse to put an order in the record on appeal because it is void is to first decide the point on appeal and then refuse to consider the appeal because not meritorious or well taken in point of law. The asserted fact that the said corrected or changed order was made ex parte and that it was made more than six months after the original was made, appears to us only by the affidavits filed in this court upon this motion. The power of this court to review the orders and judgments of the trial court is to be exercised in accordance with the prescribed law of procedure for appeal. This does not include affidavits. Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, vol. 2, §§ 283 and 271, and cases cited.

An affidavit filed herein upon this motion is said by appellant to contain statements which show that the order of September 20, 1929, was not one which corrected minutes which through inadvertence did not speak the truth, but that it was an order which made a new and different order out of the real order originally entered. The affidavit, if closely scrutinized, may not have such a sweeping effect. However this may be, this part of the affidavit is not different in principle than the part which purports to show that the order is void for the other reasons already discussed. Such additional alleged ground of invalidity of the order should not cause us to refuse to have the order incorporated into the record upon this appeal.

[3] The order of September 20, 1929, is an order either correcting or changing the original order granting a new trial which is directly attacked upon this appeal. For that reason it should be put into the record upon appeal. Having been made after the clerk's transcript was filed in this court, it did not belong in that transcript at the time that transcript was certified and filed. It should be put into a supplementary clerk's transcript and filed herein so that it may be considered upon the appeal pending in this court.

It is ordered that the clerk of the trial court prepare, certify, and file herein a supplementary clerk's transcript of the record of this case showing all minutes and documents appertaining to this cause coming into her custody subsequent to the certification of the original clerk's transcript herein.

JACK E. CLOYD CO. v. TABER et al.
(Civ. 5675.)

1. Brokers ⇨69—Broker bringing parties together held entitled to commission based on rentals as provided in final enforceable lease entered into between parties.

In action by real estate broker for commission for services rendered in negotiating a lease of building to be constructed on property of defendants, facts held to show that plaintiff brought parties together and is entitled to commission based on lease as finally executed, which provided for material increase in cost of building and resulting increase in amount of rentals over original agreement to build and lease.

2. Brokers ⇨87—Broker held entitled to interest on judgment for commission, where amount of claim was capable of computation.

Though claim by real estate broker for commission in procuring lease of property of defendants is being disputed, where it is capable of computation in that lease specifically sets forth amount of rentals to be paid, which rentals are basis of amount of commission, broker is entitled to recover interest on judgment obtained.

3. Brokers ⇨74—Defendant who constructed building for lease of which commission is sought, and who was vitally interested in cost of building which served as basis for computing rentals, held properly adjudged personally liable for commission.

In action by real estate broker for commission for procuring lease of building to be constructed on property of defendants, defendant who was shown to be the builder employed by owners on cost plus basis, and who was vitally interested in cost of building which served as basis for computation of rentals constituting basis of commission and who in contract referred to "he and his associates," held properly adjudged personally liable on account of commissions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. M. Jamison, Judge.

Action by the Jack E. Cloyd Company against Fred J. Taber, Emma E. Taber, and L. J. Smith, sometimes known as Lewelleyn J. Smith. Judgment for plaintiff, and two last named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Frank F. Oster, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Jones, Hoyt & Rifkind, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. In the month of May, 1924, a representative of plaintiff company observed a "Will-build-to-suit-tenant" sign upon a lot at Temple street and Burton Way in the city of Los Angeles, owned by defendant Emma E. Taber, which sign directed all inquiries regarding said lot to be addressed to Lewelleyn J. Smith. On May 28, as a culmination of discussion between plaintiff company and defendant Smith, an agreement was executed by them authorizing plaintiff to negotiate a lease for ten years upon a proposed theater building to be erected by Smith upon said lot, on a rental basis satisfactory to said Smith and the lessee. This agreement provided: "And for and in consideration of services which the Jack E. Cloyd Company may render in the negotiation of said lease or upon our closing the aforesaid lease with party or parties with whom the Jack E. Cloyd Company have had negotiations, we agree to pay the regular Realty Board commission at the time the plans and specifications are approved and accepted by the Lessee."

Thereafter, on June 4, 1924, an agreement to build and lease was executed by said Smith, as builder, and Messrs. Sobelman and Balk, as lessees, in which it was agreed that a theater building to cost $50,000 should be erected upon the lot in question, and that the lessees would execute a lease for ten years at an aggregate rental of $142,800 for said term. It appears that the regular realty board commission at the time this agreement was executed was 3 per cent. upon the sum of $64,800, the amount of rental payable for the first five years of the term, or the sum of $1,944, and 2 per cent. upon the sum of $78,000, the aggregate amount of rental payable during the second five years, or $1,560, making a total of $3,504 commission, which amount subsequently, to wit, during the months of July, August, and September, 1924, was paid to the plaintiff company by defendant Smith, who was given a receipt in full payment of all commissions due to said plaintiff under the agreement to lease.

It also appears that, unknown to the plaintiff, defendant Smith entered into an agreement with the lessees, Sobelman and Balk, whereby the latter agreed to a material increase in the cost of the building, resulting in an increase in the amount of rental payable during the term of the lease.

On November 10, 1924, the lessees Sobelman and Balk and Emma E. Taber, as owner and lessor, entered into a lease of the said theater building, the same to run for ten years at an aggregate rental of $171,600, of which amount $75,600 covered the first five years and $96,000 the last five years of the term. Some six months thereafter, the matter of the increase in cost of the building and the consequent increase in the amount of rentals was brought to the attention of the plaintiff company. The company thereupon made demand upon Smith for commission upon the difference between the amounts shown by the agreement to build and lease and those shown to be payable under the lease of November 10, 1924, and, payment thereof being refused, action was brought to recover the sum of $756. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff company for this amount, but, upon hearing of motion for a new trial, which was denied as to the appellants here, the court reduced the judgment to $684, an error in computation having been made in arriving at the amount sued for. Interest from November 10, 1924, was also included in the judgment as modified.

Appellants now contend that under the contract of employment upon which plaintiff bases its action it has earned only the sum of $3,504, which has been fully paid, and that it is not entitled to any further compensation; that, the plaintiff's claim being disputed and unliquidated, plaintiff is not entitled to recover any interest; and that defendant Smith acted as agent only for Taber, the owner, and no personal liability attached to him on account of commissions.

It is conceded by appellants that the amount of a broker's commission is determined by the terms of his contract of employment. Here the contract of employment provided that the broker should receive the regular realty board commission for services rendered in negotiating a lease or upon the closing of a lease with parties with whom the broker had negotiations.

[1, 2] Upon a careful examination of the record, we are convinced that the document of November 10, 1924, was the only binding and enforceable lease that was executed between the owner and lessor of the building and the lessees thereof, and that the plaintiff, having brought the parties together, is entitled to the regular realty board commission based upon the rentals as provided for in the lease. While plaintiff's claim is being disputed, it is not incapable of computation, for the lease specifically sets forth the amount of rental to be paid during the entire term, and it was upon the basis of such rentals that the commission was to be paid according to the schedule of the realty board. Therefore plaintiff is also entitled to interest as found by the trial court.

[3] As to the third point, the trial court found that defendant Smith was at all times the duly appointed, authorized, and acting agent of his codefendants Fred J. Taber and Emma E. Taber, and as such agent, as well as in his own behalf, entered into a written contract under date of May 28, 1924, whereby the said defendants employed the plaintiff as a broker, etc. As to the appellants, there is sufficient evidence in the record to support this finding. The contract referred to is signed by Smith, and in it he refers to the fact that he and his associates contemplated the erection of a theater building. The evidence conclusively shows that he was the builder, that he was employed by the owners, but upon a cost plus basis, and that he was vitally interested in the cost of the building, which served as a basis for the computation of rentals payable during the term of the lease.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Raglan Tuttle, Judge.

Action by Frank M. Wood against Leo A. Girot. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Clifford Russell and George E. McCutchen, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

James F. Gaffney, of Sacramento, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for damages for the breach of a contract of employment.

The defendant was the owner of a garage in Sacramento. July 16, 1927, the parties to this action executed a written contract for the employment of plaintiff as manager of the garage for "a period of not less than one year," at a salary of $50 per week. This contract provided that: "In the event the party of the first part (defendant) disposes of his interests in the said garage, and the purchaser does not wish to take over the services of the party of the second part, then the said party of the second part will work as truck driver and utility man for the said party of the first part at the said fifty dollars each week until such time as the unexpired portion of the said year shall have been completed."

Pursuant to this contract the plaintiff took charge of the garage and performed the services of manager thereof for a period of about five months. The garage was then sold and transferred to one Polley, who retained the services of plaintiff for one week's time in order to familiarize himself with the business, paying him wages at the rate specified in the contract. The purchaser of the garage assumed no legal obligation to fulfill the defendant's contract of employment. Having completed his temporary services for Polley, the plaintiff returned and was set to work by the defendant driving a truck. On December 24th the defendant finally discharged him without cause, except that the defendant said there was not sufficient work to keep the plaintiff employed. Mr. Wood testified in this regard: "He told me that he was all through with the contract and there was nothing for me to do, and that he did not intend to carry out his part of the contract." The plaintiff then industriously sought for other employment, but found no regular work until March, at which time he was hired by the Shell Oil Company at a salary of $125 a month. The difference between the salary of $50 per week for the period of 52 weeks, which was assured by the contract, and the total amount which he actually did earn, together with the sum he would be able to earn if he retained his employment with the Shell Oil Company, was $847.05.

The plaintiff did not wait until the term of employment which was specified in the contract had expired, but brought suit for damages for the breach of the contract immediately after his discharge. The complaint contained two counts. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff on both counts. A new trial was, however, granted as to the second cause of action. The judgment for $847.05, which was awarded the plaintiff on the first count as damages for a breach of the contract, is all that we are required to consider.

The appellant asserts that neither the complaint nor the evidence justifies a judgment for damages for breach of the contract of employment for the reason that no sufficient allegation or proof of a wrongful discharge of the servant appears. He relies upon the case of Palmer v. Harlow, 52 Cal. App. 758, 199 P. 844, 845, in which it is said that the mere recital in the complaint, to the effect that "the defendant has refused to permit the plaintiff to proceed with the performance of the services," is an insufficient allegation to support an action for damages for the wrongful discharge of an employee.

[1, 2] In the present case, however, it was alleged that "said defendant, without any cause whatsoever, informed the plaintiff" that his services were no longer desired. In the absence of a demurrer this was a sufficient allegation of a wrongful discharge of the employee. The evidence is also adequate in this regard. The record discloses no criticism of the character of the plaintiff's services. The only reason assigned by the defendant for the plaintiff's dismissal was that he had no work for him to perform, and that he repudiated the contract. Mr. Wood testified in this regard: "He (Mr. Girot) told me * * * there was nothing for me to do, and that he did not intend to carry out his part of the contract."

[3-5] This action is not in the nature of a suit for wages. Upon the contrary, it is a claim for damages for the breach of a contract employing the plaintiff for the specific term of 52 weeks at a compensation of $50 per week. It was not necessary to wait until the end of the term of employment before commencing the action. A suit for damages for the violation of the terms of a contract may be brought at any time after the breach thereof so long as it is instituted within the statutory limitation of time. Seymour v. Oelrichs, 156 Cal. 782, 106 P. 88, 134 Am. St. Rep. 154. The rule of law is well established that the measure of damages in a suit of this nature consists of the entire unpaid contract price of the services, less whatever sum the employee actually earned during the specified term of the contract, together with any further sum which he might have been able to earn by the exercise of reasonable diligence to procure other employment. The judgment is not confined to the installments which have actually accrued prior to the commencement of the action, but should include the entire damages which will have accrued at the time of the expiration of the agreement, for the contract is entire and not severable. Seymour v. Oelrichs, supra. This measure is precisely the basis upon which the judgment in the present case was rendered.

[6] It is claimed by the appellant that the contract of employment was void for lack of mutuality in this, that it authorized the plaintiff, in the event of a sale of the garage, to terminate the contract with the defendant at his option and accept employment with the purchaser of the garage. The clear inference from the language of the contract, however, was that, if the purchaser consented to employ the plaintiff, the defendant would agree to such arrangement, but that, if the purchaser did not employ the plaintiff, he was still bound to continue his services for the defendant in the capacity of a truck driver and general utility man. The contract provided that "the party of the second part agrees to give (the defendant) good and sufficient service, * * *" and in the event of a sale of the garage, if "the purchaser does not wish to take over the services of the party of the second part, then the said party of the second part will work as truck driver and utility man for the said party of the first part at the said fifty dollars each week until such time as the unexpired portion of the said year shall have been completed." The defendant recognized this mutuality of contract and his obligation to continue the employment of the plaintiff. The plaintiff testified in this regard: "I asked Mr. Girot (when the garage was sold) what he wanted me to do and he said, 'Stay right on, Frank, until you hear from me. Mr. Polley wants to get acquainted with the trade.'" In fact, the defendant actually did give the plaintiff employment as a truck driver for a brief period after this temporary employment with Polley. Mr. Wood testified in this regard: "I continued my employment in the garage until the 21st of December at Mr. Girot's request. The three days following I worked for Mr. Girot trucking. * * * After that (temporary service for Polley) I worked on one of Mr. Girot's trucks up to and including the 24th of December." This shows not only a mutuality of contract for the continuation of the employment of the plaintiff, but also a recognition of the obligation on the part of the defendant.

[7-11] The appellant contends that the court failed to adopt specific findings with relation to his affirmative defense, to the effect that the contract of employment was voluntarily abandoned by mutual consent of the parties on December 10, 1927, and that the plaintiff was discharged by the purchaser of the garage because of his inefficiency and the willful neglect of his duties. The answer did contain these allegations. It is true that the court merely adopted a general finding that all of the allegations of the defendant's answer in conflict with the plaintiff's first cause of action were untrue. This was ineffectual as a finding upon a necessary issue. But the affirmative finding that the defendant breached the contract on December 24, 1927, was tantamount to a finding to the effect that the contract was not terminated on December 10th, by mutual consent. Paragraph 3 of the complaint alleged that defendant breached the contract on December 24, 1927, by dismissing the plaintiff "without any cause whatsoever." The court specifically found this to be true. Where the finding which is adopted is equivalent to an adverse finding upon an issue which is involved, more specific findings upon the subject are unnecessary. Eastman v. Piper, 68 Cal. App. 554, 569, 229 P. 1002. Unless the omission to adopt findings prejudices the substantial rights of the appellant, a judgment may not be reversed on that account. 2 Cal. Jur. 1032, § 614; Beggs v. Smith, 26 Cal. App. 532, 147 P. 585; Hulen v. Stuart, 191 Cal. 562, 572, 217 P. 750, 754. In the Hulen Case last cited it is said that, when it appears from the record that "if more complete findings had been made they would have been adverse to the contentions of the appellant, * * * the failure to find further is not a ground for the reversal of the judgment. Krasky v. Wollpert, 134 Cal. 338, 342, 66 P. 309." The same comment is applicable to the omission to find that the plaintiff was not discharged by the purchaser of the garage because of his inefficiency or negligence with respect to his duties. This finding was immaterial. A finding that he was discharged on that account is not supported by any evidence. Indeed, the evidence upon this subject is just the contrary. Mr. Polley testified: "I did not let Mr. Wood go because his work was not efficient. His work was entirely satisfactory to me." Where there is no evidence to support the appellant's allegations, the omission to find upon such an issue is not error. Himmelman v. Henry, 84 Cal. 104, 23 P. 1098. In 2 California Jurisprudence, 1034, § 614, it is said: "Not only must it appear that evidence was introduced upon such omitted issue, but it must appear also that the evidence was sufficient to warrant a finding for the appellant."

The judgment is affirmed.

BLINKIRON et al. v. BIRKHAUSER et al.
(Civ. 61.)

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California. Nov. 26, 1929.

1. Judgment ⇨526—Recital in execution issued on judgment cannot extend scope of judgment to parties not named therein.

Scope of judgment cannot be extended to parties not actually named therein by recital in execution issued on judgment and naming additional parties.

2. Judgment ⇨700—Failure to show that judgment, later reversed as to copartnership, included members thereof individually, precluded judgment holders from withholding money taken under execution.

In action to recover value of property taken on execution issued on judgment later reversed against copartnership, where defense was that judgment was against copartnership and against members thereof individually, and that judgment had not been reversed as to individuals, failure of record to disclose that judgment included members of copartnership as individuals precluded judgment holders' right to withhold from copartnership any money taken under such execution.

3. Execution ⇨338—In action to recover amount taken on execution issued on judgment, later reversed, permitting amendment of sheriff's return to show levy on assets of copartnership, held proper.

In action to recover amount taken on execution issued on judgment, later reversed, permitting amendment of sheriff's return on execution to show that judgment was satisfied by levy on assets of copartnership held proper.

4. Judgment ⇨890—Default judgment against third party held not subject to satisfaction under execution on judgment against copartnership.

Default judgment against third party was not subject to satisfaction under an execution on judgment against copartnership, although rendered in same proceedings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; A. C. Finney, Judge.

Action by Paul Blinkiron and another, partners doing business as Blinkiron-Doddridge Company, against Eleanor S. Birkhauser and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Frank Birkhauser, of El Centro, for appellants.

James W. Glassford, of El Centro, for respondents.

SLOANE, P. J. This appeal was taken from the superior court of Imperial county from a judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $294.

The history of the case is somewhat complicated, and the record on appeal by no means clear in its details.

Suit was originally brought in the justice's court of El Centro township, county of Imperial, by the appellants here against W. Maloof and Paul Blinkiron and John S. Doddridge, copartners doing business under the firm name of Blinkiron & Doddridge Company, and Paul Blinkiron and John S. Doddridge, as parties defendants. The original cause of action arose out of a transaction in which defendant Maloof sold an automobile to the plaintiffs Eleanor S. Birkhauser and Frank Birkhauser, her husband, under a conditional sales contract, calling for certain installment payments and an interest payment of $90, which plaintiffs claimed to be usurious. This contract was assigned by Maloof to Blinkiron & Doddridge, copartners, the firm consisting of defendants Paul Blinkiron and John S. Doddridge. A several judgment by default was taken in the justice's court against Maloof, and later, on the trial of the case, judgment was given for plaintiffs for the sum of $294, and against the Blinkiron-Doddridge copartnership, and, according to the contention of appellants here, also against Paul Blinkiron and John S. Doddridge individually. An appeal from this judgment was taken to the superior court of Imperial county, where a demurrer to the complaint in justice's court was filed, the demurrer sustained without leave to amend, and a judgment of dismissal of the action rendered. In the meantime, however, execution had been levied on property of the Blinkiron-Doddridge copartnership, and the amount of the judgment and costs collected thereunder.

The action here appealed from was brought in the superior court of Imperial county by Paul Blinkiron and John S. Doddridge, copartners doing business as Blinkiron-Doddridge Company against Eleanor S. Birkhauser and Frank Birkhauser, defendants, to recover the amount so collected under execution on the justice's court judgment, which was subsequently reversed. It is from this judgment that the pending appeal was taken. The superior court on the trial found that Paul Blinkiron and John S. Doddridge are, and at all times mentioned were, copartners doing business under the name of Blinkiron-Doddridge Company; that they had duly filed a certificate of copartnership, giving the names of the copartners; that on the 21st day of January, 1927, the defendants herein had recovered the judgment for $294 in the justice's court of said El Centro township; that on the 6th of March, 1927, the plaintiffs herein were compelled to pay, and did pay, to the defendants, in satisfaction of said judgment, $301.13; that thereafter plaintiffs duly and regularly appealed from said judgment to the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Imperial, and that thereafter on the 31st day of May, 1927, the above-named justice's court judgment was duly reversed; and that the defendants have never repaid the amount collected on said judgment, though plaintiffs have made demand therefor. And as conclusions of law the trial court found that plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the defendants the sum of $301.13, and interest thereon at 7 per cent. per annum from the 8th day of March, 1927, and their costs and disbursements.

The points in controversy on this appeal arise on the contention of appellants that the judgment of the justice's court was not only a judgment against the copartnership, but an individual judgment against Paul Blinkiron and John S. Doddridge, and that the appeal taken to the superior court was taken by the copartnership alone, and that the judgment of reversal did not affect the personal liability of Blinkiron & Doddridge, and that appellants were entitled to the satisfaction of these individual judgments, under the execution issued, out of the assets of the copartnership.

As heretofore stated, the record is in a very unsatisfactory state regarding the parties to the justice's court judgment, and as to the parties to the appeal to the superior court therefrom. The judgment of the justice's court, as read into the record, recites: "After due and careful consideration upon the evidence adduced and the law in such case made and provided, the Court finds for the plaintiffs and against the said defendants Blinkiron and Doddridge, the principal sum of $270.00 as prayed for in plaintiffs' complaint filed herein, $6.00, costs of suit and $18.00 interest thereon, total $294.00. Judgment is hereby entered accordingly."

An abstract of the justice's court judgment filed in Imperial county February 26, 1927, and upon which the execution in question was issued, after giving the title of the court and cause, recites:

"Eleanor S. Birkhauser and Frank Birkhauser, her husband, plaintiffs, vs. W. Maloof and Paul Blinkiron and John S. Doddridge, copartners doing business under the firm name of Blinkiron and Doddridge Company, and Paul Blinkiron and John S. Doddridge, defendants.

"In Justice's Court before I. Mayfield, Justice of the Peace in and for El Centro township, February 26, 1927; judgment entered for plaintiffs for $294.00 on the 31st day of January, 1927.

"I certify that the foregoing is a correct abstract of judgment rendered in said action in my court, as appears by my docket in my possession. I. Mayfield, Justice of the Peace in and for El Centro Township, County of Imperial, State of California."

[1] It will be noticed that neither the judgment as recited from the justice's docket nor the foregoing abstract of judgment includes Paul Blinkiron and John S. Doddridge individually, as parties to the judgment. The execution issued on the justice court judgment recites: "Whereas on the 31st day of January, A. D. 1927, Eleanor S. Birkhauser and Frank Birkhauser, her husband, recovered a judgment in the Justice's Court of El Centro township in and for the County of Imperial, State of California, against W. Maloof and Paul Blinkiron and John S. Doddridge, copartners doing business under the firm name of Blinkiron and Doddridge Co. and Paul Blinkiron and John S. Doddridge," etc. This recital, however, cannot extend the scope of the judgment to parties not actually named therein.

Under the foregoing state of facts, the finding of the trial court in the instant case "that on the 21st day of January, 1927, the defendants herein recovered a judgment against the plaintiff herein in the Justice's Court of El Centro township, Imperial County, California, in the amount of $294.00, which said judgment is docketed at page 26, docket 16 and Justice's Court 3056," cannot be held inaccurate in not including the individual members of the copartnership, as parties to the judgment; the words "plaintiff herein," confining the judgment to Paul Blinkiron and John S. Doddridge as partners under the firm name of Blinkiron-Doddridge Company, the sole plaintiffs in the action.

[2] Moreover, if it appeared that the justice's court judgment included Blinkiron & Doddridge individually as judgment debtors, appellants' contention that this judgment was not reversed as to said defendants, cannot be affirmatively maintained from the record. Appellants dispute that these parties individually joined in the appeal from the judgment of the justice's court. The notice of appeal from that judgment does not appear in the record. It is alleged, however, by respondent, and denied by appellants, that the individual members of the partnership did join in the appeal, and the order sustaining demurrer without leave to amend to the justice's court complaint, which was the basis for the reversal and dismissal of the judgment of the justice's court, recites: "This action having been brought on to trial on the 31st day of May, 1927, on the issues of law joined herein, and after hearing James W. Glassford in support of the demurrer of the defendants Paul Blenkiron and John S. Doddridge, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Blenkiron-Doddridge Company and Paul Blenkiron and John S. Doddridge; and Frank Birkhauser in opposition thereto it is ordered that said demurrer be sustained without leave to amend."

The judgment for dismissal of the action, as rendered by the superior court, recites: "An order having been entered in this action on the 31st day of May, 1927, sustaining the demurrer of Blenkiron-Doddridge Company to the complaint herein, and denying the plaintiffs' right to amend their complaint; now on motion of James W. Glassford, attorney for the defendants Blenkiron-Doddridge Company, it is ordered and adjudged that the complaint herein be and the same is hereby dismissed, and that said defendants last above mentioned have and recover their costs from said plaintiff taxed at $18.00."

While the judgment for costs runs only in favor of the copartnership, the order of dismissal covers the entire cause of action, as to all parties defendant participating in the appeal, and operated as a reversal of the justice's court judgment as to the individual members of the copartnership as well as the firm liability, if they were joined as appellants. In any event, the failure of the record to disclose with any degree of definiteness that the justice's court judgment included the members of the copartnership as individuals precludes the right of appellants to withhold from the copartnership, the respondents herein, any part of the money taken under execution on the justice's court judgment.

[3] The judgment of the justice's court involved in this appeal was satisfied from a levy upon the assets of the Blenkiron-Doddridge Company partnership, as shown by the amended return of the sheriff. There was no error in permitting the amendment of the sheriff's return on execution to show that fact.

[4] Whether or not the justice's court judgment against Maloof continued in force during the foregoing proceedings is immaterial to this case. It was not subject to satisfaction under an execution against the Blenkiron-Doddridge people.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1554, providing for resale where purchaser does not comply with terms of sale, does not furnish exclusive remedy for damages sustained by an estate for failure of purchaser of real property at probate sale to fulfill conditions of sale.

2. Executors and administrators ⇨366—Written bid for purchase of real property at probate sale with deposit required is acceptance of offer, and constitutes contract to purchase property.

Formal written bid for purchase of real property at probate sale which is conducted pursuant to law, together with deposit of 10 per cent. of purchase price as required by law, is an acceptance of offer to sell, and constitutes contract to purchase property upon terms specified in petition for confirmation.

3. Executors and administrators ⇨373—Specific performance or other appropriate equitable proceeding will lie for breach of terms of probate sale.

Specific performance, ejectment, or any other appropriate equitable proceeding will lie for breach of terms of probate sale of real estate.

4. Executors and administrators ⇨372—Failure of proposed purchaser at probate sale to perform conditions constitutes breach creating liability for damages.

Order confirming probate sale of real estate does not convey title, but merely authorizes conveyance upon specified terms and conditions, and failure of proposed purchaser to perform conditions constitutes breach which creates liability for damages sustained.

5. Executors and administrators ⇨370—Purchaser breaching agreement to purchase property sold at probate sale waived title and claim thereto.

Purchaser having breached his agreement to purchase real estate sold at probate sale thereby waived his title and claim thereto.

6. Executors and administrators ⇨370—After notice to probate sale purchaser of his acknowledgment of inability to pay price or fulfill conditions of sale, his equity ceased, and his pretended lease was void.

After notice to purchaser of real estate at probate sale of his breach and his acknowledgment that he was unable to pay agreed price or fulfill conditions of sale, his equity in property ceased, and he possessed no title, and his subsequent pretended lease was void.

7. Executors and administrators ⇨370—Where purchaser at probate sale did not perform, administrator could maintain action to recover possession of real estate and declare forfeiture of deposit.

Where purchaser of real estate at probate sale failed to fulfill conditions of sale, administrator was entitled to maintain an action to recover possession of property and relieve estate from burden of any claim of title on part of purchaser or his lessee and to declare a forfeiture of money which was paid on account of the purchase price.

8. Executors and administrators ⇨370—After breach by purchaser at probate sale of conditions of sale, administrator could retain deposit although conditions contained no express provision on matter.

After breach by purchaser at probate sale of conditions of sale, administrator had right to retain deposit made on account of purchase price although conditions of sale contained no express provision to that effect.

9. Executors and administrators ⇨370—Purchaser at probate sale not fulfilling conditions was trespasser after administrator's notice, and acquired no title to crops planted by his tenant.

Where purchaser of real estate at probate sale took possession and assumed to lease premises after he had acknowledged his inability to pay purchase price and had been notified of termination of sale and forfeiture of deposit, he was a trespasser and subject to eviction, and he acquired no title to crops which were subsequently planted by tenant to whom he wrongfully assumed to lease premises on shares.

10. Landlord and tenant ⇨330(1)—If lessee had actual or constructive knowledge of landlord's default in purchase contract and notice of termination of his rights, he acquired no better title to crops than lessor had.

If lessee had knowledge or was possessed of facts which charged him with constructive knowledge of landlord's default in contract for purchase of real property and notice of termination of his rights under executory sale, lessee acquired no better title to crops he planted than lessor possessed.

Where crops are planted by trespasser who wrongfully assumes to hold possession and threatens to harvest and market crops for his own benefit, appointment of receiver is authorized in appropriate proceeding, under Code Civ. Proc. § 564, subd. 1.

12. Executors and administrators ⇨370—Complaint praying for decree forfeiting probate sale purchaser's deposit, terminating right to property and crops thereon, and for receiver to harvest and market crops, stated facts constituting cause of action.

Complaint by administrator, alleging in effect that one of defendants made bid on real estate at probate sale and paid deposit, but thereafter failed to perform conditions, and administrator notified him of breach, and that purchaser thereafter purported to lease property to the other defendant who planted crop, and that they were threatening to harvest and market crop and praying for decree forfeiting deposit, terminating defendants' claim to real property and crop growing thereon, and that they be enjoined from interfering with plaintiff's right of possession and title, and that receiver be appointed to harvest and market crops and take charge of proceeds thereof pending litigation, held to state facts sufficient to constitute cause of action warranting relief prayed for.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; K. S. Mahon and Eugene P. McDaniel, Judges.

Action for equitable relief by M. P. Barnes, as administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Amelia Disch, deceased, against Arch Morrison and another. From the judgment of dismissal, and from an order revoking the appointment of a receiver, plaintiff appeals. Order revoking appointment of a receiver reversed, and judgment reversed, with directions.

W. P. Rich, of Marysville, and Busick & Leeper, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Frank A. Duryea, of Marysville, for respondents.

R. L. THOMPSON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of dismissal in an action for equitable relief. The judgment was rendered after separate demurrers to the complaint had been sustained without leave to amend. The action involves a claim to growing crops, on the part of a purchaser of real property at a probate sale, after he had failed to fulfill the conditions specified and notice of the termination of sale had been given.

The complaint alleges that the plaintiff is the duly appointed administrator of the estate of Amelia Disch, deceased; that the estate was possessed of farm land in Yuba county; that, upon proceedings duly had, this land was sold by the administrator for $40,000, and a return of said sale was regularly made to the probate court pursuant to the provisions of section 1552 of the Code of Civil Procedure; that, upon the hearing of said return of sale, the defendant F. E. Johnson increased the bid for the farm to $44,000, depositing on account of the purchase price the sum of $4,400; thereupon the court confirmed the sale to Johnson and directed the execution of the deed of conveyance upon payment of the balance of the purchase price; that for more than two months thereafter the purchaser failed to make the final payment of the purchase price and otherwise failed to conform to the conditions of sale; thereupon the administrator duly tendered to said purchaser a good and sufficient deed of conveyance to said land free from incumbrance and demanded payment of the balance of the purchase price, which the purchaser then and ever since has failed and refused to pay, declaring that he was financially unable to procure the money; thereupon the administrator duly notified the purchaser of his breach of the terms and conditions of sale and that the administrator for that reason elected to rescind the sale and thereupon declared a forfeiture of the $4,400 deposit; that thereafter, without the knowledge or authority of the plaintiff, the defendant Johnson wrongfully purported to lease said property to the defendant Morrison upon terms entitling him to share in the hay and bean crops which were to be produced thereon; that, pursuant to said pretended lease, the defendant Morrison took immediate possession of the premises and planted thereon 70 acres of beans and several acres of alfalfa hay, which crops at the time of filing this complaint were ready for harvesting and were of the value of $10,000; that the defendants are without any title or interest in said premises or the growing crops thereon, but that they claim a landlord's and tenant's interest therein, respectively, and threaten to harvest and market the same for their own benefit; that the plaintiff demanded possession of the premises and crops, which was refused; that the defendants are insolvent; and that the plaintiff has no speedy or adequate remedy at law.

The complaint prayed for a decree forfeiting said $4,400 deposit, terminating the defendants' claim to said real property and the crops growing thereon, and that they be enjoined from interfering with plaintiff's right of possession and title thereto, and that a receiver be appointed to harvest and market the crops and to take charge of the proceeds thereof pending the litigation.

Upon application therefor, a receiver was duly appointed, but subsequently this order was rescinded and the appointment was revoked. From this last-mentioned order, the plaintiff has also appealed.

Separate demurrers were filed by each defendant on the ground of uncertainty and for failure to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. These demurrers were sustained, and the plaintiff was denied the privilege of amending his complaint. Thereupon a judgment of dismissal was entered, from which this appeal was perfected.

We are not informed of the theory upon which the defendants support this judgment and proceeding, for they have filed no points and authorities. It appears to have been assumed that equity had no jurisdiction to afford a remedy for the failure of a purchaser of real property at a probate sale to comply with the conditions of sale, and that the exclusive redress was found in the necessity of petitioning the court for a resale of the property pursuant to section 1554 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides in part: " * * * If, after the confirmation, the purchaser neglects or refuses to comply with the terms of the sale, the court may, on motion of the executor or administrator, and after notice to the purchaser, order a resale to be made of the property. If the amount realized on such resale does not cover the bid and the expenses of the previous sale, such purchaser is liable for the deficiency to the estate."

[1-4] Section 1554, supra, does not furnish the exclusive remedy for damages sustained by an estate for failure on the part of a purchaser of real property at a probate sale to fulfill the conditions of sale. The remedy provided by that section may be neither speedy nor adequate. While that section provides that, in the event that a purchaser fails or refuses to comply with the conditions of sale, the court may order a resale of the property. This is not mandatory. Obviously, the authorization for a sale or resale of the property of an estate depends upon the needs and best interest of the estate as provided by section 1536 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The formal written bid for the purchase of real property at a probate sale which is conducted pursuant to law, together with the deposit of 10 per cent. of the purchase price as required by law, is an acceptance of the offer to sell, and constitutes a contract to purchase the property upon the terms specified in the petition for confirmation. Specific performance, ejectment, or any other appropriate equitable proceeding will lie for a breach of the terms of sale. The order confirming the sale does not convey the title, but merely authorizes the conveyance upon specified terms and conditions. The failure on the part of the proposed purchaser to perform the conditions constitutes a breach, which creates a liability for damages sustained.

It has been definitely held that section 1554 of the Code of Civil Procedure is not the exclusive remedy for a breach of conditions for the purchase of real property at a probate sale. Under such circumstances the personal representative of the estate may maintain an action to recover the balance of the purchase price or for specific performance. Crouse v. Peterson, 130 Cal. 169, 62 P. 475, 615, 80 Am. St. Rep. 89; McCarty v. Wilson, 184 Cal. 194, 200, 193 P. 578, 580. In the case last cited it is said: "By virtue of the right conferred by section 1554 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the property might have been resold and the present purchaser held responsible if, on the second sale, enough was not realized to pay costs and the amount of the present bid, but that remedy is not exclusive, and does not prevent a resort by the executor to a suit for specific performance."

[5] The defendant, having breached his agreement to purchase the property, thereby waived his title and claim thereto. As the court said in Tuso v. Green, 194 Cal. 574, at page 583, 229 P. 327, 330: "Defendant had breached his contract, and plaintiffs thereafter held the land freed from any claim or right of defendant thereto or therein."

[6-8] After notice to the purchaser of his breach and his acknowledgment that he was unable to pay the agreed purchase price or fulfill the conditions of sale, his equity in the property ceased, and he possessed no title, equitable or otherwise, which he had a right to lease or convey. Hicks v. Lovell, 64 Cal. 14, 27 P. 942, 49 Am. Rep. 679; Flint v. Conner, 53 Cal. App. 279, 200 P. 37; Andrews v. Karl, 42 Cal. App. 513, 519, 183 P. 838. His subsequent pretended lease to the defendant Morrison was therefore void. The administrator was entitled to maintain an action to recover possession of the property of the estate and to relieve the estate from the burden of any claim of title on the part of the purchaser or his lessee, and to declare a forfeiture of the money which was paid on account of the purchase price. After the breach, the administrator had a right to retain this deposit, although the conditions of sale contained no express provision to that effect. Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 1, 20, 55 P. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17; Tuso v. Green, 194 Cal. 574, 229 P. 327; Mulcahy v. Gagliardo, 39 Cal. App. 458, 179 P. 445; Francis v. Shrader, 38 Cal. App. 592, 177 P. 168.

[9] The defendant Johnson took possession and assumed to lease the premises after he had acknowledged his inability to pay the purchase price and had been notified of the termination of the sale and forfeiture of the deposit. He had abandoned his effort to buy the property. He was therefore a trespasser and subject to eviction. Under such circumstances, he acquired no title to the crops which were subsequently planted by a tenant to whom he wrongfully assumed to lease the premises on shares. In 27 Ruling Case Law, 621, § 375, it is said: "The possession (of a purchaser who has taken possession under an executory contract before the execution of the deed) * * * becomes tortious at the option of the vendor, when the purchaser disaffirms the contract, disavows the title under which he has entered, or refuses payment of the purchase money, and he then becomes liable to eviction as a trespasser." Hicks v. Lovell, supra; Flint v. Conner, supra.

[10] Where a purchaser under an executory contract takes possession of the premises with the consent of the vendor, he has an equitable title, but, where he wrongfully enters without the knowledge or consent of the vendor, he acquires no right or title thereby. The purchaser under an executory contract is the owner of crops grown upon land during the time he is rightfully in possession, but he has no title to crops which are planted after his rights have been terminated by reason of his own wrongful acts or default. 39 Cyc. 1627, § 8. If, as the complaint indicates the facts to be in the present case, the defendant Johnson attempted to assume control of the premises and wrongfully lease the property to a stranger on crop shares, after his default and due notice of the termination of sale and forfeiture had been given, he was a mere trespasser, and acquired no right, title, or interest in any share of the crops. In a proper proceeding the estate was entitled to recover possession and control of the real property and the growing crops, together with the proceeds of the sale thereof. If the lessee, Morrison, had previous knowledge or was possessed of facts which charged him with constructive knowledge of the purchaser's default and notice of termination of his rights under the executory sale, Morrison could acquire no better title to the crops than his lessor possessed. Under such circumstances his occupancy would be unlawful and his lease invalid. In 2 Underhill on Landlord and Tenant, 1322, § 776, it is said: "If a subtenant knows that the lessor has no title or that his title will be terminated before the crops mature, he sows the crop at his own risk."

If the lessee planted the crops in good faith, without either actual or constructive notice of the lessor's wrongful conveyance, he would have his remedy against the lessor.

[11, 12] Where crops are planted by a trespasser who wrongfully assumes to hold possession and threatens to harvest and market the crops for his own benefit, the appointment of a receiver is authorized in an appropriate proceeding. Section 564, Code Civ. Proc. subd. 1; 22 Cal. Jur. 444, § 24; Borges v. Dunham, 169 Cal. 83, 145 P. 1011. The ground upon which the trial court vacated the order appointing the receiver was that the complaint failed to state a cause of action. We are of the opinion that the complaint stated sufficient facts to constitute a valid cause of action warranting the equitable relief prayed for.

The order revoking the appointment of the receiver was erroneous, and is therefore reversed. The judgment of dismissal is also reversed, and the trial court is directed to overrule the demurrers and permit the defendants to answer.

HOFFMAN v. McNAMARA. (Civ. 7115.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 3, 1929.

1. Trial $\S$ 417—Plaintiff's failure of proof held cured, where supplied by defendant's testimony, which by stipulation was to be considered as part of plaintiff's case.

Failure of plaintiff to prove that defendant was person driving automobile colliding with plaintiff's truck was cured, where by stipulation evidence given by defendant was to be considered as part of plaintiff's case, and defendant testified she was driving automobile at time of collision.

2. Automobiles $\S$ 244(11)—Evidence held to sustain finding of negligence of defendant in cutting corner in making left turn at intersection and colliding with plaintiff's automobile.

In action for injuries from collision of automobiles at highway intersection, evidence held to support finding of negligence on part of defendant automobilist in cutting corner instead of turning to right of center of intersection as law required in making left turn.

3. Automobiles $\S$ 245(80)—Evidence held not to establish plaintiff's contributory negligence in collision as matter of law by failing to look to left for approaching automobiles.

In action for injuries from collision of automobiles at intersection, evidence held not to establish that plaintiff was contributorily negligent as matter of law in failing to look to his left for approaching vehicles, in that jury was entitled under evidence to conclude that plaintiff's failure to observe approach of defendant's automobile was not proximate cause of collision.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 930(1)—On appeal, evidence must be viewed in its most favorable light in support of verdict.

Appellate court must view evidence in its most favorable light in support of the verdict.

Under Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 560) $\S$ 131, as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, $\S$ 15, instruction that first automobile to enter intersection has right of way over automobile which has not yet entered intersection, held properly refused, since it cannot be said that, because vehicle from left reaches intersection first, the one from the right has not approached it at approximately the same time, inasmuch as vehicle may approach an intersection at approximately the same time as another if it approaches slightly before or after the other; "approximately" meaning about or nearly as it is the opposite of precisely or exactly.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; J. B. Landis, Judge.

Action by Harry L. Hoffman against Merle A. McNamara. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Coleman E. Stewart, of Santa Barbara, for appellant.

Mygatt, Robertson & Crawford, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem. Appeal from a judgment for plaintiff against appellant, entered pursuant to the verdict of a jury, for damages received by plaintiff in a collision between a laundry truck driven by him, and an automobile driven by appellant.

At the place of collision, the main coast highway between Los Angeles and Santa Barbara runs approximately east and west, and is crossed practically at a right angle by another public highway called Butterfly Lane.

Plaintiff and respondent, on the morning of the collision, was driving westerly on the coast highway, and defendant and appellant drove northerly on Butterfly Lane and made a left-hand turn onto the coast highway. The two machines collided at a point on the coast highway about 30 feet westerly from the westerly line of Butterfly Lane projected across the coast highway.

Appellant contends: (1) That the trial court erred in denying her motion for a nonsuit; (2) that the trial court erred in denying her motion for a directed verdict; (3) that the verdict of the jury is not supported by the evidence and is against law; and (4) that the trial court erred in refusing to give two instructions proposed by appellant.

The first three points may be conveniently considered together, since they all rest upon the contentions that the evidence fails to show any negligence of appellant and affirmatively shows contributory negligence on the part of respondent.

[1] Preliminarily we may dispose of the claim of appellant that a nonsuit should have been granted because of plaintiff's failure to prove that appellant was the person driving the automobile which collided with his truck. The failure of proof in this regard, if any theretofore existed, was cured by a stipulation between counsel that the evidence given by appellant in support of her cross-complaint should be considered as a part of plaintiff's case. Appellant herself testified that she was driving the automobile at the time of the collision.

[2] We think the evidence was ample to support the finding that appellant was negligent. According to her own testimony, appellant turned left from Butterfly Lane onto the coast highway by a course which took her considerably to the left of the center of the intersection of the two. Respondent testified that he crossed the intersection at about 15 miles per hour and was struck from the side and behind after he had completely passed the intersection. While appellant testified that she was only going 5 or 6 miles per hour at the moment of collision, the jury were not compelled to believe this, since it would be manifestly impossible for her to overtake and strike respondent at that rate of speed. From the evidence, the jury may well have believed that the proximate cause of the collision was appellant's cutting the corner instead of turning to the right of the center of the intersection as the law required. This is clearly sufficient to support a finding that the collision was proximately caused by appellant's negligence. Pope v. Halpern, 193 Cal. 168, 173, 223 P. 470.

[3, 4] The claim that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law is based upon his testimony that, as he approached and crossed the intersection of Butterfly Lane, he did not look down Butterfly Lane to his left for approaching vehicles, but only looked the width of the coast highway. The court instructed the jury in this regard "that it was the duty of the plaintiff and cross-defendant as he approached the intersection of Butterfly Lane with the coast highway, to look both to the right and to the left to observe the presence of other automobiles approaching said intersection on Butterfly Lane and if you find that plaintiff and cross-defendant did not look to the left to observe the approach of defendant's car as it approached said intersection and that it was possible for him to have looked and to have seen defendant's car approaching said intersection, then you must find as a matter of law that plaintiff and cross-defendant was negligent, and if you further find that such negligence in any degree contributed to the cause of the accident in this case, your verdict must be for the defendant, Merle A. McNamara."

This instruction stated the law as strongly in favor of appellant on this point as she was entitled to have it stated, and we must assume on appeal that the jury followed it and determined that the failure of respondent Hoffman to observe the approach of appellant's automobile was not a proximate cause of the collision. This, in our judgment, they were entitled to do under the evidence.

From the evidence, the jury may have concluded that, even if respondent had seen ap-pellant's car at or approaching the intersection, he would have been justified in proceeding across the intersection nevertheless, on the assumption that she would not turn to the left of the center of the intersection and thereby bring her car across the path of his. If his evidence is believed—and it is axiomatic that we must on appeal view the evidence in its most favorable light in support of the verdict—after respondent was completely across the intersection, appellant struck him from the side and rear. If this is true, as we are bound to assume in support of the verdict, he was far beyond the point where the paths of the two machines would have crossed if appellant had taken the course enjoined on her by law.

[5-7] The court gave an instruction in the language of section 131 of the Motor Vehicle Act, as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15, which read at that time: "When two vehicles approach an intersection of public highways at approximately the same time, the vehicle approaching from the right shall have the right of way, provided such vehicle is traveling at a lawful speed."

Appellant proposed two instructions on this subject, of which the following is the more elaborate: "You are instructed that as an exception to the rule 'that when two vehicles approach an intersection of public highways at approximately the same time the vehicle approaching from the right shall have the right of way providing such vehicle is traveling at a lawful speed', the law provides that of two vehicles approaching an intersection at a lawful rate of speed, the first automobile to enter the intersection has the right of way over the automobile which has not yet entered said intersection and which is at a distance greater than the approximate distance of the projected course of intersection of said automobiles." The other instruction was identical except for the omission of the last clause.

These instructions were properly refused. They are based on the decision of this court in Vickerson v. Standard Auto Sales Co., 64 Cal. App. 287, 221 P. 392. But, after the decision in the Vickerson Case, section 131 of the Motor Vehicle Act was amended in 1925 to the form set out above. The rule is well settled that the Legislature is presumed to know the decisions of appellate courts and to have them in mind when adopting amendments to statutes which the courts have construed. It is equally well settled that a substantial change in the language of a statute is presumed to indicate a change in its meaning. By providing that, "when two vehicles approach an intersection * * * at approximately the same time," the one to the right shall have the right of way, the Legislature used language deliberately calculated to change the rule announced in the Vickerson Case. "Approximately" means about or nearly; it is the opposite of precisely or exactly. A vehicle may approach an intersection at "approximately the same time" as another if it approaches slightly before or slightly after the other. It cannot be said that, because the vehicle from the left reaches the intersection first, the one from the right has not approached it at approximately the same time. Whatever criticism might conceivably be directed at the Legislature for introducing this element of possible uncertainty into a rule of the road—and that is a matter with which we cannot be concerned—it would be an act of judicial legislation for us to sanction a construction of this plain language out of its clear and natural meaning. It may be noted in this connection that in 1929 this section was again amended to return substantially to the rule in effect before the amendment here in question (St. 1929, p. 541, § 55).

We conclude that there is nothing presented in this case which justifies a reversal.

Judgment affirmed.

DAVIS v. CHIPMAN. (Civ. 6876.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 27, 1929.

Rehearing Granted Dec. 27, 1929.

1. Contracts ⇨161—All sentences in agreement must be considered together, and attention cannot be confined solely to last sentence.

In construing agreement containing only three sentences, all three must be considered, and attention cannot be confined solely to last sentence as if it were detached and unconnected with first two.

2. Brokers ⇨40—Real estate broker's past services held sufficient consideration to support promise to pay commission.

Services rendered by real estate broker prior to agreement to pay commission if designated party exercised option to purchase held sufficient consideration to support promise to pay.

3. Brokers ⇨42—Agreement relating to commissions for sale of realty secured through agent's "efforts" held to contemplate "negotiation" of sale of property to recover compensation for which agent was required to have license (St. 1919, pp. 1252, 1259, §§ 2 and 20).

Agreement, stating that option to purchase realty was secured through agent's "efforts" and that agent "interested" optionee, and containing promise to pay commission if sale was effected with party whose name and address had been furnished as one with whom agent had been dealing for sale of property, held to contemplate negotiation of sale of property to recover compensation for which agent was required to have license under St. 1919, pp. 1252, 1259, §§ 2 and 20; word "efforts" meaning the same as word "negotiations."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Negotiation; First and Third Series, Effort.]

4. Brokers ⇨75—Commission for securing sale of realty being payable ratably when purchase price was received, agent held only entitled to commission on each installment as collected.

Under agreement providing that commission for procuring sale of realty was to be due and payable ratably and proportionately if, as, and when such purchase price is received by owner, agent held only entitled to commission on each installment as collected.

5. Brokers ⇨42—Real estate broker can recover commissions if he possesses license when commission is earned and payable.

Real estate broker, though not possessing license at time of employment and rendition of services, can recover commission if he possesses such license when his commission is earned and payable.

6. Brokers ⇨86(1)—Facts showing negotiations with prospective purchaser held insufficient to support finding that prospect's name and address with whom agent had been dealing for sale of property was furnished as required.

In action to recover real estate broker's commission, where agreement required agent to furnish owner name and address of purchaser with whom they had been dealing for sale of property, facts showing agent attempted to interest purchaser in syndicate and disinterest him in obtaining property for himself held insufficient to support finding that prospect's name and address had been furnished as required by agreement.

7. Brokers ⇨53—Agent introducing prospective purchaser at latter's request, whereupon purchaser and owner without agent's assistance negotiated sale, held not procuring cause.

Where, after expiration of option to procure purchaser, agent introduced purchaser at latter's request to owner, and purchaser and owner without aid or assistance of agent negotiated terms of sale, agent's efforts held not procuring cause of sale so as to entitle him to commission.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Harry F. Davis against W. F. Chipman, as trustee of the estate of Josephine A. Phelps, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. C. Sharpsteen, Cushing & Cushing, and William H. Gorrill, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Fred L. Berry and Dozier & Kimball, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

GRAY, Justice pro tem. Challenging the sufficiency of the evidence to support certain findings, defendant appeals from a judgment awarding plaintiff one half of the unpaid balance of an agreed compensation (the other half having been assigned to Thomas B. Dozier, Jr., plaintiff in the companion case) for services, which the complaint, in the form of a common count, alleges, and the answer denies, were rendered to defendant, and for which the answer affirmatively alleges plaintiff cannot recover because he was not a licensed real estate broker.

The unquestioned findings picture the transaction between the parties, out of which the present dispute arose, as follows: Simultaneously, defendant executed and delivered to Thomas B. Dozier, Jr., his written option to purchase certain property therein described, within three months, for $250,000, and to plaintiff, his written agreement, containing the following pertinent terms: "Thomas B. Dozier, Jr., has requested me to send you this copy of the above Option to Purchase, as he states that such Option to Purchase was secured through your efforts, and that you interested him in the property from a purchase standpoint. I hereby agree, if Thomas B. Dozier, Jr., * * * exercise the above option to purchase * * * to pay you a commission on the sale of the property of ten per cent. (10%) of the purchase price of the same, such commission to be due and payable ratably and proportionately, if, as and when such purchase price is received by me. * * * It is further understood and agreed that, on or before the expiration of said Option to Purchase, both Mr. Dozier and yourself are to furnish me with the complete names and addresses of all parties with whom you are or have been dealing for the sale of said property under said Option to Purchase and that no commission will be due and payable to you except it is effected within one (1) year of said expiration of said Option to Purchase and with one of the parties whose name and address has been previously furnished by one or both of you, and it is further understood that any party to whom a sale of the property is effected through your efforts must be a party with whom there have been no negotiations heretofore in connection with said property." Within the time limited, plaintiff and Dozier, jointly, furnished to plaintiff the names and addresses of persons, including the subsequent purchaser. Plaintiff also, after the expiration of the option, personally introduced to defendant this purchaser and the last two "directly and together conferred respecting the purchase of said property, the conditions and terms of sale of said property and negotiated solely and alone therefor * * * without the interposition or acts of plaintiff. * * * " While these negotiations were pending, plaintiff and Dozier wrote defendant "that we are willing to accept a commission of ten per cent. (10%) of each payment on the purchase price * * * such commission to be payable to us out of and from each payment on the purchase price, if, as and when received by yourself, without interest." Defendant has received the total purchase price of $250,000 in unequal installments over a period of eighteen months. Plaintiff was a licensed real estate broker only during the time when installments totaling $191,506.50 were received. Defendant paid commissions on the first three installments in accordance with the letter, without interest, although plaintiff did not then have a license.

The court further found that plaintiff rendered services to defendant, at his request, for an agreed compensation of $25,000, which is due, owing, and unpaid; that plaintiff and Dozier furnished to defendant, in writing, the name and address of the purchaser, as required by the agreement; that plaintiff did not negotiate the terms of the sale or do other than introduce the purchaser to defendant, as a result of which the sale was effected; that a cause of action for the services accrued as each installment was paid; and that such services were rendered, not as a real estate broker, but consisted merely of finding and introducing a purchaser who was ready, able, and willing to purchase. By his claim that the evidence is insufficient to support these findings, defendant squarely presents for decision the question: What services were to be rendered under the agreement? He argues that the agreement employed plaintiff, as a real estate broker, to produce a purchaser, and that, as plaintiff's services were not the procuring cause of the sale, and as he did not have a license as a real estate broker at the time of sale, he cannot recover. In reply, plaintiff takes two somewhat inconsistent positions: (1) That the services to be rendered under the agreement consisted merely of furnishing names and addresses according to its terms and were not such as are performed by a real estate broker; and (2) if such services required a license, he can recover on those installments which were paid when he had such license.

[1-3] The nature and extent of the services for which plaintiff was to be compensated are to be determined solely by an examination of the above-mentioned agreement because a comparison of its terms with those in the letter of Dozier and the plaintiff, acceded to by defendant, when he mailed the first check for commission, clearly shows a modification solely as to interest. In construing that agreement all three sentences must be considered and attention cannot be confined solely to the last sentence, as if it were detached and unconnected with the first two sentences. Cole v. Low, 81 Cal. App. 633, 254 P. 676. The first sentence states that Dozier's option was secured through plaintiff's efforts and that plaintiff interested Dozier in the purchase of the property. The italicized words aptly and appropriately described services to be performed by a real estate broker. Sessions v. Pacific Improvement Co., 57 Cal. App. 1, 206 P. 653; Ross v. Major, 178 Mo. App. 431, 163 S. W. 880. It is apparent that such services were rendered prior to the agreement. However, such past services were a sufficient consideration to support the promise to pay, if Dozier exercised his option, as contained in the second sentence. Cole v. Low, supra. In the last sentence, defendant promised to pay the commission, if a sale was effected with a party whose name and address had been furnished as one with whom plaintiff had been dealing for the sale of the property under the option and with whom there had been no previous negotiations. The effect of this sentence was not to create a new and independent obligation, separate and distinct from the obligation created by the second sentence, but was intended "to protect plaintiff for his efforts during the life of the contract resulting in a sale not consummated until after the termination of the contract." Wright & Kimbrough v. Dewees, 52 Cal. App. 42, 46, 197 P. 957, 958, Hobson v. Hunt, 59 Cal. App. 679, 211 P. 242. The word "efforts," in the clause "It is further understood that any party to whom a sale of the property is effected through your efforts must be a party with whom there have been no negotiations heretofore," means the same as the word "negotiations." Sessions v. Pacific Improvement Co., supra. The services contemplated by the agreement, therefore, were the negotiation of the sale of the property to recover compensation for which plaintiff was required to have a license. St. 1919, pp. 1252, 1259, §§ 2 and 20; Kornman v. Nelson, 83 Cal. App. 616, 257 P. 150. The case of Shaffer v. Beinhorn, 190 Cal. 569, 213 P. 960, cited by plaintiff, is not in point, because the court was there not discussing a question of fact, but merely passing upon the sufficiency of a complaint, which contained an allegation expressly negating the statutory definition of a real estate broker.

[4, 5] Since the agreement provided "such commission to be due and payable ratably and proportionately if, as and when such purchase price is received by me" (the defendant), plaintiff was only entitled to a commission on each installment as collected. Arnold v. La Belle Oil Co., 47 Cal. App. 290, 109 P. 815; Miller v. Lerdo Land Co., 52 Cal. App. 662, 199 P. 1073. A real estate broker, although he possessed no license at time of employment and rendition of services, can recover his commission if he possesses such license when his commission is earned and payable. Houston v. Williams, 53 Cal. App. 267, 200 P. 55; Wise v. Radis, 74 Cal. App. 765, 242 P. 90. Were it not for the matters to be next discussed, plaintiff would therefore be entitled to a commission on the installments paid while he had such license.

"The duty assumed by the broker is to bring the minds of the buyer and seller to an agreement for a sale, and the price and terms on which it is to be made, and until this is done his right to commissions does not accrue." Sibbald v. [Bethlehem] Iron Co., 83 N. Y. 382 [38 Am. Rep. 441]. * * * If he failed to do that, he is not entitled to the commission, even though he made efforts to sell the property, and first called to it the attention of the party who subsequently made the purchase. * * * Zeimer v. Antisell, 75 Cal. 509, 512, 17 P. 642, 643. "It is not enough that he contribute indirectly or incidentally to the sale by imparting information which tends to arouse interest, but it is sufficient if it be established that he set in motion a chain of events which without break in their continuity caused the buyer and seller to come to terms, that his efforts constituted the proximate cause of the meeting of the minds of the principals. * * * Sessions v. Pacific Improvement Co., 57 Cal. App. 1, 206 P. 653; Sargent v. Ullsperger, 54 Cal. App. 384, 201 P. 934. It is necessary for the broker to prove therefore that he was the efficient or procuring cause of the sale; in other words, it must appear that his efforts had to do with the meeting of the minds of the seller and buyer. Webster v. Parra, 72 Cal. App. 639, 237 P. 804. * * * "The expression "procuring and inducing cause," as used in the books, refers to the cause originating from a series of events that without break in their continuity results in the prime object of the employment of the agent." Roth v. Thomson, 40 Cal. App. 208, 180 P. 656, quoting approvingly the rule stated in Smith v. Preiss, 117 Minn. 392, 136 N. W. 7, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 820. In any event the question of whether or not the sale is primarily the result of the broker's efforts is one of fact, and the trial court's conclusions thereon will not be disturbed on appeal if there be substantial evidence to sustain them. Sessions v. Pacific Improvement Co., supra." Bail v. Glantz, 78 Cal. App. 49, 53, 248 P. 258, 259.

[6, 7] The following facts appear, without conflict, in the transcript of evidence: The purchaser had previously attempted to buy the property from a prior optionee. Dozier and plaintiff, within the life of Dozier's option, attempted to interest the purchaser in a syndicate, which they were then trying to form to acquire the property under the option. The purchaser informed them that he was not interested in joining the syndicate but was interested in acquiring the property for his own account. Learning this attitude, they attempted to disinterest the purchaser in obtaining the property for himself. During the option's term, Dozier and plaintiff furnished the name and address of such purchaser, as that of a party with whom they had been dealing for the sale of the property. Obviously the attempt to interest this purchaser in the syndicate and disinterest him in purchasing the property for himself was not dealing with him for the sale of the property, and hence defendant's objection that the evidence does not support the court's finding that such

Where there was testimony to effect that stock was delivered by father to daughter as and for sale, and that she accepted it with understanding and agreement to pay for it at certain price, and that reasonable value of stock was that price, there was ample evidence to support decision of trial court that stock was delivered to daughter as sale and not as gift.

E. B. Taylor, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Charles N. Douglas, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. Plaintiff, as executor of the above-named deceased, brought this action against defendant, a daughter of the said deceased, for the sum of $3,250 as the agreed purchase price of 100 shares of capital stock of the San Francisco Milling Company. The complaint was later amended by adding the allegation that defendant had agreed to pay for said stock the reasonable value thereof, and that the reasonable value thereof was $3,250. The defendant in her answer denied that the deceased had sold her the stock, and alleged that it was given to her in appreciation of her assistance in preparing and obtaining a certain agreement between said deceased and certain of his children.

At the trial the main issue was whether the certificate for 100 shares had been delivered to defendant as a gift or as a sale for which she had promised to pay. The case was tried by the court without a jury. The findings and judgment were in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

There is scarcely anything to be said in favor of this appeal except the apparent earnestness of counsel for the appellant. The briefs of appellant are entirely given over to attacks upon the sufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment and findings. The points made are such as might properly be made in the trial court, but, as each one resolves itself into a consideration of a con-name and address had been furnished as required by defendant's agreement is well taken. After the expiration of the option, plaintiff introduced the purchaser, at the latter's request, to defendant, and, as the court found in accord with the evidence, the purchaser and defendant, without aid or assistance of plaintiff, negotiated the terms of the sale. Measured by the rule stated in the above-cited cases, these facts clearly show that plaintiff's efforts were not the procuring cause of the sale, especially in view of his efforts to disinterest the purchaser. Necessarily included within the court's finding that plaintiff rendered services to defendant at his request is an implied finding that plaintiff's efforts were the procuring cause of the sale, which finding is unsupported by the evidence. Furthermore, this finding is based in part on the agreement which contemplated the services of a real estate broker. As plaintiff's efforts were not the procuring cause, such services were not rendered, and this finding is unsupported in the evidence.

Judgment reversed.

Thomas B. DOZIER, Jr., Plaintiff and Respondent, v. W. F. CHIPMAN, as Trustee of the Estate of Josephine A. Phelps, Deceased, Defendant and Appellant. (Civ. 6907.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 27, 1929.

Rehearing Granted Dec. 27, 1929.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

W. C. Sharpsteen, Cushing & Cushing, and William H. Gorrill, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Fred L. Berry and Dozier & Kimball, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

GRAY, Justice pro tem. This is a companion case to Harry F. Davis, Respondent, v. W. F. Chipman, as Trustee of the Estate of Josephine A. Phelps, Deceased, Appellant (No. 6876) 92 Cal. App. page —, 282 P. 992, this day decided. Respondent herein, as assignee, recovered judgment for the other half of the commission involved in the other case. For the reasons stated in the opinion in the other case, judgment is reversed.

flict of evidence, they are of no avail to appellant in this court. There is ample evidence in the record to support the decision of the trial court. There was testimony to the effect that the stock was delivered to appellant as and for a sale; that she accepted it with the understanding and agreement to pay for it; that she agreed to pay $32.50 per share for it; and that the reasonable value of said stock was $32.50 per share. The certificate of stock was dated October 2. The conversations and transaction which constituted the sale were said by witnesses to have occurred upon September 29. This, of course, does not mean that the testimony of the sale must be entirely discredited. It only means that there is a discrepancy in dates—by no means an unusual thing in the trial of a case. No point of this discrepancy was made at the trial nor in the examination of the witnesses. These dates are of no importance, and have no significance in the case, except as they might influence the trial court in weighing the testimony of the witnesses. The discrepancy in dates does not even give rise to any confusion, for there was only the one certificate and the one transaction of sale.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MADDUX. (Cr. 1557.)★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 26, 1929.

1. False pretenses ⇨11—Realty may be subject of obtaining property under false pretenses.

Real property may be subject of obtaining property under false pretenses, although it cannot be subject of larceny.

2. Witnesses ⇨245—Sustaining objection to questions which had already been asked and answered held proper.

In prosecution for grand larceny, where information was framed under Pen. Code, §§ 484, 486, as amended by St. 1927, pp. 1046, 1047, where witness had testified that she did not remember or know of certain things having been done, sustaining objection to question whether witness would say that those things had not been done held proper; such questions being mere repetition.

3. Witnesses ⇨270(2)—Sustaining objection to question as to why witness had not told that certain statements were part of conversation testified to on direct held proper.

In prosecution for theft, where witness had testified regarding certain conversation, sustaining objection to question on cross-examination as to why witness had not told on direct examination that certain statements were part of such conversation held proper, since witness is not required to make a speech on direct examination.

4. Witnesses ⇨268(9)—Sustaining objection as to whether it was not first time witness had ever said anything about certain statement, held not error; it not being shown that question regarding such statement was asked.

In prosecution for grand larceny, where witness testified that accused had told her not to mention certain transaction, sustaining objection to question if it was not first time in any of the trials that witness had ever said anything of such request, held not error, it not being shown that witness was questioned regarding the request.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Homer R. Spence, Judge.

William B. Maddux was convicted of grand theft, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Myron Harris and Leo A. Sullivan, both of Oakland, and John Jewett Carle, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and W. R. Augustine, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The district attorney filed an information against the defendant charging him with having committed the crime of grand theft. The defendant pleaded not guilty. The jury brought in a verdict of guilty. The defendant made a motion for a new trial. The motion was denied. From the judgment entered on the verdict and the order denying a new trial the defendant has appealed.

[1] On this appeal the defendant earnestly contends that he was tried and convicted under a statute that was enacted subsequent to the alleged date of his offense. In the information it was alleged that the offense was committed on the 22d day of November, 1926. The information was filed on the 2d day of May, 1929. It is conceded that the information was framed under the amendments to sections 484 and 486 of the Penal Code as amended (St. 1927, pp. 1046, 1047). In this connection the defendant asserts that real property cannot be the subject of larceny, and therefore cannot be the subject of obtaining property under false pretenses. He cites and relies on People v. Cummings, 114 Cal. 437, 46 P. 284, and People v. Folcey, 78 Cal. App. 62, 247 P. 916. Those cases state a doctrine which, if it still obtained, might be claimed to support the contention of the defendant. However, the doctrine of those cases was highly technical and unsatisfactory, and, in so far as this case is concerned, the doctrine of the cases cited had been modified, if not entirely departed from. People v. Rabe, 202 Cal. 409, 418, 261 P. 303. As the first and second points made by the defendant are but different methods of presenting the same general contention, it follows that they may not be sustained.

It is claimed that the court erroneously instructed the jury upon issues not within the pleadings. This contention rests on the claim as above stated; that is, that the information did not include the offense of obtaining property under false pretenses. As we have held above that it did, we need not pause to discuss the point when made from a different angle.

Again, the defendant claims that there was a variance between the information and the evidence. If, as we have held, the offense of obtaining property under false pretenses could be inquired into, under the information as framed the point must be ruled against the defendant. It is sufficient to state that we have no doubt but what the inquiry could be made under the information.

[2-4] When the prosecuting witness was on the stand, she was asked if she had ever signed any deed to her property before November, 1926. She answered that she had no remembrance of doing so. She was then asked, "Would you say that you have not, Mrs. Johnson?" An objection was made and sustained on the ground that it had been asked and answered. In ruling the trial court remarked that, if counsel desired to propound a specific question, calling the attention of the witness to some particular paper, such matter could be gone into, but that it would do no good to repeat the same question to the witness several times. In another place she was asked if it was not a fact that Mr. Maddux paid the interest on the property. She replied, "I don't know." Counsel then proceeded, "Would you say that he did not?" An objection that the question had already been asked and answered was sustained. The ruling was not erroneous. When the witness Tracy had testified regarding a conversation that he held with the defendant he was asked on cross-examination if in that conversation the defendant had not made some other statements. The witness testified that he had. He was then asked why he had not told the jury on his direct examination that such additional facts were a part of the conversation. An objection to the question was sustained. The ruling was not erroneous. If any single question propounded to the witness was believed to be answered erroneously, or only partly, that particular question and answer could properly have been the subject of cross-examination, but as to why the witness had not made a speech while giving his direct examination was quite irrelevant. A parallel incident arose on the examination of the prosecuting witness. During the trial she testified that on a certain occasion the defendant had told her not to mention a certain transaction to any one. The attorney for the defendant then propounded this question: "Today is the first time in any of these trials that you ever said that, isn't it?" An objection was made and sustained by the trial court, and it added: "Unless it is shown that such question was asked." The ruling was clearly correct.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

REED v. WELLS. (Civ. 3924.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 3, 1929.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 173(2)—In action against lessor for failing to furnish water for irrigating, defense that lessee could have minimized crop loss must be pleaded and proved.

In action by lessee for breach of lease of farm lands by reason of defendant's failure to furnish sufficient water for irrigation by putting in wells, defense that loss of crop by lessee might have been prevented by lessee's minimizing loss by small expenditure for magneto and a belt was required to be pleaded and proved in trial court, and could not be presented for first time on appeal.

2. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 48(1/2)—Lessee's failure to check land, properly asserted as defense to recovery against lessor for furnishing insufficient water, was not excused by proof that lessee followed lessor's instructions or would have had to employ engineer.

In action by lessee of cotton lands against lessor for breach of lease by failing to furnish sufficient water for irrigation, lessee's failure to check land in proper and customary manner, with result that it was unevenly irrigated, was not excused by fact that lessee had followed lessor's instructions or that lessee would have had to incur expense of employing engineer or surveyor in order to check the land properly.

3. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 48(1/2)—Lessee who failed to properly check and irrigate could not recover for loss of crop by reason of lessor's failure to furnish water.

Under lease of lands for cotton providing that lessee should properly seed and cultivate the land and that lessor should sink wells producing certain quantity of water for irrigation, failure of lessee to check land in proper and customary manner, or to plant, irrigate, and cultivate cotton, properly prevented recovery against lessor for loss of crops claimed to have resulted from lessor's failure to furnish sufficient water.

4. Trial $\S$ 253(7)—Formula instruction must contain all elements essential to recovery.

A formula instruction must contain all the elements essential to a recovery, and the absence of any one of such elements is not compensated for or cured by reference in other instructions correctly and fully stating the law.

5. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 296(2)—Instruction permitting lessee's recovery from lessor for crop loss held erroneous notwithstanding subsequent instruction, where lessee did not properly check or irrigate land.

In lessee's action against lessor of cotton lands for breach of lease by failing to furnish sufficient water for irrigation, instruction permitting plaintiff's recovery of damages if lessor's breach caused failure of crop held erroneous, where it appeared from plaintiff's own testimony that he did not properly check the land for irrigation or properly irrigate premises, notwithstanding subsequent instruction whereby jury were told that plaintiff could not recover if he had not complied with the terms and conditions of the lease.

6. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 251(3)—Instruction permitting lessee's recovery from lessor for damages resulting from breach of contract in any part held too broad.

In action by lessee against lessor for damages for loss of crops claimed to be due to lessor's breach of lease by failing to furnish sufficient water for irrigation, instruction permitting recovery of damages resulting from defendant's failure to comply with contract in any particular or material part held erroneous as authorizing recovery for breaches of lease not in issue.

7. Landlord and tenant $\hookrightarrow$ 48(1)—Refusal to permit lessor to prove that lessee's crop failure was due to lessee's financial inability held error.

In action by lessee against lessor for damages for loss of crop due to lessor's breach of lease, in which plaintiff testified that crop failure was due to insufficient supply of water for irrigation, refusal to permit defendant to prove that plaintiff's failure and abandonment were due to plaintiff's financial inability to perform his obligations under the lease held error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Robert B. Lambert, Judge.

Action by R. H. Reed against W. T. Wells. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Osborn & Hoar, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Klein & Nathan, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff was given judgment for damages alleged to have been caused by the defendant's breach of the terms of a lease. The defendant has appealed.

By the terms of the lease the defendant let to the plaintiff 120 acres of land for one year, commencing December 1, 1925, at a cash rental of $20 an acre, all the lands "to be cropped entirely to cotton, except 20 acres, which may be cropped in whole or in part to such other crops as said Reed may elect." Wells agreed, among other things, "to dig a well near said house and another one on the S. E. corner of the S. E. quarter of the N. W. quarter, and if either of said wells fail to produce as much as 250 gallons per minute when pumped, he will sink other wells so as to have a production of at least 250 gallons per minute at each of the two points; he will also place in each of said wells a pump and engine capable of producing and delivering at least 250 gallons of water per minute into the reservoirs, one of which shall be located at each well and shall be not less than 100 feet square and hold at least 4 feet of water. It is understood that these pumps and engines are not to be new, but they are to be in good condition and ready for use, and the said Reed is to look after their further repair and their fuel supply—Wells to have no further obligation than the setting of the pumps and having them ready for use, and in good and proper condition for use. * * * Said Wells will also level said land so that a six inch head of water will go over it—the levels to be taken between borders, and any land that he cannot or does not level shall be credited back to said Reed at the regular rental price per acre. The said Wells will also open and make passable the road running through the center of the section. * * * Also, he will extend the ditches running from the east line of the section, so as to serve all of the rented premises."

The complaint alleges:

"That plaintiff put 80 of said acreage into cotton. * * * That defendant refused and failed to level the land as agreed upon, so that plaintiff could not put the balance of said acreage into cotton as agreed upon; also refused to put in sufficient wells so that plaintiff was unable to get any or sufficient water for said cotton; also refused and failed to put in pump and engine as agreed upon for the pumping of said water; and also refused to open and make passable the road through the center of said section as set forth in the next to the last paragraph of said agreement; also failed and refused to extend the ditches running from the east line of the section as agreed upon in the last paragraph of said agreement.

"That by reason of the failure on the part of defendant to perform his part of said agreement as above set forth plaintiff was prevented from proceeding with his part of said agreement, and that said crop was a total loss to plaintiff."

The defendant answered the complaint, denying that he failed or refused to perform any of said terms of the lease on his part, and filed a cross-complaint for the rent provided for in the lease.

Under the express terms of the lease, the plaintiff was not entitled to damages by reason of the defendant's failure to level 40 acres of the land, but only to be relieved from payment of "the regular rental price per acre" for such land. The complaint does not allege that the land on which the plaintiff planted cotton was not properly leveled. In respondent's brief it is said: "No claim was made by respondent for damages by reason of the non-leveling of the land. * * * The only issue at the trial was whether or not there was sufficient water furnished by defendant for the cotton on the 80 acres. * * * Defendant had agreed by his contract to put in sufficient wells, etc., to supply water enough for the crop. That was the only question. * * * The action was commenced by respondent for the recovery of the damage due him by reason of the failure on the part of appellant to furnish sufficient water which caused a total crop failure."

During the early part of the season, the plaintiff used water from the canal of the Miller & Lux Land Company for irrigation. It appears that such use was contemplated by the parties. The lease provides for the extension of "the ditches running from the east line of the section, so as to serve all of the rented premises." The leased land was all in the northwest quarter of the section, and the wells referred to in the lease were to be located in the same quarter section. The extension of the ditches referred to connected the leased land with the canal of the Miller & Lux Land Company.

The plaintiff, regardless of the natural slope of the land, divided it into straight strip checks 40 rods long and 50 feet wide, without any cross or contour levees. The plaintiff testified that the defendant told him to check the land in that manner. In that connection, he further testified as follows:

"Q. Don't you know it is the custom * * * to throw up the levees so that the high land will irrigate * * * in separate checks and the low land in other separate checks? * * * A. Well, yes, that is the custom. A fellow don't have a civil engineer or leveling—how is he going to know the high and low land. I was just doing according to his orders. * * * Q. Now, you say you put this water on the land before you planted it, did you not? A. I did. Q. Couldn't you tell with the water on the land then where the high and low land was? A. I know— Q. Then after that couldn't you have thrown up your levees in such a manner as to hold the water on the high land? * * * A. Why, sure, I could. * * * Q. And you didn't throw up any further levees after the first irrigation? A. I did not. * * * Q. You made the borders, and in making these borders did you pay any attention to the contour of the land? A. With my natural eye, I couldn't tell. * * * Q. You could not have contoured that land at all? A. It could have been done, yes."

The plaintiff testified that he irrigated the land before planting, commencing April 15; that he commenced planting about April 25; that he did not irrigate any of the land after planting except about 26 acres "where the cotton first died"; that he "watered it (the 26 acres) the second time to put in maize," but that he did not plant any maize; that he quit irrigating "when the water quit coming down the ditch," probably about the first of June; that the land "wasn't level, but at the same time by a big head of water you could push water over it"; that the cotton came up and "got all the way from an inch high up to probably hip, shoulder high; it just depended on where the land got sufficient water to irrigate the whole thing through"; that on July 19 the crop had died "just in spots where the land was steep, something like where it would run over fast that cotton died fast; it didn't live ten days after I got it up; * * * down in other places, where it would go six or eight, ten inches deep and get a good soaking that cotton lived probably some of it until the middle of June and July kept dying"; that, where the plants died first, "the water run over the land so fast it didn't wet the land but just a little on top and by the time the cotton got up the moisture had left it"; that, after irrigating the land and before planting it, he "had it disked and harrowed"; that part of it was then "well moist" and "part of it wasn't; at the same time I went ahead and planted it"; and that the whole crops raised amounted to only 4 or 5 bales of cotton; that he left the place about July 18 or 19, without any notice to the defendant, and did not thereafter return.

The evidence shows without conflict that the defendant dug wells at the places specified in the lease, each producing about 400 gallons a minute. It is true the plaintiff testified that the well near the house was tested about the 1st of March and that it produced only "a little stream about as big as my wrist," but another well was thereafter sunk "right by the side" of the one mentioned, and the defendant "coupled the two together" and installed a pump and engine. The evidence shows that they produced 400 gallons a minute. The plaintiff testified that the pump and engine were not installed, but the only things which he mentioned as lacking were a magneto and a belt. Other witnesses testified that the magneto and belt were in place. Two wells were dug at the "southeast corner of the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter" of the section, at a point referred to as point N. A witness for the defendant testified that at point N there was "just the one that the pump was put in and the engine connected; the other one was never connected with the engine." This was done about the middle of May. At a later stage in his testimony, the witness was asked: "Do you happen to know of your own knowledge when this well at point N was connected up?" He replied: "Well, that never was connected up. After Mr. Reed left I moved the engine and pump on another well." There is nothing to indicate which of the two wells at point N was referred to in the question and answer, but, in view of the testimony of the witness first quoted, it is to be inferred that the last answer referred to the well, mentioned in the first answer, which "was never connected with the engine." Another witness testified that it was not necessary to "couple both of the wells" at point N, "because the one well furnished enough water for the pump he had on, * * * a four inch pump." The water master, who had charge of the distribution of water for the Miller & Lux Land Company, testified that until "the 30th day of June there was all the water that any one wanted." This statement finds some corroboration in plaintiff's letter to defendant, dated June 29, 1926, stating: "I would like very much if you would send some one out to fix up the pumps and res. I never got through irrigating before ditch water give out."

Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, it shows merely that the defendant failed to equip the pumping plant at the house with a magneto and belt.

[1] Appellant contends that the plaintiff is not entitled to the net value of the crop which he lost, because he did nothing to minimize his loss, which he might have prevented by a small expenditure for a magneto and a belt. There are cases which support this contention. Sargent v. North End Water Co., 190 Cal. 512, 213 P. 33; Severini v. Sutter-Butte Canal Co., 59 Cal. App. 154, 210 P. 49. The answer, however, set up no such defense, and it does not appear that any such contention was made in the trial court or any instruction in relation thereto requested. It has been held to be the duty of the defendant to plead and prove the facts upon which such a defense is based. Vitagrap, Inc., v. Liberty Theatres Co., 197 Cal. 694, 699, 242 P. 709.

[2] There appears to be no escape from the conclusion that the failure of the plaintiff's crop was largely due to his own fault. According to his testimony, he failed to check the land in the proper and customary manner, with the result that it was unevenly irrigated, causing a considerable part of the crop to die shortly after it came up. It is no answer to say that the defendant told the plaintiff to prepare the land as the latter prepared it. The plaintiff was under no obligation to follow such direction. He had had long experience in raising cotton and in the irrigation thereof. Neither is it any excuse that it would have been necessary for the plaintiff to incur the expense of employing an engineer or surveyor in order to properly check the land for irrigation. That is a usual expense in the preparation of land for irrigation and one which the defendant was not bound to incur.

The court instructed the jury as follows: "You are instructed that, if you find by a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff, Reed, pursuant to the lease and agreement between plaintiff and defendant, went upon defendant's land, and prepared said land for planting, and planted therein a crop of cotton and that defendant failed to comply with his contract in any particular and material part thereof, and that such breach if you find there was a breach was the proximate and direct cause of the failure of the crop then your verdict must be for the plaintiff on his complaint, and you are further instructed that the measure of damages to which plaintiff would be entitled under these circumstances is the value of the crop in the condition it was at the time and place of destruction and in arriving at the value of the crop of cotton, as it stood at the time of its destruction, you will estimate the probable yield of the land planted to cotton, multiplied by the market value of the crops, and deduct therefrom the cost of producing and marketing said crop, and the value of the crop actually harvested. The amount remaining will be the amount of damages to which plaintiff would be entitled, if you find he is entitled to damages if the amount is less than the rent, then the damages should be deducted from the rent."

[3-5] This instruction is erroneous in at least two particulars. It authorizes a verdict for the plaintiff, even though he may have failed to check the land in a proper and the customary manner, or to plant, cultivate, and irrigate the crops properly. It is true that, in a subsequent instruction, the jurors were told that, if the "plaintiff has not complied with each and all of the terms and conditions of the lease on his part to be kept and performed, * * * he cannot recover." But the two instructions are conflicting. "The authorities are legion to the effect that a so-called 'formula' instruction must contain all the elements essential to a recovery, and the absence of any one of such elements may not be compensated for nor cured by a reference thereto in other instructions correctly and fully stating the law." Douglas v. Southern Pacific Co., 203 Cal. 390, 393, 264 P. 237, 238. While the evidence in a particular case, together with other instructions given therein, may warrant the conclusion that an erroneous formula instruction has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice, there is nothing in this case to justify such a conclusion. The plaintiff called no witness except himself, and his testimony was general and indefinite in character. It appears from such testimony that he did not properly check the land for irrigation, and that he applied the water available for a second irrigation to land on which his crop had perished, instead of on land having a growing crop. The only term of the lease to which the second instruction quoted is applicable provides that the plaintiff "is to properly seed and cultivate the said lands to the crops" to be grown thereon. It is doubtful whether jurors would understand that the plaintiff was thereby required to check and irrigate the land in a proper manner.

[6] The instruction is also erroneous in stating that the plaintiff is entitled to damages resulting from defendant's failure "to comply with his contract in any particular and material part thereof." Under this instruction the jury may have based the verdict on breaches of the lease by defendant which were not in issue. It was his duty under the lease to "level said land so that a six inch head of water will go over it." The plaintiff testified that parts of the 80 acres planted to cotton were not so leveled, but there was no such issue before the court, the only issue, as stated by respondent, "was whether or not there was sufficient water furnished by defendant."

[7] The plaintiff testified, in substance, that the failure of the crop and his abandonment thereof were due to an insufficient supply of water for irrigation. The defendant was not permitted to prove that such failure and abandonment were due to the plaintiff's financial inability to perform his obligations under the lease. The evidence sought to be introduced was admissible as tending to discredit the plaintiff's testimony last mentioned.

The judgment is reversed.

THOELE v. THOELE. (Civ. 29.)

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California. Dec. 6, 1929.

1. Divorce ⇨147—It is within province of trial court to pass on weight and sufficiency of conflicting evidence.

In divorce action where evidence is conflicting, it is within province of trial court to pass on weight and sufficiency of evidence.

2. Divorce ⇨184(6)—Where evidence is conflicting, fact that preponderance of evidence is on side of one party is not ground for reversal on appeal.

In divorce action, that greater weight or preponderance of evidence is on side of one party is not ground for reversal on appeal, where evidence is conflicting; it being only where there is total absence of competent evidence to sustain material finding that appellate court will reverse judgment on question of insufficiency.

3. Divorce ⇨93(3)—Allegations of extreme cruelty to wife predicated on husband's acts of larceny held to constitute cause of action for divorce (Civ. Code, § 94).

In wife's action for divorce on ground of extreme cruelty, defined by Civ. Code, § 94, predicated on husband's acts of larceny causing grievous mental suffering to wife, allegations held sufficient to constitute cause of action, though no acts of physical violence were shown.

4. Divorce ⇨130—Evidence held sufficient to support divorce judgment on ground of extreme cruelty based on husband's acts of larceny.

In wife's action for divorce based on ground of extreme cruelty predicated on husband's acts of larceny, evidence held sufficient to support divorce judgment.

5. Divorce ⇨127(4)—All acts of extreme cruelty relied on by party need not be corroborated by other evidence to support divorce judgment.

It is not necessary that all acts of extreme cruelty relied on by party be corroborated by other evidence in order to support judgment of divorce, it being only necessary that some of material number of alleged acts be supported by evidence other than that of parties.

6. Divorce ⇨127(4)—Acts of extreme cruelty relied on by party to obtain divorce judgment may be corroborated by circumstantial evidence.

Circumstantial evidence may be competent to assist in corroboration of acts of extreme cruelty relied on by party to obtain judgment of divorce.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; James L. Allen, Judge.

Divorce action by Elizabeth Louise Thoele against Bernard Thoele. From an interlocutory judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James L. Davis and Sharpless Walker, both of Santa Ana, for appellant.

A. P. Nelson and Clyde Bishop, both of Santa Ana, for respondent.

MARKS, J. Respondent filed her action for divorce in the court below upon the grounds of extreme cruelty. Appellant filed his answer in which he specifically denied all of the allegations of extreme cruelty. After a trial the court granted respondent an interlocutory decree of divorce, from which appellant took this appeal.

[1, 2] Appellant presents several assignments of error, but they contain quite the same questions of law and fact and may be consolidated under two heads, namely, that respondent's amended complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and therefore that the evidence submitted in support thereof does not sustain the interlocutory decree of divorce; and that the testimony of respondent was not sufficiently corroborated. He urges an additional specification of error under which he maintains that "there is a clear preponderance of evidence in favor of the defendant, and against the plaintiff," which cannot be considered here. Where the evidence is conflicting, as in this case, it is within the province of the trial court to pass upon its weight and sufficiency. Because the greater weight or preponderance of the evidence is on the side of one party or the other is not ground for reversal on appeal, where it is conflicting. It is only where there is a total absence of competent evidence to sustain a material finding that an appellate court will reverse a judgment upon a question of its insufficiency. Van Camp v. Van Camp, 53 Cal. App. 17, 199 P. 885.

[3] In the amended complaint, upon which the trial was had, respondent alleged that prior to their marriage appellant had told her that he was of good moral character and worthy of her love and affection; that shortly after the ceremony she learned that he had been guilty of the crime of burglary; that after marriage he was guilty of larceny on several occasions and brought the stolen property to their home, showed it to her, and told her that he had stolen it; that she lived in constant fear of the arrest of her husband, and of her home being searched as a place of concealment of stolen property; that he was extremely stingy and penurious and habitually and falsely charged her with being extravagant, and criticized her expenditures in the maintenance of their home, to which allegation she added instances of the conduct of which she complained; that the treatment of her by appellant caused her to suffer greatly in her nervous system and mind; that it was wrongful and caused her grievous mental suffering. While the testimony of respondent supported the allegations of her complaint, appellant flatly contradicted all of it except that he had been guilty of burglary prior to their marriage. This was not denied by him.

In presenting his argument in support of his claim that the allegations of the amended complaint do not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the evidence in support thereof does not support the judgment, appellant cites and relies upon decisions of eastern and southern courts worthy of the highest respect. However, an examination of the statutes of the several states in effect at the time the decisions were rendered discloses that the extreme cruelty upon which an action for divorce could be predicated was defined by such statutes, as, such conduct on the part of the guilty spouse as would produce either physical injury or render a continued joint residence dangerous to the innocent party. The definition of extreme cruelty given us by our Legislature contains no such restrictions, so the cases cited have not been followed here.

Our Legislature has defined extreme cruelty as any act, or acts, or conduct, that would result in the "wrongful infliction of grievous bodily injury, or grievous mental suffering, upon the other by one party to the marriage." Section 94, Civ. Code. Since the decisions of the cases of Barnes v. Barnes, 95 Cal. 171, 30 P. 298, 16 L. R. A. 660, and Fleming v. Fleming, 95 Cal. 430, 30 P. 566, 29 Am. St. Rep. 124, it has been the recognized rule of law in this state that: "No arbitrary rule of law can be laid down as to what particular facts must be alleged and proven in order to justify a finding that the complaining party has suffered grievous bodily injury or has undergone grievous mental suffering. A correct decision must always depend upon the sound sense and judgment of the trial court. 'Whether in any given case there has been inflicted grievous mental suffering or grievous bodily injury, is a question of fact to be deduced from all the circumstances of each particular case, keeping always in mind the intelligence, apparent refinement and delicacy of sentiment of the complaining party.' (Barnes v. Barnes, 95 Cal. 171 [16 L. R. A. 660, 30 P. 298]; Fleming v. Fleming, 95 Cal. 430 [29 Am. St. Rep. 124, 30 P. 566]; Andrews v. Andrews, 120 Cal. 184 [52 P. 298]; MacDonald v. MacDonald, 155 Cal. 665 [25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 45, 102 P. 927]; Donnelly v. Donnelly, 26 Cal. App. 577 [147 P. 582]; Perkins v. Perkins, 29 Cal. App. 68 [154 P. 483]; Maloof v. Maloof, 175 Cal. 571 [166 P. 330]; McCahan v. McCahan, 47 Cal. App. 176 [190 P. 460]; Crum v. Crum, 57 Cal. App. 539 [207 P. 506].) Therefore, in the case at bar, whether or not the acts and conduct of appellant inflicted grievous mental suffering, or grievous bodily injury, or both, upon the respondent, was a question of fact for the determination of the trial court from all the facts and circumstances in the case." Hansen v. Hansen, 86 Cal. App. 744, 261 P. 503.

[4] In the case before us, appellant admitted that he had been guilty of the crime of burglary before their marriage, and that respondent knew of this fact. Respondent testified that her husband told her that he had stolen various articles of personal property, including tools, electric light reflectors, hose, burlap, copper wire, and other such articles, bringing them to their home, and that he thought it was smart on his part to defraud his rich employers. This course of conduct might well have caused her the most grievous mental suffering. She knew that he had committed the grave crime of burglary. She had his statements that he was continuing his career of crime, and the products of his alleged larceny were before her. To a woman of high principles and refinement, the belief that her husband was a criminal, together with the constant fear of his arrest and the attendant disgrace always threatening her, might furnish the keenest form of mental suffering. She testified that it not only affected her mind, but that her health was impaired by it, and her testimony upon this phase of the case was amply corroborated. The trial court found in her favor and under the decisions heretofore cited this finding will not be disturbed here.

Appellant urges with great earnestness that the testimony of respondent as to his extreme cruel treatment of her, predicated upon his acts of larceny alleged to have been committed after the marriage, was not sufficiently corroborated. He denied stealing the property and attempted to explain its acquisition by lawful means, either by gift or by purchase. The articles described by respondent as stolen by her husband were all seen at their home by at least one of her witnesses. Appellant attempted to explain the possession of the hose in question by the testimony of a relative, who said he permitted appellant to take and use some half-inch garden hose, while that seen by respondent's witnesses at the home of the parties was inch and one-half cotton covered hose. According to the testimony of appellant, and corroborated by his own witnesses, the reflectors in question, from 10 to 15 in number, were taken by him from the Moshier Special Oil Company without the consent of the company. On another occasion appellant attempted to steal a five-pound can of grease from the Standard Oil Company. Appellant denied all of the thefts except the burglary committed before marriage, and the attempted theft of the grease, but his testimony was so thoroughly impeached by the contradictory evidence of disinterested witnesses that the trial court might well have considered him unworthy of belief.

[5, 6] It is the well-settled law of this state that it is not necessary that all of the acts of extreme cruelty relied upon by a party be corroborated by other evidence in order to support a judgment of divorce. It is only necessary that some, or a material number, of the alleged acts be supported by evidence other than that of the parties, and circumstantial evidence may be competent to assist in the corroboration. Venzke v. Venzke, 94 Cal. 225, 29 P. 499; Andrews v. Andrews, 120 Cal. 184, 52 P. 298; Avery v. Avery, 148 Cal. 239, 82 P. 967; Percy v. Percy, 188 Cal. 765, 207 P. 369; Blanchard v. Blanchard, 10 Cal. App. 203, 101 P. 536; Johnston v. Johnston, 17 Cal. App. 241, 119 P. 403. Section 130 of the Civil Code requires corroboration of the testimony of the parties. "Under this section it evidently is not necessary that the plaintiff's testimony be corroborated as to every fact and circumstance testified to. It is enough if there be corroboration as to some fact or facts which is or are sufficient to support the action and justify the entry of a decree in plaintiff's favor. Matthai v. Matthai, 49 Cal. 90. In Evans v. Evans, 41 Cal. 103, the court, speaking of the statute then in force, and which was similar to the provision of the Code above quoted said: 'The statute does not define to what extent the corroboration must go. In the very nature of the case it would be impossible to lay down any general rule as to the degree of corroboration which will be requisite. Hence, the statute only requires that there shall be some corroborating evidence.' * * * These facts, with the testimony of Mr. Johnson, certainly corroborated the plaintiff's testimony as to one act of extreme cruelty on the part of the defendant, and we think this sufficient corroboration to uphold the judgment." Cooper v. Cooper, 88 Cal. 45, 25 P. 1062, 1063.

Appellant further contends that other findings of the trial court as to other acts of extreme cruelty are not supported by the evidence. As the judgment is supported by the findings we have already reviewed, it will not be necessary to further consider the evidence supporting the other findings. Andrews v. Andrews, supra.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Mortgages ⇨187—One taking possession of mortgaged land under agreement with mortgagor and in recognition of relation is "mortgagee in possession."

"Mortgagee in possession" is one taking possession of mortgaged land by virtue of agreement between him and mortgagor and in recognition of relation between them.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Mortgagee in Possession.]

2. Mortgages ⇨188—Trust deed conveys no right of possession, and trustor may remain in possession and until execution of trust maintain action therefor.

Though trust deed passes legal title, it conveys no right of possession, and trustor may remain in possession, and, until execution of trust, maintain action to recover possession even when trust deed is silent upon that subject.

3. Mortgages ⇨199(1)—Grantee under conveyance from trustor before execution of trust held entitled to possession rendering those wrongfully retaining possession liable for rent (Civ. Code, § 3334).

Where trustor under trust deed conveyed premises before execution of trust while he was entitled to possession, grantee held entitled to possession and, under Civ. Code, § 3334, parties in possession were liable for reasonable rental value thereof during time they wrongfully retained possession.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨53(2)—Purchaser agreeing with tenant in possession that he should retain possession held not to justify tenant's withholding possession from subsequent purchaser.

Agreement between purchaser of property and tenant in possession that purchaser wanted tenant to stay in possession and keep premises up in condition it was at time in order that purchaser might resell property held not to justify tenant's withholding possession from subsequent purchaser.

5. Landlord and tenant §53(2)—Agreement between purchaser and tenant in possession regarding rent held not intended to give tenant right to possession without paying rent after title passed to subsequent purchaser.

Agreement between purchaser of premises and tenant in possession that, in event of purchaser's failure to take and pay for personal property within 30 days, tenant shall be relieved of payment of any rental, held not intended to give tenant continuing right to hold property without payment of rent after title had passed to stranger to agreement.

6. Appeal and error §1071(6)—Failure to find on affirmative matters in answer held not prejudicial error, where findings thereon must under evidence necessarily have been adverse to appellants.

Failure of trial court to find on all affirmative matters set up in answer held not prejudicial error where, if findings thereon had been made, they must necessarily have been adverse to appellants under uncontradicted evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Ross Campbell, Judge.

Action by H. W. Meadows against James A. Snyder and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Nutter, Hancock & Rutherford and Arthur P. Hayne, all of Stockton, for appellants.

Frederick Dubovsky and E. E. Keyes, both of Oakland, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff was given judgment against the defendants for the sum of $700 as the reasonable rental value of the premises in Cloverdale, Sonoma county, known as "Dad Snyder's Inn," for a period of seven months, commencing October 14, 1925. The defendants have appealed from the judgment.

The answer admits that the plaintiff was the owner of the property during the seven months mentioned, that the defendants were in possession thereof during all of that time, and that the reasonable monthly rental value thereof was $100. Relying on such admissions, the plaintiff introduced no evidence. The facts hereinafter stated appear from the testimony of the defendants and documentary evidence concerning which there is no dispute.

On and prior to September 9, 1920, and at all times thereafter until March 28, 1925, the defendants Spoerke and Thompson were the owners of the property mentioned; the title standing in Spoerke's name. On September 9, 1920, in like manner, they owned and held the personal property used in and in connection with the inn. On the day last mentioned, they, in Spoerke's name, entered into an agreement with the defendant Snyder, by the terms of which they leased the inn to him until March 1, 1922, at a rental of $75 a month, and gave him an option to buy the property for $11,500. In the same instrument they agreed to sell the personal property to him for $3,500, $1,000 of which was to be paid, in cash and the remainder in installments. The agreement provided that the owners might sell the premises "at any time during said lease," and that, in the event of such a sale, "the buyer must also buy the furniture therein contained." Snyder went into possession under the lease, and he has been in the actual possession thereof continuously since such entry. March 28, 1925, Spoerke conveyed the real property to W. T. Hopkins, and the latter gave his promissory note in payment of the purchase price, secured by a deed of trust covering the same property. Snyder and Hopkins executed an agreement, dated April 2, 1925, by the terms of which Snyder agreed to deliver possession of the premises to Hopkins and a bill of sale of the personal property upon his payment within 30 days of $4,000 for the personal property, Snyder to pay rental at the rate of $100 a month for the time he might remain in possession but providing "that in the event the said sum of $4,000 is not paid as hereinabove specified within the said period of 30 days, then and (in) that event this agreement shall become null and void, and the said party of the first part shall be relieved of the necessity of delivering up possession of the said premises or executing the said bill of sale or the payment of any rental as herein specified." Hopkins failed to make the payment provided for in the agreement, and it appears that he made no attempt to carry out the terms of the agreement. It appears that he conveyed the premises to the plaintiff, because, as stated, the pleadings admit that the plaintiff became the owner thereof on October 14, 1925. The plaintiff served notice on the defendants of his purchase of the property, and demanded that they pay rental at $350 a month or vacate the premises, but they did neither. Spoerke thereafter caused the premises to be sold under the terms of the trust deed. He became the purchaser at the sale and received a deed for the property May 15, 1926.

The answer of the defendants covers 15 pages of the transcript. In addition to denials and admissions of averments of the complaint, it sets up affirmative matters as a defense, and then proceeds to allege four further separate defenses. There is some uncertainty as to the particular grounds upon which the appellants rely for a reversal. In their closing brief they say: "Respondent complains that we do not specify the defense we rely on. * * * The only variable quantity in the various defenses is the way in which the relation between Thompson and Spoerke on the one hand, and Snyder on the other, is pleaded. We have this pleaded in three ways: First, that the relation is that of principal and agent. Second, vendor and vendee, and, third, landlord and tenant. The evidence discloses the exact relationship of the parties and shows that same was that of the vendor and vendee. Under the terms of this contract the vendee was to pay the vendor $75 each month as installments on the purchase price."

The answer alleges that by the agreement of September 9, 1920, Snyder agreed to pay the purchase price of the real property "in installments of $75 each and every month," but the agreement contains no such provision or any provision binding Snyder to purchase such property on any terms whatever. By that agreement he was given a mere option to purchase the property at the price stated therein. The answer alleges "that on the 28th day of March, 1925, said defendant, Frederic Spoerke, conveyed said property to one W. H. Hopkins." There is no denial of the allegation of the complaint "that the plaintiff became the owner of the said premises on the 14th day of October, 1925." The answer alleges that Spoerke purchased the property at the sale under the trust deed, and that the property was thereupon conveyed to him, and that "the said Frederic Spoerke ever since said time has been, and still is, the owner of said property, but that the defendant W. H. Thompson ever since said day, has likewise owned an interest therein." It thus appears that there is no basis for the claim that, during the period for which the plaintiff was allowed the rental value of the premises. Snyder was in possession thereof as the vendee of his codefendants, or that they had any interest in the property other than their rights under the trust deed.

[1-3] There is nothing in the record which would warrant a finding that the defendants, or any of them, were in possession of the property as beneficiaries under the trust deed. It was not introduced in evidence, and its terms were not proved. Appellants contend that such beneficiaries were in the same position as "mortgagees in possession," and that therefore they were liable at most for the income they received from the property. "A 'mortgagee in possession' is one who takes possession of the mortgaged land by virtue of an agreement between him and the mortgagor, and in recognition of the relation between them." Freeman v. Campbell, 109 Cal. 360, 362, 42 P. 35. No such an agreement was proved in this case. A trust deed passes the legal title, "but it conveys no right of possession, and the trustor may remain in possession, and, until the execution of the trust, may maintain an action to recover possession even when the trust deed is silent upon the subject of possession." Sacramento Bank v. Alcorn, 121 Cal. 379, 383, 53 P. 813, 814; Hollywood Lumber Co. v. Love, 155 Cal. 270, 273, 100 P. 698; MacLeod v. Moran, 153 Cal. 97, 100, 94 P. 604. Under these authorities, the plaintiff was entitled to possession of the property upon the conveyance thereof to him, and the defendants are liable for the reasonable rental value thereof for the time they wrongfully retained the possession thereof. Civ. Code, § 3334.

[4] There is testimony that, at the time Hopkins and Snyder executed the agreement of April 2, 1925, "Mr. Hopkins told Mr. Snyder that he wanted him to stay in possession and keep it up in the condition it was at that time in order that he might resell the property," but this is no justification for withholding possession from a subsequent purchaser of the property.

[5] The provision in the agreement of April 2, 1925, that, in the event of Hopkins' failure to take and pay for the personal property within 30 days, Snyder "shall be relieved of * * * the payment of any rental as herein specified," must be construed as relating to the period of time within which Hopkins was given the right to complete the purchase of the property, at the end of which time the agreement was to become "null and void" in the event of failure to pay for the property. That provision certainly was not intended to give Snyder the continuing right to hold the property without payment of rent after the lapse of six months, when the title had passed to a stranger to the agreement.

[6] It is true, as contended by the appellants, that the trial court did not find on all the affirmative matters set up in the answer. If findings thereon had been made, however, under the uncontradicted evidence relating to every material issue so raised, such findings must necessarily have been adverse to the defendants, and therefore it was not prejudicial error not to find thereon. 24 Cal. Jur. 944.

The judgment is affirmed.

WHITMEYER v. SOUTHERN PACIFIC CO.
et al. (Civ. 6421.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 27, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 27, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 23, 1930.

1. Street railroads ⇨ 117(24)—Whether driver of stalled automobile struck by street car was negligent in remaining with automobile too long held for trial court.

Question of whether or not driver of automobile struck by street car while stalled on street car tracks was negligent in remaining with it too long in effort to remove it from dangerous position held one of fact to be determined in trial court from all circumstances of case.

2. Street railroads $\S$ 99(1)—Person may assume motorman will operate electric car in reasonable and careful manner.

Person has right to assume that motorman will operate his electric car in reasonable and careful manner.

3. Street railroads $\S$ 90(3, 4)—Motorman must keep lookout for vehicles on tracks of electric railroad in city and exercise ordinary care to prevent collision and stop car to avoid collision when seeing vehicle stalled on tracks.

It is duty of motorman operating an electric interurban car on streets of city to keep lookout for vehicles on track, and, when he discovers, or in exercise of ordinary care, by keeping lookout, should discover, presence of vehicle on track in place of apparent peril, he must exercise ordinary care to prevent collision, and, when seeing track is occupied by vehicle which cannot be moved in time to avoid collision, motorman must bring car to stop, and failure to do so is negligence.

4. Negligence $\S$ 136(14)—Negligence is usually question for jury, deducible from circumstances of particular case.

Seldom are circumstances presented which enable court to say, as a matter of law, that negligence has been shown, so that it is usually question of fact for jury, as an inference to be deduced from circumstances of each particular case.

5. Negligence $\S$ 136(9)—Though facts are undisputed, if reasonable minds might draw different conclusions regarding negligence, question is one of fact for trial court.

Even where facts are undisputed, if reasonable minds might draw different conclusions on question of negligence, question is one of fact for determination of trial court.

6. Street railroads $\S$ 114(9, 10)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that street car striking stalled automobile was negligently operated because motorman failed to keep vigilant watch or operated car at excessive speed.

Evidence held legally sufficient to sustain finding that street car which struck automobile stalled on tracks while person was attempting to crank it was being negligently operated either on ground that motorman was not vigilant in watching track ahead or that motorman was operating car at excessive rate of speed.

7. Street railroads $\S$ 90(2)—That street car striking stalled automobile was running within maximum speed fixed by ordinance or statute did not absolve owner's responsibility nor prevent finding speed was excessive.

That electric railroad car striking automobile stalled on tracks while person was attempting to crank it was running within maximum speed fixed by ordinance or statute does not in itself absolve owner of electric car from responsibility, nor did it conclude trial court from finding as fact that under circumstances speed was nevertheless excessive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by Ralph Whitmeyer against the Southern Pacific Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco (Fletcher A. Cutler, of Burlingame, of counsel), for appellant.

Gillis & Edwards, of Oakland, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. About 8 o'clock in the evening an automobile in which respondent was riding stalled close to, and almost parallel with, the track of the appellant company, on a public street in the city of Alameda; and, while respondent was stooped in front of the machine endeavoring to start the same by cranking the engine, one of appellant's interurban electric cars ran into the rear end of the automobile, shoving it upon respondent and severely injuring him. As a result of the accident, respondent commenced this action to recover damages for the personal injuries suffered by him, and upon trial before the court sitting without a jury was awarded judgment for the sum of $954.17, from which judgment this appeal was taken, the sole ground urged for reversal being that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

The accident occurred on Lincoln avenue between Oak and Park streets, about 150 or 200 feet easterly of Oak street, in a business section of said city. Lincoln avenue is a paved street, and runs in an easterly and westerly direction. It is a little less than 50 feet wide between curbs, and along the center thereof appellant maintains double tracks over which it operates its interurban electric cars. On the evening in question respondent had accepted an invitation to ride home with a friend in the latter's automobile. They started on Lincoln avenue east of Oak street, and, after traveling easterly toward Park street for a distance of about 75 feet, the driver pulled over toward the east-bound car track in order to pass a machine parked at the curb, and before he was able to clear the track his automobile stalled close to the outer rail thereof. Several unsuccessful attempts were made to start the engine with the self-starter, and then the driver requested respondent to get out and crank the engine, which respondent proceeded to do; and, while he was stooped in front of the machine in the act of "spinning" the crank, appellant's east-bound car came along and struck the rear end of the automobile, with the result already stated.

Lincoln avenue is straight and level for a distance of over 600 feet westerly of the point of collision, and testimony was given by persons who witnessed the accident from the sidewalk to the effect that, although the red tail light of the automobile was lighted, and the automobile itself could be seen plainly within the glare of the headlight of the electric car continuously from the time the car came within a range of 500 feet of the automobile until it was struck, the speed of the electric car was not slackened nor its brakes applied until it was within 15 or 20 feet of the stalled machine.

[1-3] Respondent testified that, when he alighted from the automobile to crank the engine, he saw the headlight of the electric car, which was then about 500 feet distant from the place where the automobile stalled, and that he knew the automobile was not clear of the track. Appellant contends, therefore, that in remaining in front of the machine until it was struck respondent was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. It has been held, however, that the question of whether or not the driver of an automobile which has stalled on a street car track is negligent in remaining with it too long, in his efforts to remove it from its dangerous position, is one of fact to be determined in the trial court from all the circumstances of that particular case. In this regard the case of Unger v. San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Rys., 61 Cal. App. 125, 214 P. 510, 513, declares the law to be as follows: "The driver of an automobile or other vehicle stopped for any temporary cause in front of an approaching street car cannot be held guilty of negligence as a matter of law if he does not desert his vehicle, at least until it is reasonably certain that an impact is unavoidable. He has a right to assume that those in charge of the operation of the approaching street car, seeing his predicament, will not recklessly run him down. He has a right to make a reasonable effort to start his vehicle, if it is susceptible of being started, and so save it and its occupants from injury. Whether his act in so doing or attempting to do were unreasonable and negligent would be a question of fact, which it would be the province of the jury to determine, in view of all of the circumstances of the particular case." See, also, Maderios v. Boston Elevated Ry. Co., 254 Mass. 302, 150 N. E. 156; Brien v. Detroit United Ry. Co. (D. C.) 247 F. 693.

Furthermore, a person has the right to assume that a motorman will operate his electric car in a reasonable and careful manner (Smith v. Southern Pacific Co., 201 Cal. 57, 255 P. 500); and in this connection the general rule is that it is the duty of a motorman operating an electric interurban car on the streets of a city to keep a lookout for vehicles on the track, and, when he discovers, or in the exercise of ordinary care, by keeping a lookout should discover, the presence of a vehicle on the track in a place of apparent peril, it is his duty to exercise ordinary care to prevent a collision, and, when it becomes apparent that the track is occupied by a vehicle which cannot be moved in time to avoid a collision, it is his duty to bring the car to a stop, and a failure to do so is negligence (25 R. C. L. p. 1251; Oklahoma Union Ry. Co. v. Burgess, 124 Okl. 233, 254 P. 970); and that he is guilty of negligence if he omits without apparent excuse to look ahead and observe whether or not the track is clear (Swain v. Fourteenth Street Ry. Co., 93 Cal. 179, 28 P. 829; Callett v. Central California Traction Co., 36 Cal. App. 240, 171 P. 984).

[4, 5] In the present situation it may be fairly inferred from all of the circumstances surrounding the accident that respondent remained in front of the automobile as long as he did, believing that he would be able to start the automobile and thus remove it from the danger of being struck by the electric car before the car reached that point, but, if unable to do so, that the electric car was being operated in a careful manner and at a reasonable rate of speed, and consequently that the motorman would see the stalled automobile in ample time to stop the car before colliding with it. Under such circumstances we are not prepared to hold as a matter of law that the trial court's finding that respondent was not negligent is wholly unsupported by the evidence. Brien v. Detroit United Ry. Co., supra. As often said, rarely is a set of circumstances presented which enables a court to say, as a matter of law, that negligence has been shown. It is usually a question of fact for the jury, an inference to be deduced from the circumstances of each particular case. Gregg v. Western Pacific R. R. Co., 193 Cal. 212, 223 P. 553; Seller v. Market-Street Ry. Co., 139 Cal. 268, 72 P. 1006. And, even where the facts are undisputed, if reasonable minds might draw different conclusions upon the question of negligence, the question is one of fact for the determination of the trial court. Johnson v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 154 Cal. 285, 97 P. 520; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513; Seller v. Market-Street Ry. Co., supra. The cases cited by appellant in furtherance of its contention that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence are not in point, for the reason that they differ materially in their facts from the present case, or relate to crossing accidents where the railroad company was operating its cars over its private right of way, and not over and along city streets.

[6, 7] It was claimed by the motorman that his view of the track ahead was obstructed by an automobile, other than the stalled one, traveling in front of his car and "afoul" of the track at a slow rate of speed, and which did not clear the track until it was close to the stalled one; and that consequently he was within 50 feet of the stalled automobile before he was able to see it. The essential portions of his testimony were contradicted, however, by the testimony of other witnesses, including the driver of the other automobile; but, aside from such contradiction, an analysis of the motorman's testimony would seem to demonstrate that the presence of the other automobile had little to do, if anything, with the cause of the electric car colliding with the stalled machine for the following reasons: He testified that his view in the direction of the stalled machine was not obstructed until the other machine appeared on the track in front of him, and that he was then only 300 feet distant from the stalled machine, and his car was traveling at a speed of 30 or 35 miles an hour; that immediately upon sighting the other automobile he applied the emergency brakes fully, and that they were not released until after the impact, but that his car did not come to a standstill until it reached a point beyond the stalled machine, because when traveling 30 miles an hour, it could not be brought to a stop, even with all brakes fully set, within a distance of 295 or 300 feet. Therefore, being within 300 feet of the stalled automobile before the brakes were applied, and being unable to stop the car within that distance, it would appear that, irrespective of the presence of the other automobile, he could not have escaped hitting the stalled machine, at the rate of speed his car was traveling. However that may be, we are of the opinion that, when all conflicts are resolved in favor of the trial court's decision, the evidence is legally sufficient to sustain its finding that the electric car was being negligently operated, either upon the ground that the motorman was not vigilant in watching the track ahead, or that under the conditions present the electric car was being operated at an excessive rate of speed; and the fact, if it be such, that the car was running within the maximum speed fixed by ordinance or statute, does not in itself absolve appellant from responsibility, nor did it conclude the trial court from finding as a fact that under the circumstances such speed was nevertheless excessive. Carey v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 75 Cal. App. 129, 242 P. 97.

For the reasons hereinabove stated, the judgment is affirmed.

KENNEY v. ANTONETTI et al. (Civ. 6926.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 2, 1929.

Rehearing Granted Dec. 31, 1929.

1. Automobiles ⚡242(1)—Proof that horse was present on highway as result of owner's negligence is necessary to recover for injuries in collision between horse and automobile (Motor Vehicle Act, § 151).

Proof that horse was present upon public highway as the result of voluntary act or the negligence of owner is necessary in order to recover under Motor Vehicle Act, § 151 (St. 1923, p. 565), for personal injuries sustained in an alleged collision between horse and automobile.

2. Negligence ⚡4—Negligence is indispensable element to recovery under law holding every one responsible for injuries occasioned by want of ordinary care (Civ. Code, § 1714).

An indispensable element to actionable case for damages, under Civ. Code, § 1714, providing that every one is responsible for an injury occasioned to another by his want of ordinary care in management of his property, is proof of negligence, or, in other words, want of ordinary care on the part of owner of property.

3. Automobiles ⚡243(5)—Testimony that horse of same color had been seen on highway was inadmissible in action for damages caused by collision with horse.

In an action to recover for personal injuries sustained in an alleged collision on public highway between defendants' horse and an automobile in which plaintiff was a passenger, testimony to effect that on some previous occasion a horse of the same color had been seen on the same portion of highway was inadmissible as being insufficient to support an inference that horse seen on previous occasion belonged to defendants and that they had followed practice of permitting horses to run at large on highway.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; H. C. Lucas, Judge.

Action by Agnes Kenney against Joe Antonetti and others. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Harry I. Stafford, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, and Wyckoff & Gardner, of Watsonville, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This is an action for damages on account of personal injuries sustained in an alleged collision on the public highway between defendants' horse and an automobile in which plaintiff was a passenger.

A motion for nonsuit on behalf of all the defendants was made and granted, and, from the judgment entered thereon, this appeal is taken.

Plaintiff's action is founded upon the theory that the horse was unattended upon the highway at night by reason of negligence on the part of the defendants, and that the negligence is to be presumed in view of the provisions of section 151 of the Motor Vehicle Act and section 1714 of the Civil Code.

Section 151 of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 565) at the time of the accident complained of, read as follows: "No person owning, or controlling the possession of, any livestock, shall voluntarily or negligently permit any such livestock to stray upon or remain unaccompanied by a person in charge or control thereof upon a public highway, either side of which is adjoined by property which is separated from such highway by a fence, wall, hedge, sidewalk, curb, lawn or building, nor permit the tether or any portion thereof to which such animal may be attached, to lie across or upon any public highway. No person shall feed, pasture, camp or drive any such livestock upon, over or across any public highway between the hours of sunset and sunrise, without keeping a sufficient number of herders on continual duty to keep open the road so as to permit at all times the ready passage of vehicles." Section 1714, Civil Code, provides that "every one is responsible, not only for the result of his willful acts, but also for an injury occasioned to another by his want of ordinary care or skill in the management of his property or person, except so far as the latter has, willfully or by want of ordinary care, brought the injury upon himself. The extent of liability in such cases is defined by the title on compensatory relief."

The motion for nonsuit was made upon two grounds, including the claim that plaintiff failed to introduce any evidence supporting the allegation of negligence. It becomes necessary, therefore, to examine the statutory provisions upon which appellant relies and the proof offered under the amended complaint.

[1] Section 151 of the Motor Vehicle Act declares that it is an offense for an owner to "voluntarily or negligently permit" his live stock to stray upon or remain unaccompanied by a person in control thereof upon a public highway which is fenced on each side. It is apparent that appellant sought to plead herself within this particular provision. In order, however, to enjoy such advantage as this provision might afford, it was incumbent upon appellant to prove, as well as allege, that the horse in question was present upon the highway as the result of the voluntary act or of the negligence of the defendants. 19 Cal. Jur. p. 638, § 68; Rathbun v. White, 157 Cal. 248, 252, 107 P. 309.

[2] Section 1714, Civil Code, lays down the general rule of negligence that every one is responsible for an injury occasioned to another "by his want of ordinary care * * * in the management of his property." Here again it is an indispensable element to an actionable case for damages that there be proof of negligence, or, in other words, want of ordinary care on the part of defendants in the control of their horse. Mitchell v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 87 Cal. 62, 72, 25 P. 245, 11 L. R. A. 130.

An examination of the evidence fails to reveal any evidence indicative of negligence by the defendants or the commission of any voluntary act by the defendants which would account for the presence of the horse on the highway. With the record in this situation, it would have been improper for the trial court to have permitted plaintiff's case to have gone to the jury, and the nonsuit therefore was properly granted.

[3] The appellant also complains of the ruling of the court excluding the entire testimony of several witnesses brought forward by the plaintiff. This evidence was introduced to show that on some previous occasion a horse of the same color had been seen on the same portion of the highway. It was introduced for the purpose of laying the foundation for an inference that the horse seen on the previous occasions belonged to the defendants, and that they had therefore followed the practice of permitting their horses to run at large on the highway, and that they were therefore negligent in the care exercised over their horses generally. As the evidence would have been wholly insufficient to support such an inference if drawn by the jury, it was properly stricken.

For the reasons above expressed, the judgment is hereby affirmed.

BRANDES v. RUCKER-FULLER DESK CO.
et al. (Civ. 6864.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 29, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 23, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 27, 1930.

1. Automobiles ⇨242(2)—Where automobile struck pedestrian on sidewalk, inherent nature of accident created inference of negligence of automobilist under res ipsa loquitur doctrine.

Where pedestrian on sidewalk was struck by automobile which left highway and came upon sidewalk, inherent nature and character of accident was such as to create an inference of negligence on part of automobilist under doctrine of res ipsa loquitur.

2. Trial ⇨62(2)—Pedestrian struck by automobile on sidewalk could rebut evidence steering mechanism broke to show failure to exercise ordinary care in keeping automobile in safe condition.

When owner and driver of automobile which struck pedestrian suing for injuries introduced evidence to substantiate claim that collision occurring on sidewalk was not due to careless operation of automobile by driver, but by sudden breaking of steering wheel mechanism, plaintiff had right to rebut that evidence, and in furtherance of right was entitled to show that defense based thereon was not maintainable because of failure of defendants to exercise ordinary care in keeping automobile in safe condition.

3. Automobiles ⇨238(3)—Additional element of negligence from failure to keep automobile striking plaintiff in safe condition, where defendants introduced evidence steering mechanism broke, could be alleged by plaintiff.

If there were any circumstances developed by evidence that defendants sued for injuries to pedestrian struck by automobile on sidewalk were not careless, and accident resulted from breaking of steering mechanism, and plaintiff's rebuttal evidence of failure of defendants to exercise ordinary care in keeping automobile in safe condition to establish additional element of negligence, plaintiff could allege it with other negligent acts pleaded in complaint.

4. Automobiles ⚡246(4)—Plaintiff struck by automobile on sidewalk, if defendants negligently failed to keep automobile in safe condition, though steering mechanism broke, could have jury instructed accordingly.

If defendants sued for injuries by pedestrian struck by automobile on sidewalk were negligent in failing to keep automobile in safe condition as result of which steering mechanism broke, plaintiff was entitled to have jury instructed accordingly.

5. Automobiles ⚡246(4)—Instruction It was not complete defense that steering mechanism of automobile striking pedestrian on sidewalk broke, and that owner, if not ascertaining reasonably safe condition, would be liable, held not erroneous.

Instruction that it was not complete defense for corporation owning automobile running on sidewalk and striking pedestrian to show merely that automobile was caused to run upon sidewalk by breaking of steering gear, and it was duty of corporation to exercise reasonable care in ascertaining safe condition of automobile, and that failure, if contributing to accident, would make owner of automobile responsible to injured person, held not erroneous.

6. Automobiles ⚡246(22)—Instruction that, if negligence in slightest degree proximately contributed to automobile striking plaintiff pedestrian, defendants would be liable, held not erroneous.

Instruction that, because sole defense of corporation owning automobile striking plaintiff after running upon sidewalk was that it was not negligent, and that therefore if jury believed from preponderance of evidence that defendant or employee driving automobile were in any manner negligent, though in only slightest degree, and negligence proximately contributed to accident, pedestrian was entitled to verdict, held not erroneous.

7. Trial ⚡252(2)—It is only necessary to warrant instruction that there be slight evidence upon issue.

In order to warrant giving of instruction it is not necessary that evidence upon issue be clear and convincing; it being sufficient if there be some or slight evidence upon that issue.

8. Evidence ⚡571(6)—Jury need not accept expert testimony of impossibility to detect defective steering mechanism of automobile striking pedestrian on sidewalk.

Jury was not bound to accept expert testimony that it could not have been detected that steering mechanism of automobile running upon sidewalk and striking pedestrian suing for injuries was in defective condition prior thereto.

9. Automobiles ⚡244(6)—Evidence showed failure to keep automobile striking pedestrian on sidewalk in safe condition, where steering mechanism was defective.

Evidence held sufficient to show failure to keep automobile, which ran upon sidewalk and struck pedestrian, in safe condition, where accident resulted because steering mechanism broke.

10. Appeal and error ⚡1068(2)—Though evidence be insufficient to sustain action or defense to which instruction applies, reversal cannot be had, if evidence regarding other causes of action or defenses is sufficient.

Though evidence may not be sufficient to sustain cause of action or defense to which an instruction applies, reversal may not be had upon that ground, if evidence as to other causes of action or defenses is sufficient to sustain verdict.

11. Automobiles ⚡244(6, 35)—Evidence showed automobile striking pedestrian on sidewalk was driven at excessive speed or that, if steering gear broke before, driver was negligent in not attempting to stop.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain verdict that automobile running upon sidewalk and striking pedestrian was unable to hold its course on highway because it was driven too fast around curve, and that steering gear broke thereafter when machine hit curb or came in contact with stump of tree, or that, though steering gear broke while rounding curve, driver was nevertheless negligent in making no effort to stop automobile by applying brakes before it struck pedestrian.

12. Automobiles ⚡245(6)—Whether automobile striking pedestrian on sidewalk was carelessly operated held for jury.

It was question of pure fact exclusively within province of jury to determine whether or not automobile running upon sidewalk and striking pedestrian was being operated around curve prior to accident in careless manner.

13. Appeal and error ⚡994(2)—Jury's determination under evidence from which jury might draw different conclusions that automobile striking pedestrian upon sidewalk was carelessly operated held controlling on appeal.

Though situation presented as to whether automobile striking pedestrian upon sidewalk was being operated in careless manner was one from which reasonable minds might draw different conclusions, determination of jury that it was being carelessly operated held controlling on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; El. C. Robinson, Judge.

Action by Lydia Brandes against Rucker-Fuller Desk Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 280 P. 379.

Donahue, Hynes & Hamlin, of Oakland, for appellants.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. Respondent brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained as a result of being struck by an automobile driven by the appellant Manbert and belonging to his employer and coappellant, Rucker-Fuller Desk Company. The trial took place before a jury, and respondent was awarded a verdict. Judgment was entered accordingly, and this appeal was taken therefrom. A reversal is sought upon the ground mainly that two instructions given at respondent's request were erroneous, appellants contending that thereby the jury was authorized to find against the Rucker-Fuller Desk Company on issues of negligence not raised by the pleadings and having no support whatever in the evidence.

The complaint alleged, in substance, that Manbert "so negligently and carelessly operated and controlled" the automobile as to cause it to leave the highway and to run along and upon the sidewalk and strike respondent, etc. The answer consisted merely of specific denials of the allegations of the complaint, no special or affirmative defenses being pleaded, and no claim being made at any time that respondent was at all negligent. The following were the undisputed facts adduced in support of the respondent's case: About 4 o'clock in the afternoon, Manbert, in the course of his employment as salesman for said company, was driving one of the latter's automobiles over and along a street in the city of Oakland, known as Park boulevard, and, while rounding a curve at a speed of between 15 and 20 miles an hour, the machine left the highway, jumped the curb, struck respondent, who was standing on the sidewalk in front of her garage, and continuing on dragged her along the sidewalk for about 20 feet and then over and down an embankment for a distance of about 50 feet more, when the automobile came in contact with the stump of a tree and stopped. The curve on which the accident happened was constructed on a descending grade, and along the side of the highway near the commencement of the curve there was a large sign reading: "Danger—Go Slow." From the time the machine started to leave the highway until it finally struck the stump of the tree it traveled approximately 90 feet.

In their exoneration appellants sought to prove that the proximate cause of the accident was the sudden breaking of the steering mechanism of the automobile. In this regard the driver testified that while rounding the curve the automobile suddenly became unmanageable, in that it failed to respond to the turn of the steering wheel; and his testimony was supplemented by evidence showing that after the accident the automobile, which admittedly had been in use nearly five years, was removed to a garage and disassembled, where it was discovered that the "short shaft" of the steering gear, which was an essential part thereof and controlled its operation, was broken; and expert testimony was introduced to prove that the ends of the broken shaft showed crystallization, that the shaft had been partially broken for some time, and that the final break was brought about by either vibration or strain. Thereupon respondent endeavored to show on cross-examination of appellants' witnesses that, if prior to the accident the steering shaft was, as claimed, in the dangerously defective condition described, then there was a failure on the part of appellants to exercise ordinary care in maintaining the automobile in a safe condition while operating the same upon and over the public streets. Appellants' witnesses insisted, however, that, even though prior to the accident the shaft had been removed from the housing in which it was inclosed, and examined, neither its crystallized condition nor the crack therein would have been visible to the naked eye, but could have been discovered only by the use of a microscope or other scientific means. Furthermore, and aside from the question as to the real cause of the machine being unable to hold its course on the curve, respondent established by the testimony of the driver that, at no time after realizing the steering gear was inoperative, as he claimed, and before the machine struck respondent, did he make any effort to stop its progress by applying the brakes.

In the state of the record above set forth the court gave the two instructions in question. The first one read as follows: "It is not a complete defense for the defendant, Rucker-Fuller Desk Company, a corporation, to show merely that the automobile in question was caused to run on the sidewalk by reason of the breaking of some part or portion of the steering gear of its automobile by reason of which the driver lost the power to control the same. It was the duty of the Rucker-Fuller Company to exercise reasonable care in ascertaining whether or not the automobile in question was in reasonably safe condition for its employees to use and if from the evidence in this case you believe that there was a failure upon the part of the Rucker-Fuller Company, a corporation, to exercise this degree of care in maintaining its automobile, and that such failure, if any, proximately contributed to the happening of the accident, then and in that event the defendant Rucker-Fuller Company, a corporation, would be responsible in damages to any person injured thereby." The second one was to the following effect: That the sole defense of the Rucker-Fuller Desk Company was that it was not negligent, no charge being made that respondent was negligent, and that therefore, if the jury believed "from a preponderance of the evidence that either the Rucker-Fuller Desk Co. * * * or its employee * * * were in any manner negligent, even though it be only in the slightest degree," and that such negligence proximately contributed to the accident, respondent was entitled to a verdict.

[1-6] Admittedly, under the conceded facts revealed by the evidence introduced by respondent in support of her case in chief, the inherent nature and character of the accident was such as to create an inference of negligence under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur; and as will be noted, in order to meet and overcome such inference and to exculpate themselves from all responsibility for the accident, appellants asserted, and introduced evidence to the effect, that respondent's injuries were proximately caused, not by the careless operation of the automobile by the driver, as alleged and claimed by respondent, but by an agency beyond their control, namely, the sudden breaking of the steering mechanism of the automobile. Therefore, when appellants asserted this new theory and introduced evidence to substantiate it, respondent doubtless had the right to rebut the same, and in furtherance of such right was entitled to show that a defense based thereon was not maintainable because of a failure on the part of appellants to exercise ordinary care in keeping the automobile in a safe condition; and the record discloses that whatever testimony was elicited in this behalf was received without objection. Consequently, if there were any circumstances developed thereby tending to establish an additional element of negligence on the part of appellants, respondent was entitled to take advantage thereof and to urge the same, along with the other negligent acts pleaded in the complaint and upon which she relied originally for recovery (Rocha v. Garcia, 203 Cal. 167, 263 P. 238; Gleeson v. Virginia Midland R. R. Co., 140 U. S. 435, 11 S. Ct. 859, 35 L. Ed. 458, cited approvingly and quoted from in Michener v. Hutton, 203 Cal. 604, 610, 265 P. 238, 59 A. L. R. 480); and, if that be true, then she was also entitled to have the jury instructed accordingly. For the reasons stated we are of the opinion that the instructions complained of were not erroneous.

[7-9] Appellants further contend that in any event there was no evidence whatever before the jury to raise the issue that there was a want of ordinary care to maintain the automobile in a safe condition, and consequently no evidence to warrant the court in giving instructions thereon; this contention being based upon the proposition that the expert testimony given by their witnesses, to the effect that the defective condition of the steering shaft could not have been discovered by the usual and ordinary inspection of the part, was uncontradicted. The law is well established, however, that in order to warrant the giving of an instruction it is not necessary that the evidence upon the issue be clear and convincing; it being sufficient if there be "slight" or "some" evidence upon that issue. 24 Cal. Jur., p. 832, and cases cited. Here the jury was not bound to accept the expert testimony given by appellants' witnesses (Michener v. Hutton, supra, quoting approvingly from Volkmar v. Manhattan Ry. Co., 134 N. Y. 418, 31 N. E. 870, 30 Am. St. Rep. 678); and, even though it be conceded that the direct testimony of such witnesses tended strongly to establish the fact that ordinary inspection of the steering shaft, if made, would not have revealed its dangerous condition, we think that when the entire cross-examination of said witnesses is considered it cannot be fairly said that there was no evidence whatever to support the hypothesis suggested by said instructions.

[10, 11] Moreover, it is held in the case of Eppinger v. Kendrick 114 Cal. 620, 46 P. 613, and substantially to the same effect in Mundorff v. Ramm, 66 Cal. App. 553, 568, 226 P. 820, that, even though the evidence may not be sufficient to sustain a cause of action or defense to which an instruction applies, a reversal may not be had upon that ground if the evidence as to other causes of action or defenses is sufficient to sustain the verdict. In the present case, aside from the question of the evidence relating to the issue of negligence hereinabove discussed, the testimony is legally sufficient in our opinion to sustain the verdict on either of the other following theories urged by respondent: First, that the machine was unable to hold its course on the highway because it was being driven too fast around the curve, and that the steering gear broke thereafter when the machine hit the curb or came in contact with the stump of the tree; and, secondly, assuming that the steering gear broke while rounding the curve, as claimed by the driver, that he was nevertheless negligent in making no effort to stop the progress of the automobile by applying the brakes before it struck respondent. It would appear, therefore, that under the rule stated in the authorities last above cited, a reversal of the judgment herein would not be justified, even though it were determined in accordance with appellants' contention that the testimony was insufficient to sustain the verdict on the ground of the failure to exercise ordinary care in maintaining the automobile in a safe condition.

The cases cited by appellants are essentially different from the one before us, and consequently are not in point. In some of them, unlike the present case, there was no evidence whatever upon which the instructions complained of were based. In the others the foreign element of negligence to which the asserted erroneous instructions applied was injected into the case affirmatively by the plaintiffs, over the objections of the defendants; while here, as pointed out, respondent in her case in chief confined her evidence to the issue of negligence raised by the pleadings, the other element of negligence which appellants assail having arisen necessarily out of the defense interposed by appellants themselves, and the testimony adduced by respondent with reference thereto having been introduced before the jury without objection.

[12, 13] We are also unable to sustain appellants' remaining point to the effect that, regardless of the question of whether said instructions were prejudicially erroneous, the evidence is insufficient as a matter of law to establish actionable negligence on the part of Manbert in the operation of said automobile. The Motor Vehicle Law (St. 1923, p. 553, § 113) expressly provides that any person driving a vehicle upon the public highway shall do so at a careful and prudent speed not greater than is reasonable and proper, having due regard to the traffic, surface, and width of the highway, and at such a speed as not to endanger the life, limb, or property of any person. It was therefore a question of pure fact exclusively within the province of the jury to determine whether or not under the existing conditions the automobile was being operated around said curve in a careless manner; and, even assuming that the situation presented was one from which reasonable minds might draw different conclusions, the determination of the jury is nevertheless controlling on appeal. Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513.

For the reasons stated the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PAINETTI et al. (Cr. 1849.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 29, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 12, 1929. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Dec. 26, 1929.

Criminal law §200(4)—In prosecution for possession of still, judgment of conviction was sustained as against plea of former jeopardy from conviction for possessing and manufacturing intoxicating liquor.

In prosecution for possession of still in violation of St. 1927, p. 497, judgment of conviction was sustained as against plea of once in jeopardy because of conviction of possession and manufacture of liquor under St. 1921, p. 79, although both offenses arose out of same transaction.

Houser, J., Acting P. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Fernando Painetti and Fred Casalichio were convicted of having possession of a still, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Jesse R. Shafer, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. The defendants were found guilty in the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles of the offense commonly designated as "possession of a still," which charge was amplified by use in the information of the language of the act denouncing the offense.

From a judgment of conviction and order denying their motion for a new trial the defendants prosecute this appeal. The only question raised on the appeal relates to the ruling of the trial court on defendants' plea of "once in jeopardy." During the trial of the case, the defendants offered in evidence the records of the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles in two cases; one wherein the defendants had been charged with possession of liquor under the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), and the other in which they had been charged with the manufacture of intoxicating liquor, also under the Wright Act. Counsel for defendants, in making the offer, stated that the records would show that the offenses of "possession" and "manufacture" were charged as having been committed on the same day that the defendants in the case on trial were charged with "possession of a still"; that both the defendants were found guilty upon each of the charges in the municipal court and sentence duly pronounced by the court. Subsequently, in support of their pleas of "once in jeopardy," the defendants placed on the witness stand one J. S. Martin, who as a witness for the prosecution testified as to the finding of the still in question and the defendants in charge thereof, and who also testified that he had been a witness for the prosecution in the municipal court in the trials wherein the defendants were charged with the offense of "possession" and the offense of "manufacture"; that in his testimony in the municipal court the witness had testified substantially as he had in the case on trial concerning what he had found when he and his brother officers made the raid on the premises where the defendants had been apprehended. The defendants also offered to call Officers Tolbert and Mosteller, who accompanied the witness Martin at the time of making the raid, and who, according to counsel for defendants, would testify substantially as Martin had testified. The district attorney stipulated that the said officers would so testify if put upon the stand.

The district attorney objected to the introduction of the records from the municipal court and also objected to the testimony of Martin and the proffered testimony of the other two officers on the ground that neither the records nor the testimony would sustain the defendants' plea of "once in jeopardy."

The court sustained the district attorney's objection on the theory that the offenses of "possession of intoxicating liquor" and of "manufacture of intoxicating liquor" of which defendants had been convicted, were separate and distinct offenses from the offense of "possession of a still," upon which the defendants were then on trial.

Before submitting the case to the jury, the court instructed the jury to find against the defendants on their plea of "once in jeopardy," and the jury so found. Appellants complain of the court's ruling and instruction as constituting prejudicial error.

The question is thus presented whether the offenses of "possession" and "manufacture" or either of them constitute in law and fact the same offense as that of the "possession of a still." If this question is answered in the affirmative, then the defendants' offer supported their pleas of "once in a jeopardy," and the court's ruling constituted prejudicial error.

The question as to when a previous conviction for a public offense will support the plea of "once in jeopardy" in a subsequent trial has frequently occupied the attention of our state and federal courts, and has resulted in a marked divergence of opinion. In California, however, the rule has been declared by our Supreme Court to be that, "to entitle a defendant to the plea of autrefois convict or acquit, it is necessary that the offense * * * be the same in law and fact." People v. Kerrick, 144 Cal. 46, 77 P. 711, 712. This declaration of the rule finds support by the weight of authority in our federal courts, as also in a number of our sister states. Burton v. U. S., 202 U. S. 344, 26 S. Ct. 688, 50 L. Ed. 1057, 6 Ann. Cas. 362.

This brief statement of the rule has been amplified by judicial authority in a number of jurisdictions. In Morey v. Commonwealth, 108 Mass. 433, the rule is stated as follows: "A conviction or acquittal upon one indictment is no bar to a subsequent conviction and sentence upon another, unless the evidence required to support a conviction upon one of them would have been sufficient to warrant a conviction upon the other. The test is not whether the defendant has already been tried for the same act, but whether he has been put in jeopardy for the same offence." The foregoing statement of the rule has been quoted with approval by the United States Supreme Court in Gavieres v. U. S., 220 U. S. 338, 31 S. Ct. 421, 55 L. Ed. 489.

In Ruling Case Law, vol. 8, p. 148, § 133, the author declares the rule to be as follows: "When a single transaction constitutes two or more offenses, wherein the lesser offense is not necessarily involved in the greater, and when the facts necessary to convict on the second prosecution would not necessarily have convicted on the first, then the first prosecution will not be a bar to the second." The author, in discussing this same question, further states (page 149, § 135): "A single act may be an offense against two statutes, and, if each statute requires proof of an additional act which the other does not, an acquittal or conviction under either statute does not exempt the defendant from prosecution and punishment under the other." On page 143, § 128, of the same work, the application of the rule is stated in the following language, and is supported by an extended list of citations from federal and state courts: "In determining whether both indictments charge the same offense the test generally applied is that when the facts necessary to convict on the second prosecution would necessarily have convicted on the first, a final judgment on the first prosecution will be a bar to the second, but if the facts which will convict on the second prosecution would not necessarily have convicted on the first, then the first will not be a bar to the second, although the offenses charged may have been committed by the same state of facts."

In the case of People v. Brannon, 70 Cal. App. 225, 233 P. 88, the court gave its approval both to the rule and its amplification, as declared by the Supreme Court of Ohio in the case of State v. Rose, 89 Ohio St. 383, 106 N. E. 50, L. R. A. 1915A, 256, as follows: "The prohibition of the constitution is against putting a person twice in jeopardy for the 'same offense.' * * * It is the identity of the offense, and not of the act, which is referred to in the constitutional guarantee against putting a person twice in jeopardy. * * * 'The constitutional provision,' * * * 'uses the word "offense." Layman and lawyer alike understand the word "offense" to here mean simply a "crime." * * * The words "same offense" mean same offense, not the same transaction, not the same acts, not the same circumstances or same situation. * * * It is not enough that some single element of the offense charged may have a single element of some other offense as to which the defendant had theretofore been in jeopardy, but the constitutional provision requires that it shall be the "same offense." * * *"

In Maine, the Supreme Court, in the case of State v. Littlefield, 70 Me. 452, 35 Am. Rep. 335, states the rule as follows: "If the first indictment were such as the prisoner might have been convicted upon, by proof of the facts contained in the second indictment, an acquittal or conviction on the first indictment will be a bar to the second."

In the case of State v. Elder, 65 Ind. 282, 32 Am. Rep. 69, the Supreme Court of Indiana states the rule as follows: "When the same facts constitute two or more offenses, wherein the lesser offense is not necessarily involved in the greater and when the facts necessary to convict on a second prosecution would not necessarily have convicted on the first, then the first prosecution will not be a bar to the second, although the offenses were both committed at the same time and by the same act." The foregoing amplification of the rule is quoted with approval by our Supreme Court in the case of People v. Majors, 65 Cal. 138, 3 P. 597, 52 Am. Rep. 295.

Other authorities declaring the rule in substantially the same language as that already quoted might be cited, but we feel the foregoing sufficiently declares and amplifies the rule, which is applicable to the instant case.

In an examination of the cases brought to our attention, where the question of "once in jeopardy" has been under consideration, we find they may readily be grouped in three classes:

First. Cases where the offense charged, either by reason of statutes or under the common law, necessarily includes one or more lesser offenses. Under the charge of grand larceny, a verdict of petit larceny may be found, and such a verdict would support the plea of "once in jeopardy" if the offender were again charged with grand larceny based upon the same facts. In such a case, in legal verbiage, the second charge would be the same offense, because the facts in the case have been declared to constitute petit larceny.

Grouped in the second class are cases which involve statutes which specify a series of acts; the commission of any one separately from the other being denounced as a crime, or the commission of all in the same transaction or simultaneously constituting but one crime. The statute prescribing the offense here involved, being Act No. 3795, Deering's Gen. Laws Supp. 1925-1927, adopted by the Legislature in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 497), presents this type of case. The denouncing portion of the act reads as follows: "Ownership or Possession of Stills, etc. Any person whether acting in his own behalf or as * * * who shall be the owner of or have any interest in or who shall operate or cause to be operated or knowingly have in his possession or control, any still, still worm, still cap, still condenser or stilling device of any kind, designed, used or intended for use in the manufacture or production of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes, shall be guilty of a felony. * * *" Section 1.

In the recent case of People v. Clemett (Cal. Sup.) 280 P. 681, 683, wherein the above referred to act was under consideration it was held " * * * that the Legislature prescribed but one punishment for a violation of said act." The underlying principle recognized in the Clemett Case gives rise to a similar ruling in cases brought under the Volstead Act (27 USCA § 1 et seq.). The denouncing portion of section 3 of title 2 of that act (27 USCA § 12) reads: "No person shall manufacture, sell, barter, transport, import, export, deliver, furnish or possess any intoxicating liquor except as authorized in this chapter. * * *" The rule has been declared in California, and is, indeed, supported by the weight of authority in other jurisdictions, that, when any two or more of the acts specified in section 3 of title 2 of the Volstead Act are shown to be involved in the same transaction and synchronous in time as to their happening, but one offense has been committed. In re Louis Chaus (Cal. App.) 268 P. 422; People v. Clemett (Cal. Sup.) 280 P. 681; Miller v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 300 F. 529; Schroeder v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 7 F.(2d) 60.

In the third class fall those cases which involve a consideration of a situation wherein one or several acts are denounced by the same or separate statutes as constituting two separate offenses, or where one act may be involved in each of two separate offenses. As where the possession of a revolver by an unnaturalized foreign-born person is made a felony by an act of the Legislature adopted in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 695), and the various other crimes in which a revolver may be used. The act of possession of a revolver is involved in the several separate offenses.

The instant case clearly comes within the last group. The rule applied to the cases in the first group is not applicable, for neither the offenses of "possession of liquor" nor the "manufacture of liquor" are by statute included within the felony charge of "possession of a still." Nor does the instant case come within the rule determining the classification of the second group. The acts of "possession of liquor" and "manufacture of liquor" are not denounced in the act prohibiting the "possession of a still." In People v. Clemett, supra, defendant was charged in count I with the crime of "possession of a still" and in count II with "operation of a still." Both of these acts are denounced in the same sentence in the statute known as the Still Act. The evidence disclosed that the act of "possession of the still" was simultaneous with the act of "operation of the still." The court there held that "all of the acts set out in the statute before us for construction are coupled with the disjunctive 'or,' one of which or all of which joined, constitute but one offense"; and the court therefore concluded: "We are of the view, upon the authority heretofore cited, that the Legislature prescribed but one punishment for a violation of said act, the punishment therefor to be meted out as the facts of the case might warrant."

But appellants contend the act of "possession of the still" charged in the instant case was necessarily involved in the act of "manufacturing liquor" of which they were convicted in the municipal court, and that they may not be punished a second time for the same act. Appellants confuse the identity of the act with the identity of the offense. As we have already pointed out, the same act may be involved in two separate offenses, and there can be no doubt that the Legislature so intended. It would be quite without the bounds of reason to say the Legislature intended the crime of "possessing a still," declared to be a felony, to be included in the act of "manufacturing liquor," declared to be a misdemeanor. Furthermore, the Still Act was enacted some time after the adoption of the Wright Act, and manifestly for the purpose of making more difficult the manufacture of distilled liquors, just as the enactment of the "revolver" statute was prompted with the hope of lessening the commission of violent crimes committed with the use of a revolver.

At the risk of extending this opinion to unwarranted length, we will cite a few cases involving an application of the rule, which we believe justifies the conclusion we have arrived at.

In the case of People v. Mehra, 73 Cal. App. 162, 238 P. 802, 807, the defendant was convicted of the offense of maintaining a nuisance; the charge being based upon evidence of the possession of intoxicating liquor by defendant in the place in question. The defendant had previously been convicted under the Wright Act of possession of intoxicating liquor at the place in question, and the record of that conviction was offered in evidence in support of his plea of "once in jeopardy." The court, holding the plea not good, said: "The error of appellant lies in the failure to apprehend the fact that the act or omission constituting the crime known as the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor is a separate and distinct offense from that of maintaining a nuisance for the sale of such liquor. The act or omission is not made punishable in different ways. The Volstead Act names different acts constituting different offenses, and punishes each act separately." Panzich v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 285 F. 871; State v. Wold, 96 Me. 401, 52 A. 909.

In Commonwealth v. Sheehan, 105 Mass. 192, it was held that conviction of keeping intoxicating liquors with intent to sell was not a bar to a subsequent charge based on the same evidence of maintaining a tenement used for the illegal keeping and sale of intoxicating liquors.

Under the National Motor Vehicle Theft Act (18 USCA § 408), which prohibits the transporting in interstate commerce of a stolen automobile, and also the selling, storing, or concealing of such an automobile, one may be held guilty of two separate offenses arising out of the same acts. U. S. v. Hampden (D. C.) 294 F. 345; York v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 299 F. 778.

In the case of People v. Devlin, 143 Cal. 128, 76 P. 900, where the accused had entered a dwelling and had taken personal property he was guilty of two separate offenses, that of burglary and that of larceny. This case frequently has been cited in California to sustain the proposition that the same act may be involved in the commission of two separate offenses, and that each of two offenses may be supported even though the same testimony is used in both.

In People v. Johnson, 82 Cal. App. 411, 256 P. 273, defendant had been acquitted of a charge of abortion. He subsequently was charged with practicing medicine without a license. The second charge was based upon the same evidence as that presented by the prosecution to support the first charge. It was held that acquittal on the first charge did not support his plea of "once in jeopardy."

In State v. Empey, 65 Utah, 609, 239 P. 25, 44 A. L. R. 558, the court had under consideration an appeal from a judgment of conviction of manslaughter. The evidence showed that the defendant was driving his car under the influence of intoxicating liquor and in a reckless manner, and, while so doing, struck a woman, who subsequently died of her injuries. The defendant was arrested and charged with the misdemeanor of driving an automobile in a reckless manner, while under the influence of intoxicating liquor. He was found guilty of the charge and subsequently an information was lodged against him charging him with manslaughter. The information charged, in substance, the same acts of negligent and reckless driving and intoxication while driving, as were charged in the misdemeanor complaint, there being added the additional charge that as the result of such negligent and reckless driving, the deceased came to her death. In support of the defendant's plea of "once in jeopardy," it was urged that the defendant was convicted of an offense based upon the same acts which the information charged as constituting the wrongful conduct resulting in the homicide. It was there urged that each and all of the wrongful acts of which defendant was guilty and which resulted in the homicide were presented to the court upon the previous conviction and formed the basis of the conviction. The court, after reviewing a number of California cases wherein was declared the rule determining what evidence might be offered in support of the plea of former jeopardy, held that defendant's plea was not good and that certain acts might be prohibited by law and punishable as an offense separate from another offense, which might, perchance, be the consequence of the same act.

In State v. Garcia, 198 Iowa, 744, 200 N. W. 201, 202, defendant was charged with driving an automobile while intoxicated. He had been previously found guilty in justice's court upon a charge of intoxication. The same evidence offered to support the charge of driving while intoxicated was used to support the charge of intoxication in the justice's court. In fact, the only evidence of intoxication in either case was that of intoxication while defendant was driving his automobile. The court held that the first conviction was not a bar to the trial of the second charge, "because two crimes may be committed in the course of one and the same transaction." The court points out that it is within the power of the Legislature to create two or more offenses out of a single act.

In People v. Majors, 65 Cal. 138, 3 P. 597, 52 Am. Rep. 295, the defendant was placed upon trial on a charge of murder. It appears from the evidence that he had advised one Jewell to rob one Renowden. In perpetrating the robbery, Jewell shot and killed Renowden and a companion, one McIntyre. The act of Majors in advising Jewell to commit the robbery had furnished the basis of the charge and conviction of Majors for the murder of Renowden, and, when brought to trial upon a charge of murdering McIntyre, Majors offered in support of his plea of "former jeopardy" his conviction of the murder of Renowden. The court held that his conviction was not a bar to the second charge, even though based upon the same acts as formed the basis of his first conviction.

The foregoing cases cited will suffice to indicate the application of the rule to various sets of facts, wherein it has been held that separate offenses have been committed.

In making application of the rule to the situation here involved, it appears: (1) That the offense in the instant case is not the same in fact and law as the offenses charged in the municipal court. (2) The evidence necessary to convict on the charge of "possession of a still" would be insufficient to convict on the charge of "possession of liquor" or the charge of "manufacture of liquor."

We therefore conclude that the offense here charged, "possession of a still," a felony, is a separate and distinct offense from those charged in the municipal court, as shown by the records offered in support of defendants' pleas of "once in jeopardy."

The judgment and ordering denying defendants' motion for a new trial are affirmed.

I concur in the conclusion reached:
YORK, J.

HOUSER, Acting P. J. I dissent. It is apparent that no one can manufacture intoxicating liquor without being in possession of a still. Conviction of "manufacture" is necessarily inclusive of "possession of a still." The evidence herein is conclusive that the offense of "possession of a still," as charged in the information in the instant case, and the offense of "manufacture of intoxicating liquor," of which the defendant was formerly convicted, rested upon contemporaneous acts, was predicated upon the same transaction, and identical testimony. Personally, I am unable to appreciate the force of the argument that, because on the "manufacture" charge the defendant was prosecuted under the provisions of one statute, and in the instant case for "possession of a still" under the provisions of a different statute, perforce and necessarily he is not entitled to an acquittal on the plea of once in jeopardy.

To my mind, the decision in the case of People v. Clemett (Cal. Sup.) 280 P. 681, is controlling in the instant case.

TAYLOR et al. v. KING et al. (Civ. 5623.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 5, 1929.

1. Payment ⇨17—Under contract providing for payment for construction of building by secured note, acceptance of note constituted payment.

Where contract for construction of building provided for payment of price by note due 60 days after completion of building, which was secured by trust fund certificates and common stock of corporation, which securities were to be deposited with trustee in certain bank, note, as evidenced by express understanding of parties, was to be accepted in payment and written agreement therefor so construed.

2. Payment ⇨78—Finding that construction contractors accepted note held tantamount to finding that obligation was paid by note, where contract provided for payment by secured note.

Where it was found that contractors received and accepted note given for construction of building, finding was tantamount to one that obligation was paid, where contract provided for payment by secured note.

3. Trial ⇨404(1)—Findings must be liberally construed to support judgment.

Findings must be liberally construed so as to support judgment.

4. Appeal and error ⇨931(4)—Appellate court must conclude trial court intended to find note was received in payment for construction of building, regardless of delivery of securities therefor, where court found contractors accepted note.

Where it was found that contractors received and accepted note, and construction contract provided payment could be by note, District Court of Appeal construing findings liberally to support judgment must conclude trial court intended to find note was received in payment, regardless of delivery of securities which under agreement were to secure note.

5. Appeal and error ⇨719(6)—Appellate court must affirm judgment in absence of assignment of insufficiency of evidence supporting findings.

In absence of District Court of Appeal being pointed to insufficiency of evidence to support findings, judgment cannot be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Action by James O. Taylor and others against William J. King and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Frank L. Rabe and Frank M. Smith, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Nichols, Cooper & Hickson, of Pomona, for respondents.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J. The plaintiffs were the general contractors for the erection of a building for the defendant Wm. J. King. This action was brought for the purpose of foreclosing a mechanic's lien for the last payment in the sum of $5,700. Judgment was rendered for the defendants, and plaintiffs prosecute this appeal.

The contract, after stating the times for and the amounts of the first three payments, reads with respect to the final payment as follows: "4. In payment of five thousand seven hundred 00/100 dollars ($700.00/100) to be paid on the following terms and conditions: One promissory note of $5,700.00/100 due 60 days after completion of building, said $5,700.00/100 note secured by 30 Royalty Trust Fund Certificates at $500.00/100 each and 150 shares of common stock of National Vacant Seat Indicator Company at $100 per share par. Said note and securities to be deposited with R. Bruce Findlay, trustee, at American National Bank, Pomona, Cal. Said securities to be sold at their par value. The first $5,700.00/100 received by said trustee from the sale of said securities to be used to liquidate $5,700.00 note. The sale of said securities to begin at the time the foundation is complete. Sale of said securities shall be prosecuted by W. J. King and associates or assigns, said Royalty Trust Fund Certificates and said common stock to be sold prior to the sale of any other Trust Fund Certificates or common stock, except that which is set aside for the employees."

The trial court has found: That after the execution of the agreement "the plaintiffs proceeded with the construction of a building as provided in said written agreement and to completion thereof substantially as in said agreement provided. That said building was completed on the 26th day of January, 1925, and that on said date said William J. King executed and deposited with the plaintiffs a notice of completion thereof and on said last-named date executed his said promissory note for $5,700.00 and delivered same to plaintiffs and plaintiffs received and accepted same. That plaintiffs understood that such note was not to be executed until the time of the completion of the building. That said note was dated the 26th day of January, 1925, and was due and payable sixty days after the date thereof. That said William J. King did not at that time or at any time deliver to the plaintiffs or to R. Bruce Findlay the securities or any of them as enumerated and described in said written agreement as heretofore set forth."

And also we have before us a finding to the effect that appellants after holding the note for more than 30 days surrendered it to the respondent King and informed him they would look to the Mechanic's Lien Law for the payment of the sum of $5,700, and did accordingly file their claim of lien therefor on April 1st. We quote another important finding as follows: "That the plaintiffs herein waived any and all right on their part to claim a mechanic's lien upon said premises and agreed to accept and did accept said promissory note of said defendant, William J. King, in payment, settlement and satisfaction of all balance to be paid them for the construction of said building." While the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain this finding of the court is not under attack by the appellants, they contenting themselves with the argument that the giving of a note does not extinguish the indebtedness and consequently does not constitute a waiver of the lien right, we must give the substance of other findings in order that we have a just understanding of the circumstances surrounding the making of the contract and the execution and acceptance of the note. They are in effect as follows: That prior to the commencement of work or the furnishing of any materials the respondent King had made arrangements to borrow from the respondents American Saving Bank of Pomona $5,500 and R. Bruce Findlay, as trustee, the sum of $5,000, and to give to them in the order named first and second trust deeds to secure the repayment of the sums so loaned; that $700 of the amounts borrowed was to be used in the purchase of the real property and the remainder in making payments to the contractors; that the three respondents making these arrangements informed the plaintiffs that the American Savings Bank and R. Bruce Findlay expected to receive first and second liens on the premises, and that no work was to be performed until the trust deeds had been recorded; that certain tools were delivered to the job on November 7th and work actually commenced on November 10th, the day on which the trust deeds were in fact executed and recorded; that recordation was after the excavation of some portion of the trench for the foundation of the building.

[1] As already suggested, the appellants contend that they did not waive their lien rights by taking a note and argue that the acceptance of a note does not, in the absence of an express agreement, operate to discharge or extinguish the debt. There can be no doubt upon the statement of the general rule of law contained in counsel's argument, but it does not necessarily follow that the trial court was in error in finding an express agreement to discharge the debt and thus waive the lien. Without reviewing the testimony let us observe that the contract says: "4. In payment of five thousand seven hundred 00/100 dollars ($700.00/100) to be paid on the following terms and conditions: One promissory note of $5,700.00/100," etc.

Let us also have in mind the circumstances, to wit: That the respondents, the American Savings Bank and R. Bruce Findlay, as trustee, were advancing on notes to be secured by trust deed liens the money necessary to complete payments for the realty and build the structure; that the respondents had informed plaintiffs that the trust deed liens were to be placed upon the premises and that no work was to be done until they had been recorded. It seems apparent from these findings of the court that it was justified in deducing from the circumstances under which the agreement was executed that the parties had an express understanding that the note was to be accepted in payment; and in fact that the written agreement was to be so construed.

[2-5] There is the further finding that the plaintiffs received and accepted the note. This, therefore, is tantamount to a finding by the court that the obligation which it is sought to foreclose was paid. While it is true that the court finds that the securities were not delivered either at the time the note was delivered or thereafter, it is to be noted that there is no finding that respondent King refused to deliver. Applying the well-known rule that the findings must be liberally construed so as to support the judgment (Haight v. Haight, 151 Cal. 90, 90 P. 197), we are forced to conclude that the court intended to find that the note was received in payment, regardless of the delivery of the securities. And since we are not pointed to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, if in fact it is insufficient, the judgment must stand.

Judgment affirmed.

We concur: CRAIG, Acting P. J.; BURNELL, Justice pro tem.

1. Trial ☞139(1), 142—Inferences to be drawn and weight to be given testimony were questions for jury.

Inferences to be drawn therefrom, as well as weight to be given testimony of witness, were questions for jury.

2. Landlord and tenant ☞184(2)—In action to recover deposit, evidence supported findings that neither lease nor possession of premises was delivered to plaintiff tenant, and that lease never became effective.

In action by tenant to recover deposit made under lease, evidence held sufficient to support findings that neither lease nor possession of premises was delivered to plaintiff, and that, due to defendant's refusal to proceed with transaction, lease never became effective.

3. Landlord and tenant ☞184(2)—Instruction lease was delivered when signed by both lessor and lessee with intent to give it immediate effect, and that it is delivery which gives effect to lease, held not misleading.

In action by tenant to recover deposit made under lease, instruction that lease was delivered when it was signed by both lessor and lessee with intent to give it immediate effect and to place it beyond power of lessor to control or revoke, and that it is delivery which gives effect to lease, and without such delivery lease is invalid and not effective for any purpose, even though it be signed, held not misleading as instructing that manual delivery was essential.

4. Trial ☞256(1)—Defendant, if believing instruction ambiguous, should have asked for more specific instruction.

If defendant believed instruction complained of on appeal to be ambiguous, he should have asked for more specific instruction.

5. Appeal and error ☞1056(1)—In action to recover deposit, excluding evidence that tenant obtained no other location, offered on issue whether tenant abandoned lease, held not reversible error (Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 15).

In action by tenant to recover deposit made under lease, in which landlord claimed that tenant abandoned lease and premises, exclusion of evidence that tenant did not subsequently obtain any other location held not reversible error, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 15, makes evidence tending to prove an issue admissible even though it might not justify verdict.

Question of granting new trial for newly discovered evidence, where much of evidence was cumulative, was one addressed to sound discretion of trial court.

7. New trial ☞108(3)—Refusing new trial in action for deposit made under lease for newly discovered evidence was not abuse of discretion, where different result was not probable.

Refusal to grant new trial for newly discovered evidence tending to prove that plaintiff corporation, suing to recover deposit made under lease which never became effective, had entered into lease of premises, but was unable to finance its business, much of which was cumulative, held not abuse of discretion, where probative weight of new evidence was insufficient to render different result probable.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action for money had and received by the Aladdin Company of America against J. G.

Gregory. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. Seidenberg, George M. Naus, and Joseph M. Trusty, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Keyes & Erskine, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. An action to recover the sum of $1,625 alleged to have been received by the defendant for the use and benefit of the plaintiff. The plaintiff claimed that the above amount was deposited with the defendant as security for the payment of the rent of certain real property in San Francisco; that a written lease thereof, containing the terms agreed upon by the parties and pursuant to which the deposit was made, was signed by them, but that the defendant refused possession unless the plaintiff would agree to the execution of another lease in a different form; that the latter declined to do so, and demanded the return of the deposit. The defendant maintained that the original lease was executed by both parties, and that the plaintiff, without cause, abandoned the lease and the leased premises. A jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and, from the judgment entered thereon, the defendant, whose motion for a new trial was denied, has appealed. As grounds therefor it is contended that the verdict is unsupported, and that the court erred in excluding certain evidence offered by the defendant, and in its instructions to the jury.

The evidence shows that George F. Shade, of the firm of Allen & Co., who appear to have been real estate agents acting for the plaintiff, entered into negotiations with Frank J. Golden, the agent of the defendant, for a lease of the premises. These negotiations resulted in a lease being drawn by Shade which was signed by both parties. The term of the lease was five years, commencing on December 1, 1925, at a monthly rental of $325, payable in advance, and, as security for performance by the plaintiff, the latter agreed to deposit with the defendant the sum of $1,625. According to Shade, the instrument was not delivered, but was held by Golden pending the payment of the deposit. Golden was absent from San Francisco for about two weeks, and upon his return a check for the amount of the deposit was tendered to him by an agent for the plaintiff. Golden then stated that he was not satisfied with the lease which had been signed, and proposed another in the form prepared by him, further stating that the check which was left with him would be held until the completion of the transaction. The new lease was submitted to the plaintiff corporation, which refused to execute the same, and the check was thereafter cashed by Golden and the amount paid to the defendant. Golden testified that, when the plaintiff refused to accept the new lease prepared by him, he stated that they would operate under the lease already signed. It was testified by Shade, however, that the plaintiff was willing to proceed under the first lease, and so notified Golden, who refused to give possession of the property unless the new lease should be executed by the plaintiff. Other witnesses testified that, for the purpose of making measurements for floor plans therein, the key to the premises was obtained by plaintiff's employees at the time the deposit was made, and that subsequently the key was returned to Golden.

[1,2] As to whether the lease was delivered to the plaintiff, the evidence is conflicting. The agent Golden testified, in substance, that previous to his absence from San Francisco he instructed his brother, A. E. Golden, to deliver the same to the plaintiff; that he was advised that this had been done, but the witness was unable to recollect whether the instrument was still in his office upon his return. He further testified, however, that he saw a signed original thereof in the office of the president of the plaintiff subsequent to the date when the check was deposited. According to A. E. Golden, the lease was given to him, with instructions to leave it with the stenographer of Frank J. Golden, but that it was not to be delivered or possession of the premises given until the security had been deposited, and that he notified plaintiff's agents to that effect. The witness, however, failed to testify that the instrument or the possession of the premises was delivered to the plaintiff. The agent of the plaintiff referred to by Shade testified that he was sent by the plaintiff to deliver the check to Golden and procure the lease which the parties had signed, and that he was accompanied by Shade; that Golden stated that the lease was not ready, saying, with respect to the check, "so long as you have got the check here, if you will leave the check with me, I will not cash this check until these leases are signed and the business is concluded." Other witnesses for the plaintiff testified that the key to the premises was procured by them on several occasions for the purpose of inspecting and drawing floor plans, but that each time it was returned to Golden.

While the above would support different conclusions, the inferences to be drawn therefrom, as well as the weight to be given the testimony of the witnesses, were questions for the jury, and the evidence was sufficient to support findings that neither the lease nor the possession of the premises was delivered to the plaintiff, as well as the conclusion that, due to defendant's refusal to proceed with the transaction, the lease never became effective.

[3,4] The following instruction was given at plaintiff's request: "You are instructed that a lease takes effect upon its delivery to the party in whose favor it is made, or to his agent. The term delivery is frequently used in a popular sense as designating the mere transfer of physical custody or possession, but it also has a legal sense, and it is in this latter sense that it is used in these instructions. In the law a lease is delivered when it is signed by both the lessor and lessee with the intent to give it immediate effect and to place it beyond the power of the lessor to control or revoke. It is the delivery which gives effect to the lease, and without delivery the lease is invalid, and not effective for any purpose even though it be signed."

The defendant claims that by this instruction the jury was told in effect that, in order to make the lease effective, its manual delivery was essential. We do not so understand the instruction. The court was careful to distinguish between a mere physical transfer as constituting a delivery, and the legal significance of the term by stating that "in the law a lease is delivered when it is signed by both the lessor and the lessee with the intent to give it immediate effect and to place it beyond the power of the lessor to control or revoke." The last paragraph in the instruction clearly refers to the paragraph quoted, and the instruction, when read and considered as a whole, cannot reasonably be said to have been misleading. Moreover, if the defendant believed the instruction to be ambiguous, he should have asked for a more specific instruction as to the acts necessary to give effect to the lease.

[5] The evidence shows that the plaintiff intended to conduct its business on the premises described in the lease, and, in support of the claim that the plaintiff abandoned the lease and premises the defendant sought to show by the cross-examination of witnesses called by the plaintiff that no other location was subsequently obtained, and, upon objection to the questions being sustained, offered to prove the fact. The rulings are assigned as error. While evidence tending to prove an issue is admissible although alone it might not justify a verdict (Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 15; Moody v. Peirano, 4 Cal. App. 411, 88 P. 380), and the facts sought to be shown by defendant had some relevancy to the question whether there was an abandonment by the plaintiff, nevertheless the probative value of the evidence offered was insufficient to justify a reversal of the judgment on the sole ground of its erroneous exclusion.

[6, 7] Appellant further insists that the court erred by denying her motion for a new trial. The motion was based on newly discovered evidence, and was supported by affidavits in which the affiants relate conversations with the president of plaintiff corporation tending to prove that the corporation had entered into a lease of the premises, but was unable to finance its business in San Francisco. Much of this evidence was cumulative, and counter affidavits were filed by plaintiff, supporting conclusions contrary to those sought to be established by appellant. We are of the opinion that the probative weight of the new evidence was insufficient to render a different result probable. The question, from its nature, was one addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court (People v. Selby S. & L. Co., 163 Cal. 84, 124 P. 692, 1135, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 1267, and Estate of Loucks, 160 Cal. 551, 117 P. 673, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 868, and we cannot say that the denial of the motion was an abuse of discretion.

After an examination of the entire record, including the evidence, we are satisfied that the verdict is fully sustained, and that no error appears which would reasonably support the conclusion that the result was a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

SLATER v. KESEY (KEEBLE, Intervener).
(Civ. 3869.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 2, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 31, 1929.

1. Statutes $\S\S$ 225—Statutes respecting organization, maintenance, severance, and termination of school districts must be construed together and harmonized if possible (Pol. Code, $\S\S$ 1577, 1578, 1591a, 1591b).

Pol. Code, $\S\S$ 1577, 1578, 1591a, 1591b, respecting organization, maintenance, severance, and termination of school districts, must be construed together and harmonized if it is possible to do so.

2. Schools and school districts $\S$ 37(3)—Elementary school district subject to union district and not suspended from union could not escape obligations by creating new elementary district without petitioning withdrawal from union as whole (Pol. Code, $\S\S$ 1577, 1578, 1591a, 1591b).

Elementary school district, which became subject to union district by formally uniting therewith, could not escape obligations incurred thereby by creating new elementary school district without petitioning withdrawal from union school district in manner provided by Pol. Code, § 1591a, where it was not suspended under provision of section 1591b, though it had complied with provisions of sections 1577 and 1578 in forming new district, since method of withdrawing as provided by section 1591a is exclusive.

3. Schools and school districts $\S$ 37(1)—That statute provides no means for withdrawal of part of district from union school district is not fatal (Pol. Code, § 1591a).

Though Pol. Code, § 1591a, provides no specific means by which part of school district may withdraw from union district, omission is not fatal, since express declaration of terms upon which district may sever association with union district by petition will be deemed to be exclusive and to preclude any other method of withdrawal.

4. Schools and school districts ⇨34—It cannot be assumed portion of district may withdraw from union school district because statute does not provide for withdrawal of portion (Pol. Code, § 1591a).

It may not be assumed that because Legislature failed to specifically provide in Pol. Code, § 1591a, means of withdrawal of portion of school district from union district, therefore an absolute right exists to withdraw in segregated manner, and Legislature must be deemed to have intended withdrawal only as an entire union or not at all.

5. Mandamus ⇨79—Mandamus lies to require assessor to include in union school district territory withdrawn by mere forming of new elementary district without petitioning withdrawal (Pol. Code, §§ 1577, 1578, 1591a).

Issuance of writ of mandate to require assessor of county to include in union school district, for purpose of raising elementary school taxes, portion sought to be withdrawn by creation of new elementary school district without compliance with Pol. Code, § 1591a, requiring petition for withdrawal, though new elementary district might be organized under sections 1577 and 1578, held not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Mandamus proceedings by Joseph Slater, as a taxpayer in the Upper Lake Union School District, against J. A. Kesey, as assessor of the County of Lake, State of California, to require respondent to include in the district territory that was sought to be withdrawn, in which Lulu M. Keeble intervened. A writ of mandate was issued, and the intervener appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; PRESTON, J., voting for a hearing.

W. D. L. Held, of Ukiah, for appellant.

M. H. Iverson and Burt W. Busch, both of Ukiah, for respondent petitioner.

H. G. Crawford, of Lakeport, for respondent assessor.

ROLFE L. THOMPSON, J. This is an appeal from a writ of mandate which was issued to require the assessor of Lake county to include in the Upper Lake union school district, for the purpose of raising elementary school taxes, the territory sought to have been withdrawn therefrom by the creation of a new elementary school district called the Lucerne school district, on the ground that the procedure of organizing this new district was illegal.

The essential facts were stipulated. The petitioner for the writ is a taxpayer in Upper Lake union school district. This union school district was duly organized by including therein Hammond school district together with other contiguous districts. Lucerne district had no prior separate existence. The territory of which it is comprised was merely an undivided part of Hammond school district when the union school district was organized. The intervener and other resident heads of families then sought to create a new elementary school district from a portion of the territory of Upper Lake union school district pursuant to the provisions of sections 1577 and 1578 of the Political Code. It is conceded that the provisions of these two sections were strictly complied with in the effort to form the new Lucerne district. These sections furnish a complete method of procedure for the formation of a new elementary school district, and do not specifically preclude the creation of such an elementary district from the territory included in a duly organized union school district. Section 1591a of the Political Code does, however, prescribe the only means by which an elementary district which is contained within the union district may withdraw therefrom. It is the exclusive method of seceding from the union district. This last-mentioned section provides, in part: "Any school district contained in a union or joint-union school district may, * * * withdraw from such union or joint-union district by action of the board * * * of supervisors * * * whenever a majority of the heads of families residing in the union or joint-union district, including two-thirds of the heads of families who reside in the district wishing to withdraw * * * shall present to such board * * * a petition for such withdrawal, accompanied by a written consent to such withdrawal signed by a majority of the members composing the board of trustees of such union or joint-union district * * *"

It is not contended by the appellant that these provisions of the foregoing section with respect to withdrawing from a district were complied with. The appellant's attorney conceded this when he said: "We admit we didn't do anything necessary to be done if we have to withdraw and they admit we did everything necessary to be done if we don't have to withdraw."

The question is therefore squarely presented: May territory which has been regularly included within a duly organized union school district be exempted from taxes and other union school district obligations by subsequently creating and maintaining within the limits of said union district a separate and distinct elementary district, without first obtaining consent and withdrawing from the union district of which it is a component part, and without any pretense of severance?

[1, 2] These several sections respecting the organization, maintenance, severance, and termination of school districts must be construed together and harmonized if possible. This leads to the conclusion that after an elementary school district becomes subject to a joint or union district by formally uniting therewith, except when it has been suspended under the provisions of section 1591b of the Political Code, it is imperative that such district or any portion of its territory seeking independence from the union district shall first withdraw therefrom in the manner prescribed by section 1591a of the same Code. Having voluntarily become a part of a duly organized union district, independence therefrom may be secured only by a formal severance. Participation in the benefits of a union district may not be repudiated without legal process and without consent of the representatives of the union district so abandoned.

It is argued that even if this be true with respect to an entire former elementary district, it does not apply to a portion only of such district; that there is no provision of law applicable to the withdrawal of a portion only of a district.

[3] It is true that section 1591a provides no specific means by which a part of a district may withdraw from a union district. The withdrawal of a portion of a district is not contemplated, unless the lesser portion thereof is included by inference in the procedure applicable to the entire district. This omission, however, is not fatal. An express declaration of terms upon which a district may sever its association with a union district will be deemed to be exclusive and to preclude any other method of withdrawal. In the case of Washburn v. Mann, 73 Cal. App. 302, 238 P. 721, 722, the court said: "This system is complete, and must be held to be exclusive."

[4] It may not be assumed that because the Legislature failed to specifically provide the means of withdrawal with relation to a portion of a district, therefore an absolute right exists to withdraw in this segregated fashion. The omission to legislate in this regard enforces the conclusion that the Legislature intended to permit a former district to withdraw from the union district only as an entire unit, or not at all.

This very question was determined with relation to the severance of territory from a high school district in the case of Multer v. Keppel, 76 Cal. App. 517, 245 P. 218, wherein it was said: "It seems, therefore, that there is no method provided for withdrawal of a portion of the high school district from the district itself and the formation of a new high school district. * * * There is no presumption that of necessity there must be some method provided for such withdrawal."

It is true that section 1587 of the Political Code provides for the automatic dissolution of the several elementary districts after they have united and merged in a union district, except for certain purposes which are specifically reserved.

In this regard that section provides: "The districts uniting to form the union or joint-union school district shall cease to exist, except for purposes specified in sections 1585 to 1591c inclusive. * * *"

One of these purposes for which the original districts are preserved intact, as provided by section 1591a, is the very proceeding which is here involved, namely, the withdrawal of a district from the union. It follows that the Hammond school district, of which the Lucerne territory was a part, was effectively dissolved at the organization of the union district, except for the purposes reserved by the statute. Certainly this automatic dissolution may not be overcome by reorganizing the former district in whole or in part. If the entire original district may not sever its relationship with the union district except by withdrawing in the manner provided by law, then a portion of that district can accomplish the same object only by conforming to the same procedure. Otherwise, a district could circumvent the law by withdrawing piecemeal from the union. At an election held pursuant to law, the Upper Lake union school district was duly organized, and by consent the territory comprising the proposed new Lucerne district became a part of that union district subject to its management and liable for its obligations. This relationship may be terminated only in the manner provided by section 1591a.

Even though it be conceded that a new elementary school district may be organized under sections 1577 and 1578 from the territory included in a union school district, which hypothesis this court is not deciding, yet after the completion of that organization its territory would still be a part of the union district, from which it would be required to disassociate in the manner provided by law. Regardless of whether a new elementary district may be formed from the territory of a union district, it must nevertheless withdraw from the union district and terminate its former association to escape the obligations incurred thereby. This was not done.

[5] The writ was therefore properly issued, and the judgment is affirmed.

Supreme Court of California. June 29, 1928.

Constitutional law §190—That unlawful exemption was stricken from statute by later enactment could not affect obligations under act with void exemption in it.

Fact that unlawful exemption was stricken from statute by a later enactment of Legislature held not to affect petitioner's obligation under act with void exemption in it.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson and George H. Cabaniss, Judges.

On petition for rehearing. Petition denied. For former opinion, see 268 P. 347, 352.

Charles W. Slack and Edgar T. Zook, both of San Francisco, for respondent Refining Co.

A. L. Weil, of San Francisco, and Salisbury & McNeil and Verne E. Robinson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent Petroleum Corporation.

PER CURIAM. On petition for rehearing herein it is urged that this court has erroneously "assumed that there were two types of contracts in existence—i. e., contracts having (a) a fixed sales price, and (b) a flexible sales price"—whereas it is insisted "it is apparent from the record either directly or by necessary inference that the so-called fixed price contracts do not exist." It is therefore contended that a conclusion cannot be drawn that the Legislature had in mind two types of contracts and by its action intended to provide only for a fixed price contract. Assuming that the record is susceptible to the construction placed upon it by counsel, namely, that only flexible sales contracts were in existence at the effective date of the act, the correctness of the conclusion that the contractors thereunder would be in no different situation, so far as the license tax was concerned, than those having no contracts outstanding, is further emphasized. The opportunity of those in each class to protect themselves against the burden of the license tax was the same. The operation of the law with the exemption in it would therefore confer upon those attempted to be exempted a special privilege or immunity not accorded to others similarly situated. The exemption, then, would effect an unlawful discrimination as between those in the same class, and would be void under section 21 of article 1 of the Constitution. See Bacon Service Corp. v. Huss, 199 Cal. 21, 248 P. 235. The fact that the unlawful exemption was stricken from the statute by later enactment of the Legislature could not affect the petitioner's obligations under the act with the void exemption in it.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

YOUNG et al. v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO. et al. (L. A. 9886.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 10, 1929.

1. Railroads ☞350(1)—Taking action against railroad for death of motorist at crossing from jury was error, unless it could be said as matter of law that no other conclusion than that railroad was entitled to judgment was possible.

In action against railroad for death of motorist at crossing, trial court erred in directing verdict, unless it could be said as matter of law that no other reasonable conclusion than that railroad was entitled to judgment was legally deducible from evidence, and that any other holding would be so lacking in evidentiary support that appellate court would be impelled to reverse it upon appeal, or trial court set it aside.

2. Railroads ☞350(7)—Testimony that motorman gave proper signal at railroad crossing held not conclusively to establish that required signals were given, but merely created question for jury.

In action against railroad for death of motorist at railroad crossing, positive testimony that motorman blew whistle in advance of reaching crossing held not to conclusively establish that crossing signals were given, but merely created conflict in testimony to be resolved by jury.

3. Railroads ☞316(4)—In absence of statute or ordinance, no rate of speed of train is negligence per se.

No rate of speed of train is negligence per se, in absence of statute or ordinance.

4. Railroads ☞316(2)—Railroad train must pass over dangerous crossing at less rate of speed proportionate to danger.

Character of crossing affects duty of railroad company towards travelers upon public highway, and its trains must pass over dangerous crossings at less rate of speed proportionate to danger.

5. Railroads ☞350(11)—Whether rate of speed of train at crossing is excessive is for jury.

Whether or not speed of train at railroad crossing is excessive is for jury, since whether rate is so dangerous or excessive as to constitute negligence must depend upon particular circumstances.

6. Railroads ☞350(11)—Negligence, as regards speed of railroad car approaching crossing, held for jury, where deceased motorist's view was obstructed.

In action against railroad for death of motorist at railroad crossing, where it appeared that garage, house, and warehouse obstructed motorist's view of approaching train until motorist was within 19 feet, 6 inches of track, and that box car on side track obstructed view so that motorist would not be able to see train until front wheels of motor truck and radiator were on tracks, and there was testimony that motorman had not given proper signals before reaching crossing, and that railroad car was traveling at excessive speed, negligence held for jury.

7. Railroads ☞335(1)—Contributory negligence held to bar recovery, where deceased motorist did not look in direction of crossing for approaching trains until within few feet of crossing.

In action against railroad for death of motorist caused by collision with railroad car at crossing, evidence that motorist was looking into the body of his truck and did not look in direction of crossing or approaching car until he was within few feet of crossing held to bar recovery, since person approaching crossing without stopping, looking, or listening for approaching trains are guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, which bars recovery by themselves or in event of death by their personal representatives.

8. Railroads ☞346(6)—Presumption that person takes ordinary care of himself held inapplicable in presence of evidence that motorist did not look in direction of crossing until he was within few feet thereof (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 4).

In action against railroad for death of motorist caused by collision with railroad car at crossing, presumption set forth in Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 4, that person takes ordinary care of his own concerns held not applicable in presence of positive and unimpeached testimony that motorist was looking into body of his truck and did not look in direction of crossing until he was within few feet thereof.

PER CURIAM. Plaintiffs, as the heirs of Peter W. Young, brought this action to recover damages for his death, resulting from a collision at a crossing between an automobile truck, driven by him, and an electric car of the defendant Pacific Electric Railway Company, operated by the defendant motorman, Howard T. Bennett. Negligence of the defendants was charged in three particulars: In failing to give a proper crossing signal; operating the car at an excessive speed; and in failing to operate the car with due care in view of the dangerous and unguarded condition of the crossing. The case was tried with a jury. When all the evidence was in, defendants moved for a directed verdict in their favor on the following grounds: (1) That the evidence showed conclusively that there was no negligence on the part of the railway company which contributed, directly or proximately, to the happening of the accident; (2) that the evidence conclusively showed that the deceased was himself guilty of contributory negligence; and (3) that if, under the evidence, the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, the court would have to set it aside because of the insufficiency of the evidence to support it. The court granted the motion without indicating upon what grounds it did so. Plaintiffs' motion for a new trial was denied, and they have appealed from the judgment entered on the directed verdict.

[1] The trial court erred in taking the case from the jury unless it can be said, as a matter of law, that no other reasonable conclusion than that defendants were entitled to judgment was legally deducible from the evidence, and that any other holding would be so lacking in evidentiary support that an appellate court would be impelled to reverse it upon appeal, or a trial court to set it aside. Umsted v. Scofield Eng. Const. Co., 203 Cal. 224, 228, 263 P. 799; Duggan v. Forderer, 79 Cal. App. 339, 343, 249 P. 533. It becomes necessary, therefore, to determine whether the evidence in the case tended to establish the negligence charged by the plaintiffs to the defendants, or whether the testimony, as a whole, so conclusively supported one or more of the grounds of defendants' motion for a directed verdict that the court would have been under compulsion to set aside a contrary finding of the jury.

The collision which occasioned Young's death occurred on December 22, 1925, in the city of Hawthorne, where Eucalyptus avenue intersects at right angles the main line track of the Pacific Electric Railway Company running east and west. Evidence as to the condition of the crossing showed that a warehouse was located on the northwest corner. North of the warehouse, on Eucalyptus avenue, was a garage, with a house adjoining on the north. These buildings obstructed the view of persons driving in a southerly direction along Eucalyptus avenue to such an extent that they had no opportunity to observe an east-bound electric car until they were almost on, or dangerously close, to the tracks. The obstructions likewise prevented the trainmen on cars approaching the crossing from the west from seeing automobiles southbound towards the tracks. In addition to the buildings, box cars stood on the siding west of Eucalyptus avenue and north of the main track practically all the time. A power line pole west of the avenue and between the two tracks also obstructed the view from a certain angle. There was the usual standard railroad crossing sign, but no automatic signaling device nor gates, nor was a flagman stationed at the intersection to warn travelers of approaching cars. One of plaintiffs' witnesses testified that on several occasions he had discussed with the agent of the Pacific Electric Railway Company at El Segundo the dangerous nature of the crossing, and had suggested that a wigwag be installed. While the respondents assert that an examination of their exhibits will show the locality to be "a sparsely settled rural community with the standard cross-arm plainly visible," nevertheless the crossing is a well-traveled one within the city limits of Hawthorne, a witness testifying that he "would estimate, including [his] customers and others driving touring cars, inclusive of [his] own trucks, about two hundred people" daily crossed the tracks at Eucalyptus avenue.

[2] Plaintiffs' first assignment of negligence on the part of the defendants concerns the alleged failure of the motorman to blow the whistle sufficiently in advance of reaching the crossing to give proper warning. There was a substantial conflict in the testimony as to the time of giving the signals, and as to their extent. The fact that there was positive testimony on the subject does not conclusively establish that the required crossing signals were given. It creates merely a conflict of testimony to be resolved by the jury. Thompson v. Los Angeles, etc., R. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 752, 134 P. 709; Vaca v. Southern Pac. Co., 91 Cal. App. 470, 475, 267 P. 346; see, also, Marchetti v. Southern Pac. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 269 P. 529, 531.

[3-5] With reference to the alleged excessive speed of the car, respondents contend that, in the absence of a regulatory statute or ordinance, a railway company may ordinarily run its trains at such speed as it sees fit, and that a charge of negligence cannot be predicated on that rate of speed unless there are attendant circumstances which make such speed negligence. They also cite authorities as to the right of a railroad company to operate its trains at a high rate of speed in country districts. While it is true that no rate of speed is negligence per se in the absence of a statute or ordinance, it does not follow that a railroad company will be permitted to run its trains under all conditions at any rate of speed it may choose. It must regulate its speed with proper regard for the safety of human life and property, especially when running through towns and cities. The character of a crossing, it has been well reasoned, affects the duty of the railroad company towards travelers upon the public highway, and its trains must pass over dangerous crossings at a less rate of speed proportionate to the danger. As previously stated, the scene of the collision was not the ordinary country grade crossing, but a well-traveled, paved avenue within the city limits. It was stipulated that the distance between Hawthorne and El Segundo, the termini of the portion of the electric line involved in this case, was 4.56 miles. Estimates as to the speed of the car varied from 12 to 20 miles an hour, and there was some evidence that the train was coasting. While the defendant motorman testified that his car was traveling about 15 miles an hour as he approached the intersection, he further stated that the running time between the two termini mentioned, with seven scheduled stops, was 11 minutes. A brief computation will demonstrate that the car would have to average a trifle less than 25 miles an hour in order to keep within the allotted running time, without making any allowance for the slackening of the car before stopping, and without any deduction for the time actually lost in taking on passengers. Eucalyptus avenue was not one of the scheduled stops, and it would be only reasonable for the jury to infer that, in order to keep within the scheduled running time, the train would travel faster where there were no regular stations than it would when nearing one where it was required to stop. "A rate of speed that may be allowable in a thinly settled part of the country, where but few persons will have occasion to cross the tracks, may be so dangerous as to constitute negligence on the part of the railroad company when driving a train through a city or village, where many persons are likely to cross the track." 2 Thompson on Negligence, § 1875. As the standard of duty shifts with the circumstances developed in the case, the question whether or not a rate of speed is excessive is one of fact for the jury. As this court said in Bilton v. Southern Pac. Co., 148 Cal. 443, 447, 83 P. 440, 442: " * * * There can be no doubt that the question as to whether or not a rate of speed at a crossing is so dangerous or excessive as to constitute negligence must depend upon the particular circumstances there existing, and, if the circumstances are such that reasonable and impartial men may well differ as to whether the speed maintained at the particular place showed a want of reasonable care, the question as to whether the railroad company was guilty of negligence in maintaining such speed is one for the jury"—citing authorities. See, also, Marchetti v. Southern Pac. Co., supra, at pages 531, 532 of 269 P.; Tousley v. Pacific Elec. Ry. Co., 166 Cal. 457, 460, 137 P. 31.

[6] The third charge of negligence against the defendants relates to the failure to operate the car with due care in view of the dangerous condition of the crossing. A witness testified that there was practically a solid wall of obstruction commencing with the house north of the garage and continuing up to within 19 feet, 6 or 8 inches of the track, and that there was no opportunity at all, until one passed the latter point, to see a car coming from the west. According to the testimony of the motorman, "a box-car was located on the siding just north of the track that [he] was operating on, approximately 40 feet west of Eucalyptus avenue." He first saw the truck as he came out from behind the box car, and about 35 feet from the crossing. There was also testimony showing that, if a box car was stopped in a position to load on the platform on the south side of the Sanderson warehouse, an automobile would have to be beyond the siding tracks to see a train coming from the west. A witness was asked whether, under those conditions, in an automobile in which the driver's point of vision was 7 feet back of the front of his car (as was the case with the auto truck involved in this collision), the driver could see a train approaching from the west—west of the telephone pole—without putting himself "in a position of peril."

"The Court: What do you mean by 'a position of peril'?"

"Counsel for Plaintiffs: By 'a position of peril' I mean a position where you would be so far on the track that if a car came down there it would strike the automobile in which you were.

"The Witness: It would not strike me, but it would strike the automobile, for the reason that I would have to have at least my radiator and the center of my front wheels on the track."

In Bilton v. Southern Pac. Co., supra, this court said at page 447 of 148 Cal., 83 P. 442: "The obligation rested upon it [the railroad company] of taking such care to prevent injury by its trains to those passing over the crossing as would, under the existing circumstances, be reasonable, and if the view of its track was so obstructed that a person lawfully using the street could not, before passing from a place of safety to a place of danger, see an approaching train just beyond the obstruction, in time to escape it, if it moved at a high rate of speed, it was its duty to moderate the speed accordingly, or make the approach of the train reasonably apparent by other methods to the user of the street."

Marchetti v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, was an action for damages for death caused by a collision. The court granted defendants' motion for a nonsuit based on the contributory negligence of the deceased. There, as here, the evidence showed the crossing to be dangerous because of existing obstructions, and there was a conflict as to the sounding of proper warnings. On appeal the respondents contended that, even though it should be held there was error on the part of the trial court in granting their motion on the ground of contributory negligence, the order should be sustained, because there was no evidence of negligence on their part in the operation of their train at the time of the collision. In passing upon this contention, this court said: "It was held in Green v. Southern Pacific Co., 53 Cal. App. 194, 202, 199 P. 1059, 1062: That the law imposed 'upon a railroad company the duty to use reasonable care, corresponding to the circumstances constituting the probable danger, to avoid injury to persons lawfully traveling upon the public highway crossed by the company's tracks and trains. It then becomes a question for a jury to decide whether or not it was negligence for the company to run its cars across the highway without providing a flagman or some means of warning to travelers at the place of crossing. And, where the facts in evidence prove that usually or frequently there are obstructions which interfere with the opportunity to see moving trains while travelers on the highway are approaching a much-traveled crossing, it cannot be held that as a matter of law it is not negligence to run trains there without warning signals other than those usually given by engines and cars.'" We thus arrive at the conclusion that the plaintiff, upon the issue of the defendants' negligence, was entitled to have the case go to the jury.

[7, 8] We are thus brought to a consideration of the question as to whether, upon the practically undisputed evidence in the case, the deceased must be held to have been guilty of such contributory negligence, as a matter of law, proximately causing his death, as would have justified the trial court in granting the defendants' motion for a directed verdict in their favor upon that ground. The uncontradicted evidence in the case discloses that the deceased was a man of good health and in the prime of life, and that he was, and for several months prior to the casualty which resulted in his death had been, engaged in the business of selling and distributing bottled water, in the conduct of which he used the small truck which he was driving just before the collision, and that the territory which he served with his product lay upon both sides of the railroad, and included Eucalyptus avenue. It must be concluded, therefore, that he was familiar with the crossing where the collision occurred. The evidence as to the rate of speed at which the decedent customarily crossed the railroad track was conflicting, and there is also some conflict in the evidence as to the rate of speed at which the deceased was driving on Eucalyptus avenue immediately before the collision occurred. There is, however, no conflict in the statement of several eyewitnesses, whose testimony is unimpeached, as to the action and conduct of the deceased in approaching the crossing upon this final and tragic occasion, and from this evidence it appears conclusively that from the place where he was first observed by these witnesses, and which varied from 45 to 150 feet from the crossing, the deceased was driving his truck, holding its steering wheel with his left hand, and looking down toward the seat or into the body of his car, his right arm and hand being extended in that direction, but whether to lay hold of an emergency brake or to do some other act does not appear. These witnesses agree that, while the deceased was thus within their observation, he did not stop and did not look in the direction of the crossing or of the approaching train until he had reached a point well within the danger zone and within a few feet of the crossing. In the presence of this positive and unimpeached testimony it is clear that there was in this case no room for the application of the presumption set forth in subdivision 4 of section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure "that a person takes ordinary care of his own concerns." When the deceased had thus reached a point a few feet from the crossing, without stopping, without looking, and apparently without listening, for the sight or sound of an approaching train, a section foreman, who was observing his approach and who testified that the deceased "wasn't looking where he was going," called loudly to him and immediately called again; whereupon the deceased "looked up and he got abold of his wheel and steering his car turned his car the same way the Pacific Electric car was running." He was too late, however, to fully avoid a collision, and while his machine did not quite reach the rails, some portion of the overhang of the electric car struck the forward part of it, and by the force of the impact the deceased was thrown from his car and killed. The appellants herein urge that in view of the foregoing evidence the jury might have concluded that the deceased in thus approaching the crossing in question might have had his right hand upon the emergency brake of his car preparatory to stopping it before reaching the track, and that by the loud shouts of the section foreman he was so far distracted from such possible purpose as to conceive the idea that by suddenly turning his car to the left he might avoid a collision, and that but for such distraction he would have stopped his car in time to escape injury. This reasoning, however, does not rise above the dignity of mere conjecture and cannot be held to work an avoidance of the duty which the deceased owed to his own safety to stop and look and listen upon approaching a railroad crossing, which is always a sign of danger, and which in this instance was rendered even more so by the obstructions to clear vision which were along or at the time upon the railroad right of way. This court has had frequent and recent occasion to define the duty of persons approaching in vehicles railroad crossings similar to that existing in this case and similarly obscured, and in each of these cases this court has uniformly held that the conduct of persons thus approaching such crossings without stopping, looking or listening for approaching trains amounted to contributory negligence, as a matter of law, which would prevent the recovery by themselves, or, in the event of their death, by their personal representatives, in the event of a consequent casualty. Griffin v. San Pedro, etc., R. R. Co., 170 Cal. 772, 151 P. 282, L. R. A. 1916A, 842; Murray v. Southern Pac. Co., 177 Cal. 1, 169 P. 675; Billig v. Southern Pac. Co., 192 Cal. 357, 219 P. 992; *Parker v. We are constrained, therefore, to hold, after a full consideration of the facts of this case and of the law applicable thereto, that the action of the trial court in granting the defendants' motion for a directed verdict and in instructing the jury to return such verdict in the defendants' favor must be upheld. The judgment rendered upon such verdict is accordingly affirmed.

Complaint, alleging plaintiff had rented an apartment house to defendant and that defendant became indebted to plaintiff for rent of apartment house and furnishings therein contained, held sufficient, under liberal rule of construction applied to pleadings, to support theory that action embraced total sum due to plaintiff, upon rental agreement and conditional sales contract.

WASTE, C. J. Plaintiff brought an action alleging that it had rented to the defendant an apartment house in the city of Los Angeles, including the furniture and furnishings therein, and that during a specified period the defendant "became indebted to the plaintiff for the rent of said apartment house and the furnishings therein contained." The agreement upon which the action is based granted the defendant the right to lease the apartments for a term of years and to purchase the furniture, furnishings, and equipment in the apartments upon a conditional sales contract; both propositions being embraced in a single instrument.

The defendant took possession of the premises and the furnishings and operated the establishment for a period of more than 26 months, finally voluntarily relinquishing possession and entering into an agreement with the landlord by which the parties adjusted their rights as to their future relations under the terms of the contract, but specifically providing that any indebtedness under the contract should be determined as of the date of relinquishing possession. The plaintiff landlord thereupon brought this action to recover the sum of $15,750, the amount alleged to be due upon the original contract. The trial court took the view that the action embraced the total sum due to the plaintiff, both upon the rental agreement and the conditional sales arrangement, and fixed the total balance due upon the entire contract at the sum of $14,955, for which judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff.

It was, and is, the contention of the defendant that the complaint should be construed strictly as one for rent, and that no part of the unpaid purchase price of the furniture should be included in the judgment. While it may be said that the allegation of the complaint might have been more specific, it was sufficient, under the liberal rule of construction now applied to pleadings in this jurisdiction, to support the theory adopted by the trial court that the action embraced the total sum due to the plaintiff, both upon the rental agreement and the conditional sales portion of the contract. We think the action of the court was proper, for any other view would be too restricted a view to take of the case. The trial court apparently took evidence upon the entire transaction between the parties, and estimated the total amount due upon the rental agreement and also upon the conditional sales contract as of the date of the termination of the relations between the parties, and deducted therefrom the total payments which the defendant had made. By so doing it found the total balance due from the defendant to the plaintiff, for which it gave judgment. We are of the view that the action properly contemplated a recovery of the whole sum due from the defendant to the plaintiff upon both parts of the single contract between them, and that the recovery is warranted by the evidence and the findings.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; T. A. Norton, Judge.

Action by R. W. Nuttall against D. C. Walton and wife. Judgment for plaintiff and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Willis I. Morrison, of Los Angeles, and M. A. Fitzgerald, of San Luis Obispo, for appellants.

Albert Nelson, of San Luis Obispo, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. This appeal is by the defendants from a judgment entered against them for approximately $5,000 in an action brought by the plaintiff to recover for personal injuries. The defendants are husband and wife. The wife was driving an automobile, the community property of herself and husband, when she struck the plaintiff, causing his injuries. The accident occurred at Oceano Cal., on Front street, which runs in a general northerly and southerly direction. At the place of accident the street is approximately 52 feet wide and straight and unobstructed for several city blocks each way. There is a pavement in the center of the street, approximately 15 feet wide, and the accident occurred to the west of the center line of the street and on the cement portion thereof. At the time two automobiles were parked on opposite sides of the street, both headed in a southerly direction, the one on the westerly side of the highway parallel to the highway, with its left front wheel upon the cement portion thereof; the other, a Ford automobile, belonging to Mrs. Ethel Bowman, one of the witnesses in the case, was on the easterly side of the highway, with its right wheels probably a foot or so off the cement portion thereof. The plaintiff testified that he had been walking in a southerly direction on the easterly side of the highway and had crossed over the highway in a diagonal direction to the automobile on the westerly side, occupied by Mr. M. I. Benchinol; that when he reached this car the curtains were up on the left-hand side, and he therefore wanted to get around on the other side; that he walked along the highway beside the running-board on the left side to get around the front of the car, and was struck when he was about opposite the hood over the engine.

Plaintiff's theory of the case was that the defendant driver was negligent in not turning to the left to avoid plaintiff or in not stopping her automobile before injuring him, as he was in plain view as she came along the highway.

Upon appeal, the main contention of appellants, with relation to the facts of the case, are: (1) That there is no evidence of negligence on the part of the driver of the automobile; (2) that there is no evidence to charge the husband with the negligence of the wife, even though such negligence be conceded to exist.

[1] In answer to the first contention, the above-mentioned testimony of plaintiff, corroborated in part by other witnesses, is sufficient to justify the verdict of the jury upon the question of negligence. The plaintiff testified that he crossed the street to the car in which Benchinol was sitting and "I found the curtains up on this side and I tried to communicate with Benchinol and I couldn't do it and then I decided it was no use trying, I will go over to the other side and I called out, whether Benchinol heard me or not, I said: 'I am going on the other side.' I saw it was open on the other side, on the right side of the car, and then I was in the middle of the car and I saw the other car coming on me; I couldn't get back to meet it, I sprang forward. Just as I got to the left fore wheel of the Porter car (in which Benchinol was sitting) I was struck on the right hip and forced forward five or six feet and then fell backwards on my left hip and broke the leg." He testified that he saw the defendants' car coming down toward him quickly when it was 50 or 60 feet away; that it was "coming fast towards me so I couldn't go—it was around the stern of this car—I jumped thinking I would get out in front but she struck me before I got out." The width of the highway between the automobile in which Benchinol was sitting and the sidewalk in front of the butcher shop was over 25 feet and the automobile on the west side of the street occupied but 2 or 3 feet of this space, leaving ample room for the defendant driver to have turned to the left and avoided striking plaintiff. This may have been the basis of the jury's verdict, or it might have concluded that, in the exercise of reasonable care, the driver should have stopped her automobile when she saw plaintiff's perilous position, as she must have seen it if she had been looking ahead. The evidence shows that she blew her horn twice, but that plaintiff was very deaf, being a man about 90 years of age.

The foregoing discussion of the evidence indicates sufficient basis for the finding of the jury that the driver was guilty of negligence proximately causing the injury to plaintiff.

[2] Upon the second question of fact involved, which relates to the appeal of the husband, the record contains the testimony of both husband and wife that she was accustomed to use the automobile involved here for household errands, such as making purchases for the family, calling for mail at the post office, taking her husband's mail to the post office, and delivering flowers and vegetables which she raised and sold to the store; that on this particular occasion she was going to the post office for the family mail. Aside from this testimony upon which the jury might return a verdict against the husband, there was the presumption arising from ownership which would have justified the verdict. Randolph v. Hunt, 41 Cal. App. 738, 183 P. 358; Grantham v. Ordway, 40 Cal. App. 758, 182 P. 73; Diercks v. Newsom, 49 Cal. App. 789, 194 P. 518.

[3] The other assignments of error are with reference to the refusal of the trial court to give certain instructions. Several of these instructions related to the burden of proof and to the necessity of the plaintiff proving his case by a preponderance of the evidence. The instructions regarding these matters should have been given, as they are correct abstract statements of law, but their import was before the jury in other instructions given, for the court defined "negligence" and "preponderance of evidence," and stated that, "in the event such negligence on the part of plaintiff be proven by a preponderance of the evidence * * * and you further find that said negligence contributed proximately to the injury, then you must bring in your verdict for the defendants. * * *" While the same idea should have been embodied in an instruction for the defendants, upon the record before us, we may not reverse the judgment because of this omission.

The judgment is affirmed.

STAPLES v. HAWTHORNE et al.
(L. A. 9917.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 10, 1929.

1. Specific performance $\S$ 86—Agreement to will property to certain person is valid and enforceable, on maker's death, against persons succeeding to his property contrary thereto.

Agreement to make a will in favor of certain person is valid and binding on person making it, and will be enforced on latter's death against persons succeeding to decedent's property contrary to terms of such agreement.

2. Frauds, statute of $\S$ 55—Validity of oral agreement to will estate to certain person is not affected by subsequent statutory amendments requiring that such agreements be in writing (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1624; Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1973, as amended).

Validity of oral agreement, made before 1905 and 1907 amendments of Civ. Code, $\S$ 1624, and Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1973, to will estate to child taken into maker's home, is not affected by requirement of such amendments that such agreements be in writing.

3. Evidence $\S$ 597—Evidence of facts and circumstances tending to controvert and impeach credibility of testimony, not expressly contradicted, justifies finding contrary thereto.

Evidence of facts and circumstances tending to controvert and impeach credibility of testimony not expressly contradicted by testimony of any witness, justifies finding by trial court contrary to such testimony.

4. Specific performance $\S$ 121(7)—Evidence of facts and circumstances tending to impeach credibility of uncontradicted testimony as to testatrix's agreement to will estate to certain person held sufficient to justify finding that no such agreement was made.

In action for specific performance of testatrix's alleged oral agreement with plaintiff's father to will her entire estate to plaintiff, and enforcement of trust in property willed to de-defendants, evidence of facts and circumstances tending to impeach credibility of testimony as to such agreement held sufficient to justify trial court's finding that no such agreement was made, though such testimony was not expressly contradicted.

5. Appeal and error ⇨930(1)—Supreme Court must assume, in support of judgment for defendants, that trial court accepted testimony contradicting plaintiff's testimony.

Supreme Court must assume, in support of judgment for defendants in action for specific performance of testatrix's alleged oral agreement to will her entire estate to plaintiff, that trial court accepted testimony of estate's attorney that plaintiff made no statement to him regarding her claim to property of estate by virtue of such agreement, and rejected plaintiff's testimony that she informed such attorney of agreement.

6. Specific performance ⇨121(6)—Trial court must base conclusion as to terms of agreement on evidence of parties' acts and surrounding circumstances, where one party has died.

Where one of parties to contract has died, and hence cannot contradict statements as to terms of agreement and performance thereunder, trial court must base conclusion on testimony as to parties' acts and circumstances surrounding them.

7. Depositions ⇨83(3)—Striking mere conclusions of law from deposition is not error.

Trial court's action in striking out portions of deposition, which are mere conclusions of law rather than statements of fact, is not subject to criticism.

8. Appeal and error ⇨1043(6)—Striking portions of deposition fully covered by portion admitted held not prejudicial to appellant.

Striking out portions of deposition held not prejudicial to appellant, where main part thereof was admitted in evidence and fully covered essential facts sought to be proved thereby; portions stricken being principally repetitions of what witness had before testified to in somewhat different language.

9. Pleading ⇨349—Plaintiff was entitled to judgment on pleadings against defendants, admitting allegations of complaint and stipulating that judgment might be entered as prayed for.

Where defendants, who had assigned their interests in testatrix's estate to plaintiff, filed answers admitting all allegations of complaint in action for specific performance of testatrix's alleged oral agreement to will entire estate to plaintiff, and stipulated that judgment might be entered as prayed for, plaintiff was entitled to judgment against such defendants on pleadings.

10. Stipulations ⇨17(2)—Certain defendants' stipulation that judgment might be entered as prayed for, and judgment against them, cannot affect plaintiff's right as to remaining defendants.

Neither stipulation of defendants who assigned their interests in testatrix's estate to plaintiff, that judgment for specific performance of testatrix's alleged oral agreement to will entire estate to plaintiff might be entered as prayed for in complaint, nor judgment for plaintiff against them, can affect plaintiff's right as to remaining defendants.

Action by Ethel M. Staples against Laura Hawthorne and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed as to defendants Hawthorne and others, and so modified as to defendants Copps that plaintiff may have judgment against them.

Superseding opinion in 277 P. 1107.

Merriam, Rinehart & Merriam, of Pasadena, for appellant.

C. W. Byrer, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. Plaintiff brought this action for the specific performance of an oral agreement alleged to have been made by Clymena W. Hosmer with the father of the plaintiff, and to enforce a trust in and to all property owned by said Clymena W. Hosmer at the time of her death, and which by the terms of her last will she had bequeathed and devised to the defendants. In her complaint, plaintiff alleged that, during her infancy, her mother having died, her father gave her into the care and custody of N. H. Hosmer and his wife, the said Clymena W. Hosmer, upon the express, though verbal, agreement, entered into by the Hosmers with plaintiff's father, whereby N. H. Hosmer and Clymena W. Hosmer agreed to take plaintiff into their home and to care for her and treat her as their own child, and that upon their death they would will to her their entire estate. She further alleged the death of N. H. Hosmer; that he left a last will by which he devised and bequeathed to his wife, Clymena W. Hosmer, all of his property; that the said Clymena W. Hosmer died, leaving a last will and testament by which she attempted to dispose of the property belonging to her, including that received by her from her husband, as follows: To the plaintiff $500, to Paul C. Staples, plaintiff's husband, $500; to the defendant Alfred S. Copps the sum of $500; to the defendant Arthur M. Copps the sum of $200; and the residue of said estate in equal shares to the defendants Laura E. Hawthorne, Lelia B. Morse, Angie Williamson, and Frank S. Morse.

The evidence upon behalf of plaintiff was to the effect that plaintiff was born in Sierra Madre, Cal.; that her mother was then in poor health, and that the plaintiff was cared for by the Hosmers in their home in Sierra Madre, both before and after the death of the mother of the plaintiff, which occurred a few months after plaintiff's birth. A short time after the death of plaintiff's mother, and in the year 1885, her father took her from the home of the Hosmers at Sierra Madre and back to the state of Maine, where he left her with her maternal grandmother, Margaret Twycross, in Cedar Grove, Me. About a year or so thereafter the Hosmers made a trip to Maine and visited the home of Mrs. Twycross, when and where they prevailed upon plaintiff's father and her said grandmother to permit them, the Hosmers, to take the plaintiff back with them to California. Immediately thereafter the Hosmers left for California, and from that time on until her marriage the plaintiff lived with the Hosmers in their home at Sierra Madre, who treated her in all respects as their own child.

The principal witnesses on behalf of the plaintiff were her two aunts, S. Lillie Twycross and Edith L. Twycross. These witnesses were sisters, and their evidence was given by means of depositions. They testified that they were sisters of plaintiff's mother, and that they resided with their mother, Margaret Twycross, who was also the grandmother of the plaintiff, at Cedar Grove, Me., at the time that plaintiff's father, James W. Bower, brought plaintiff to Maine and left her with her said grandmother; that plaintiff was then about two years of age and that she lived with her grandmother about one year; that in 1886 N. H. Hosmer and his wife, Clymena W. Hosmer, came to their home in Cedar Grove. We will now quote from the testimony of Edith L. Twycross, whose testimony is in all essential features the same as that of S. Lillie Twycross:

"I was present and heard the discussion and agreement which resulted in Mr. Bower and my mother consenting that Mr. and Mrs. Hosmer should take my niece, Ethel May Bower, to be a daughter to them. My sister, Harriet Twycross Bower, and her little daughter Ethel had lived in the Hosmer home in Sierra Madre, California, for some time before my sister's death; and Mr. and Mrs. Hosmer had become much attached to the child, having no children of their own, and after Ethel's father, Mr. Bower, had brought her here and left her with her grandmother they missed her in the home so much, and had such a longing for her to take the place of a daughter to them, that they came all the way from California to get the consent of her father and grandmother to their taking the child for their own. They told us these things, and how much of brightness and joy Ethel had already brought to them, and how happy it would make them to have her for their own and they promised that, if she was given to them, they would give her a good home and their hearts' deepest affections and a good education, and that they would leave all their property to her when they died. These matters were all talked over a number of times while Mr. and Mrs. Hosmer were visiting in our old home place on the hill, a year or more after Ethel was brought here. Those present were my mother, Mrs. Margaret O. Twycross, Ethel's father, James Bower, Mr. and Mrs. N. H. Hosmer, little Ethel May Bower, my sisters, Lydia, Alice and Lillie, and myself."

This witness testified, as did her sister, S. Lillie Twycross, that as a result of the visit of the Hosmers to the home of the plaintiff's grandmother and the conference held there between the Hosmers and plaintiff's relatives, the Hosmers returned to California with the plaintiff, where she lived in the Hosmers' home as their own daughter.

There was also evidence from other witnesses that the Hosmers had at different times made admissions to the effect that they had agreed to make their will in plaintiff's favor. There was no evidence expressly contradicting the evidence given by the aunts of the plaintiff, the Twycross sisters, nor that given by the other witnesses who testified as to said admissions; that is, the defendants produced no witness who testified that the Hosmers did not agree to make their will in plaintiff's favor as testified to by the Twycross sisters. Neither were either of these witnesses impeached in the manner provided by any section of the Code of Civil Procedure. The trial court, nevertheless rejected the testimony of the Twycross sisters as to the agreement of the Hosmers to make their will in plaintiff's favor, and, while it found the facts in all other respects as testified to by them, it found that it was not true that any agreement had been entered into whereby the Hosmers agreed "to bequeath or devise or to otherwise give or transfer or convey all or any part of their property to plaintiff." Judgment based upon these findings was rendered in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff has appealed therefrom.

The principal ground upon which the plaintiff bases her appeal is that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings, and particularly the finding of the trial court that no agreement had been made by the Hosmers that they would make a will in favor of the plaintiff, whereby they would bequeath and devise to the plaintiff their property.

[1, 2] It is well settled by the decisions of this court that any agreement to make a will in favor of a certain person is valid and binding upon the person making said agreement, and that upon the death of the latter said agreement will be enforced against those who have succeeded to the property of said decedent contrary to the terms of said agreement. Owens v. McNally, 113 Cal. 444, 45 P. 710, 33 L. R. A. 369; Rogers v. Schlotterback, 167 Cal. 35, 138 P. 728; Monsen v. Monsen, 174 Cal. 97, 162 P. 90; Steinberger v. Young, 175 Cal. 81, 165 P. 432; Wolfson v. Smyer, 178 Cal. 775, 175 P. 10. There are certain limitations upon this rule noted in these authorities, but it is not necessary to mention them here.

Prior to the amendment in 1905 and 1907 of our Codes (Civ. Code, § 1624, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1973), it was not required that such agreement should be in writing. The agreement involved in the present action was claimed to have been made by the Hosmers with plaintiff's father long prior to the amendments of the code just referred to, and therefore its validity is not affected by them. Monsen v. Monsen, supra. There is, therefore, nothing in the nature of the agreement relied upon by the plaintiff which would preclude or prevent its enforcement if the same had been established by satisfactory and legal evidence.

[3] It is the contention of the plaintiff that this has been done. Her position is that the evidence of her aunts, the Twycross sisters, corroborated by those witnesses who testified to admissions made by the Hosmers, stands unimpeached and uncontradicted, and therefore the trial court was in duty bound to accept it and to make its findings and render judgment in accordance with said evidence. Cases of this type have frequently been before this court. Blanc v. Connor, 167 Cal. 719, 141 P. 217, belongs to this class. In the opinion rendered therein and on page 722, of 167 Cal. (141 P. 218) this court said:

"It is asserted that this is a class of cases sometimes arising in fraud and abounding in perjury, and, although disclaiming any thought that the instant case is so tainted, counsel contend that the court was justified in scrutinizing the testimony very carefully and refusing to accept it as proof of the contract unless it presented a very strong showing that the agreement was made substantially as alleged. It is true that courts are very slow to overturn findings of fact made by a jury and a fortiori those made by a court acting without a jury, even when contrary statements which are uncontradicted appear in the testimony of witnesses. The rule was thus stated in Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 128, 113 P. 150, in which Mr. Justice Lorigan, delivering the opinion of this department, said: 'While it is the general rule that the uncontradicted testimony of a witness to a particular fact may not be disregarded, but should be accepted by the court as proof of the fact, this rule has its exceptions. The most positive testimony of a witness may be contradicted by inherent improbabilities as to its accuracy contained in the witness' own statement of the transaction; or there may be circumstances in evidence in connection with the matter, which satisfy the court of its falsity; the manner of the witness in testifying may impress the court with a doubt as to the accuracy of his statement and influence it to disregard his positive testimony as to a particular fact; and, as it is within the province of the trial court to determine what credit and weight shall be given to the testimony of any witness, this court cannot control its finding or conclusion denying * * * credence, unless it appears that there are no matters or circumstances which at all impair its accuracy.' In many jurisdictions such contracts as that here asserted are scrutinized with the greatest care, and they are only sustained upon the most convincing proof. It is unnecessary to review the many authorities upon this subject from other jurisdictions. In this state the rule is well established and has been ever since the decision of Owens v. McNally, 113 Cal. 444, 45 P. 712, 33 L. R. A. 369, which has been reaffirmed every time a similar case has come to this court on appeal."

The same rule is enunciated in the following decisions of this court: Cox v. Schneer, 172 Cal. 371, 156 P. 509; Travis Glass Co. v. Ibbelson, 186 Cal. 724, 200 P. 595; Wilson v. Wood, 69 Cal. App. 552, 231 P. 1010, 1012. In Wilson v. Wood, supra, this court in denying a petition for transfer and hearing herein used the following language which aptly states the rule applicable to the facts in the present action: "It is true that the testimony of appellant's father as to the terms of the contract entered into between him and the Woods was not expressly contradicted by the testimony of any witness. But there were various facts and circumstances in evidence which tended legitimately to controvert this testimony and other facts and circumstances which had a tendency to impeach its credibility. Under these circumstances the trial court was legally justified in finding that it was not true that the father of plaintiff surrendered her to the Woods and consented to her adoption by them upon any other understanding or agreement than that appearing in the written contract of adoption."

[4, 5] In the present action we think there is ample evidence of facts and circumstances which tended to impeach the credibility of the evidence relied upon by the plaintiff. Among these facts and circumstances were those brought out by the testimony of Vernon Willey. He testified that he met Mr. and Mrs. Hosmer at the time of their visit to the state of Maine in 1887, and that he accompanied them on their trip home to California during that year, and that the plaintiff did not come to California with them on that trip. Immediately on his arrival in California he went with his uncle and aunt to their home in Sierra Madre, and lived there continuously thereafter and worked as chore boy for a period of about 2½ years. He testified that when they arrived at the Hosmer home the plaintiff was not there, but that some three or four weeks after their arrival he saw plaintiff for the first time and that as near as he could recollect she was brought to the Hosmer home by her father, James Bower. The Misses Twycross testified that it was in 1886 when the Hosmers took the plaintiff from her grandmother's home and brought her to California, and the plaintiff in her original complaint alleged that it was in September, 1886, that the agreement was made between James Bower and the Hosmers and that the plaintiff was given by her father thereafter to the Hosmers. During the trial, however, the plaintiff amended her complaint, changing the year 1886 to 1887. It appears to be conceded by all parties hereto that the Hosmers made only one trip back to Maine during the years 1886 and 1887, and that said trip was made in 1887. Therefore, if plaintiff was brought back by them, it must have been in the year 1887, and not 1886.

We do not attach any undue importance to the discrepancy in the evidence of the Twycross sisters as to the year the Hosmers were at their mother's home. They may well have remembered the event and what transpired on that occasion, and still may not have remembered the exact year in which the event took place. Particularly would this be so when they were testifying some 37 years after the time of the occurrence which they were relating. But we do attach importance to the fact, testified to by Vernon Willey, that plaintiff was not brought by the Hosmers in 1887 when they returned from their trip East; that she was not in the Hosmer home in Sierra Madre when he arrived there with his uncle and aunt, and that he did not see her until three or four weeks thereafter, when, to the best of his recollection, she was brought to the Hosmer home by her father, James Bower. If this testimony is true, then it is in direct conflict with the whole theory of plaintiff's case. The Twycross sisters testified that plaintiff's father was to meet the Hosmers "somewhere en route to California and accompany them to California, and give Ethel to them to take the place of a daughter in their home." Plaintiff testified that, while she was only three years old at the time, she remembered the trip taken with Mr. and Mrs. Hosmer back to California, and her uncle, Samuel R. G. Twycross, testified that he was living at the Hosmer home in 1886 or 1887, when the Hosmers returned from their Eastern trip and that they brought the plaintiff back with them.

The testimony of Vernon Willey is corroborated by that of the witness, Rena Hawthorne. She testified that she was 14 years of age at the time the Hosmers went East in 1887; that she went with her father and mother to live in the Hosmer home during the absence of Mr. and Mrs. Hosmer on their trip to the state of Maine made during that year; that she was present when the Hosmers returned from this trip; that Vernon Willey was with them, but that the plaintiff was not. This witness testified that she remained with the Hosmers a day or two after their return, before she went with her parents back to their home in Compton, Cal., and that she did not see or meet the plaintiff until her next visit to the Hosmers, which was some months after they had returned. The evidence given by Vernon Willey and Rena Hawthorne, if believed by the trial court, was sufficient to justify the trial court, not only in rejecting the evidence of plaintiff and her uncle, Samuel R. G. Twycross, but in seriously questioning plaintiff's whole case.

Then, again, the further evidence given by the plaintiff herself was sufficient to warrant the trial court in doubting the validity of her claim. After the death of Mrs. Hosmer, the will already referred to was found. She filed the same for probate, together with her petition asking for her appointment as administratrix with the will annexed of Mrs. Hosmer's estate. In this petition she designated herself as the adopted daughter of the deceased. She was appointed administratrix, acted as such for over a year, and even had prepared for filing her final account and petition for distribution of said estate according to the terms of said will, before she brought this action. In the meantime she met and advised with various of the beneficiaries under the will, and particularly with Laura E. Hawthorne, who came to California to look after the interests of the residuary legatees. Not only did she not make any claim to the estate of said deceased by virtue of the agreement which she claims was made by her father with the Hosmers, but she actually leased some of the property of the estate, which had been by the will given to the residuary legatees, and paid them rent, during the administration of the estate. During this time, and up to the time shortly before the filing of her final account and petition for distribution, she made no claim whatever to any person that she was entitled to any portion thereof by reason of said agreement. This claim was then made to the attorney of the estate, who testified that "she intimated that she was going to make a claim for the entire estate." This was but a few days before the final account and petition for distribution was filed. They were filed May 13, 1924, and the petition for probate of Mrs. Hosmer's will was filed March 17, 1923.

She attempts to explain her action in failing to assert any right to the estate by virtue of the agreement by stating that she told the attorney for the estate all about the agreement at the time he was employed to probate the will of Mrs. Hosmer. The attorney denied, however, that any such statement had been made to him, or that plaintiff made any claim to Mrs. Hosmer's estate by virtue of the agreement until about the date of the final account and petition for distribution was filed. She admitted that her father in 1912 had told her that the agreement had been made by him with the Hosmers that they were to leave her all their property at their death. She, therefore, had full knowledge of her rights at all times since, and for some time prior to, the death of Mrs. Hosmer. We must assume in support of the judgment that the trial court accepted the testimony of the attorney of the estate that plaintiff had made no statement to him regarding her claim to the property of the estate by virtue of the agreement and rejected the evidence of the plaintiff that she had informed the attorney all about said agreement. Her actions, therefore, for more than a year after the death of Mrs. Hosmer were inconsistent with her claim that she was entitled to the whole or any part of the estate by virtue of the agreement made by her father with the Hosmers.

[6] From these actions of the plaintiff, subsequent to the death of Mrs. Hosmer, the trial court may well have concluded that the claim which the plaintiff was making was simply an afterthought on her part, and that it had no real merit in point of fact. The evidence of plaintiff's actions and conduct just recited would justify such a conclusion. "In cases of this kind, where one of the contracting parties has died, and his voice cannot be raised to contradict statements as to the terms of an agreement and of the performance had thereunder, necessarily the trial court is led to base its conclusion many times upon the testimony as to the acts of the parties and all of the circumstances * * * surrounding them. This evidence of conditions and circumstances may often-times illustrate well the truth of the old saying that 'actions speak louder than words.'" Pugh v. Bell, 21 Cal. App. 530, 534, 132 P. 286, 288.

The words just quoted, we think, aptly apply to the present action. It is not reasonable to suppose that the plaintiff, if she considered that she was entitled to the whole of the estate of Mrs. Hosmer, valued at over $27,000, would have undertaken to administer said estate under a will of the decedent which gave to her only the sum of $500 and to her husband a like sum, and that she would have carried on said administration until said estate was ready to be distributed under the terms of the will, without intimating in any manner that she had a claim to said estate over and above that which she took under said will. These acts of the plaintiff, and her dealings with the residuary legatees related above, were so out of harmony with the claim which she now asserts that they furnished to the trial court sufficient legal grounds for rejecting all evidence in her favor, bearing upon the making of the asserted agreement between her father and the Hosmers. With the evidence rejected by the trial court, its negative finding that no such agreement had been made was the only finding that would have been justified or supported by the evidence in the case.

[7, 8] The plaintiff further excepts to certain rulings of the trial court striking out portions of the deposition of Edith L. Twycross on the ground that the portions stricken out were mere conclusions of law. These exceptions are not well taken. Unquestionably the portions of the deposition stricken out were conclusions of law rather than statements of fact, and the action of the trial court thereon is not subject to criticism. But, even if the court erred in striking out portions of said deposition, the plaintiff was not prejudiced thereby. The main part of said deposition was admitted in evidence and the essential facts, which were sought to be proved by said deposition, were fully covered by the portion thereof before the court. The portions stricken out were principally repetitions of what the witness had before testified to, in somewhat different language. At most, the stricken portions were simply cumulative.

[9, 10] Plaintiff further contends that that portion of the judgment in favor of the defendants Alfred S. and Arthur M. Copps should be reversed. In this claim we think she is correct, as these defendants each filed an answer in which he admitted that all of the allegations of the complaint were true, and stipulated that judgment might be entered in said action as prayed for. This matter is of slight consequence to the plaintiff or to any one else, as it appears that she holds written assignments by the Copps of all their interest in said estate. But the question of making these assignments is not within the issues of the action, and the plaintiff is entitled upon the pleadings to judgment against the Copps as prayed for in her complaint. But neither the stipulation of the Copps nor the judgment in plaintiff's favor against them can in any way affect the right of plaintiff as to the remaining defendants in the case.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed, as between the appellant and respondents herein. As against the defendants Alfred S. Copps and Arthur M. Copps, it is so modified that plaintiff may have judgment against them as prayed for.

CRUSE v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.
(Civ. 6817.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 3, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 19, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 30, 1930.

1. Dismissal and nonsuit $\S$ 60(1)—Dismissal of action not brought to trial within statutory time is mandatory (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 583).

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 583, dismissal of action not brought to trial within five years after filing of answer is mandatory; language thereof not admitting of construction or exercise of discretion by trial court.

2. Dismissal and nonsuit $\S$ 80—Court cannot vacate sale of note, deposited by husband as security for payments to wife, after dismissing separate maintenance suit, for delay in bringing it to trial (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 583).

Where wife's action for separate maintenance was at issue over 14 years without being brought to trial, it was superior court's imperative duty to grant motion to dismiss action, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 583, and court had no authority to consider defendant's motion thereafter to vacate sale of trust deed note deposited by him as security for payment of sums ordered paid to plaintiff, whether or not section 473, under which defendant sought relief from effect of his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect in having action dismissed, covers situation.

3. Dismissal and nonsuit $\S$ 81(5)—Husband's ignorance of fact that note, deposited as security for payments to wife, had been sold, held not to authorize consideration of his motion to vacate dismissal of separate maintenance suit (Code Civ. Proc. $\S\S$ 473, 583).

Husband's lack of knowledge or notice, at time of making motion to dismiss wife's action for separate maintenance for failure to bring it to trial within time required by Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 583, that trust deed note, deposited by him as security for payments ordered made to wife, had been levied on and sold by sheriff, did not authorize court to consider motion to vacate order of dismissal for mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, under section 473; such facts not directly affecting grounds for dismissal.

4. Dismissal and nonsuit $\S$ 81(2)—Court cannot vacate order dismissing action, unless motion is based on facts directly affecting grounds for dismissal (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 583).

Court is without jurisdiction, and may be prevented from proceeding with consideration, of motion to vacate order dismissing action for failure to bring it to trial within time required by Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 583, unless motion to vacate is based on facts directly affecting grounds on which dismissal was authorized and granted.

Application by Cora Cruse for a writ of prohibition to the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Los Angeles, and J. Walter Hanby, Judge thereof, to further proceeding in petitioner's action against Edgar Cruse for separate maintenance and support of their minor children. Writ granted.

Fairfax Cosby and Benjamin Lewis, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

J. L. Murphey and S. V. O. Prichard, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. In an action in the superior court brought by Cora Cruse (who is the petitioner herein) against Edgar Cruse, her husband, for the separate maintenance of the wife and the support of the three minor children of the parties, an order was duly made requiring the defendant thereafter to pay to the plaintiff a specified sum of money each succeeding week. Some years following the date of such order, it appearing by affidavit made by the plaintiff in the action that the defendant therein was in default as to the payments to be made by him to his wife under such order, in pursuance of a motion presented to the superior court, a second order was entered by which the defendant was required to deposit with a trustee appointed by the court a certain trust deed note owned by the defendant as security for the payment by the defendant to the plaintiff of a specified sum of money each succeeding month thereafter in liquidation of the accumulated arrearage of $$989.50$ which was found and adjudged by the superior court to be due on the original order made for the support and maintenance of the plaintiff and the minor children of the parties. The written order by which the defendant was required to deposit said trust deed, among other things, contained the statement that "nothing herein set forth is intended to prevent or limit the plaintiff from levying an execution and selling said note and trust deed to satisfy said judgment of $$989.50$." In compliance with said order, the defendant delivered the trust deed note to the said trustee appointed by the court for the purposes aforesaid. Nine days after said last-mentioned order had been made, the defendant gave notice to the plaintiff that on a designated date he would move the superior court for an order of dismissal of the action pending between the parties on the ground, as provided in section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that the action had been at issue for more than five years, to wit, more than fourteen years, without having been brought to trial. Thereafter, but before said motion to dismiss the said action came on for hearing, under a writ of execution the plaintiff procured said trust deed note in the hands of the said trustee to be levied upon and sold by the sheriff; the plaintiff becoming the purchaser thereof at such sale for the amount due to her as aforesaid from the defendant, plus the costs of such sheriff's sale. Two days following the date of such sale, in pursuance of the motion presented to the superior court by the defendant, the action pending between the plaintiff and the defendant was ordered dismissed on the ground, as set forth in said motion, that the action had been at issue for more than five years without having been brought to trial. Within two or three weeks next succeeding the date of the order of dismissal of the action, the defendant presented a petition or motion to the superior court for an order setting aside and voiding the "execution or order of sale" and setting aside "the sheriff's sale of the property of the defendant." On the original hearing of such motion the plaintiff objected to a consideration thereof on the ground that the court was without jurisdiction in the premises for the reason that the action theretofore had been dismissed. Thereupon the defendant filed a notice of motion to vacate the order of dismissal of the action. The several motions then having come on for hearing, and at the conclusion thereof, the judge of the superior court having indicated that each of such motions would be granted, the plaintiff has petitioned this court for a peremptory writ of prohibition by which the superior court and a designated judge thereof may be restrained from proceeding further in the matter of either of such motions.

[1] In part, section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that " * * * any action heretofore or hereafter commenced shall be dismissed by the court in which the same shall have been commenced or to which it may be transferred on motion of the defendant, after due notice to plaintiff or by the court upon its own motion, unless such action is brought to trial within five years after the defendant has filed his answer, except where the parties have stipulated in writing that the time may be extended."

The positive character of such statutory provision and its effect upon an action falling within its terms is illustrated by the statement found in 9 California Jurisprudence, p. 534, where it is said: " * * * When the delay equals that prescribed by the statute, the court loses jurisdiction of the action and can proceed no further therein, except to dismiss the action, and prohibition will lie to prevent it from taking any other course. * * *" (Citing authorities.)

The only case to which the attention of this court has been directed, which under appropriate circumstances might possibly indicate a discretionary power resting in the trial court in the matter of ordering a dismissal of an action not brought to trial within five years after the same is at issue, is that of Larkin v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 719, 154 P. 841, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 670.

That the language of the statute does not admit of construction or the exercise of any discretion in the trial court, but that upon the lapse of the prescribed period the dismissal of the action is mandatory, is attested by many authorities. In the case of Ravn v. Planz, 37 Cal. App. 735, 736, 174 P. 690, it is said: "The provision of section 583 above set forth is mandatory. (Citing authorities.) The circumstance, therefore, that the trial of the cause was postponed several times without plaintiff's consent, one of those occasions being a relatively short time before the date when the defendant would be entitled to require the court to dismiss the action, is a matter of no significance. Courts are, of course, loath to deny to a litigant a trial upon the merits; but the section of the Code of Civil Procedure above recited directs in plain terms that it shall be done when a case falls within the conditions stated, and the present is such a case. The trial court had no discretion. The motion being made, its duty was to dismiss. To relax the rule to cover hard cases would be to set at naught the express will of the Legislature."

In the case of Boyd v. Southern Pacific R. Co., 185 Cal. 344, 197 P. 58, 59, on motion of the plaintiff made a few months before the expiration of the five-year period, the case was set for trial on a date subsequent to the expiration of such period. A judgment based upon an order dismissing the action was affirmed. In part, the court said: "The mandatory character of these provisions (sec. 583, Code Civ. Proc.) of the statute is evident, and our decisions have held that such is in fact their character. Larkin v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 719, 154 P. 841, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 670. In the present case, the action was once set for trial at a time something over a year after issue joined by answer, but the trial date was continued indefinitely by stipulation. Some years later and a few months before the expiration of the five-year period, the plaintiff moved that the cause be set again for trial, and this was done but for a date after the expiration of the period. Upon the expiration of the period and before the trial date, the defendant moved that the action be dismissed, and the order of dismissal was made."

See, also, Davis v. Superior Court, 184 Cal. 691, 195 P. 390; Sauer v. Superior Court, 74 Cal. App. 580, 241 P. 570; Swortfiguer v. White, 141 Cal. 576, 75 P. 172; Modoc L. & L. Co. v. Superior Court, 128 Cal. 255, 60 P. 848; White v. Superior Court, 126 Cal. 245, 58 P. 450; Vrooman v. Li Po Tai, 113 Cal. 302, 45 P. 470.

[2] It must therefore be concluded that within the authorities hereinbefore cited, in view of the fact that at the time the motion for dismissal was made the action herein had been at issue for more than five years, to wit, more than fourteen years, without having been brought to trial, on the presentation to the superior court of the motion to dismiss the action it became the imperative duty of such court to grant the motion. It is plain that, at least after the action had been dismissed, the superior court was without jurisdiction to hear or determine any motion unrelated to the dismissal of the action which thereafter might be presented therein; and consequently that, so far as the motion made by the defendant to vacate the sale and "the execution or order of sale" was concerned, no authority was vested in the superior court to consider the same. As to the motion made by the defendant, purportedly under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, by which he sought to be relieved from the effect of his own "mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect" in having the action dismissed at his own instance, it becomes unnecessary to decide whether the language of such statute is sufficiently broad and comprehensive to cover a situation such as is here presented.

The case of Davis v. Superior Court, 184 Cal. 691, 195 P. 390, 392, depended upon a construction of section 581b of the Code of Civil Procedure, the provisions of which in principle are analogous to those contained in section 583 of that Code. In the case referred to it appeared that, contrary to the provisions of section 581b, for a period of over one year the plaintiff had failed to pay the required filing fee in an action which on motion of the defendant had been removed from the county in which the action was originally filed to the county in which the defendant resided, and that thereupon (also on motion of the defendant) the action had been dismissed. On motion made by the plaintiff to vacate such order of dismissal, it was admitted that the required fee for filing the action in the county to which the action had been transferred had not been paid within the time prescribed by the statute. The facts upon which the success of the motion to vacate the order of dismissal of the action rested were that the attorney for the plaintiff, who resided in the county in which the action was originally commenced, had retained another attorney to represent the plaintiff, and which attorney resided in the county to which the action had been transferred, to which latter attorney had been sent the money with which to pay the required filing fee; but that, although the money had been duly received by such latter attorney, the filing fee had not been paid. In discussing the point relating to the jurisdiction of the superior court to vacate the order of dismissal of the action, in part the Supreme Court said:

"* * * Respondent argues that the court had jurisdiction under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to set aside the judgment of dismissal, and that its order to that effect is therefore conclusive, except upon direct appeal. It may be conceded for the sake of the argument that if the judgment of dismissal had been set aside on the ground that, although the fees had been paid in time, it was given by reason of some inadvertence and neglect of the plaintiff whereby she had failed to appear, or, having appeared, had failed or had been prevented from showing facts which would have justified a refusal to give that judgment, and she had, on the motion to vacate it, shown that she had good grounds on the merits for opposing the dismissal the superior court would have had jurisdiction to vacate the judgment of dismissal, and that the order to vacate it could not be attacked by a proceeding in prohibition.

"But that is not the case we have before us. The only answer that could have been made to the application for dismissal in the present case, and the only ground that would have been sufficient to warrant a vacation thereof after such judgment was given, would be that the fees for filing the pleadings and papers had actually been paid within the year allowed by section 581b, or, possibly, that the plaintiff had been prevented from making such payment by some fraud or other conduct of the defendant that would have created an estoppel against him to claim the benefit of the provisions requiring a dismissal. * * *

"It appears therefore, as matter of law, from the facts disclosed by the moving papers, that the fees had not been paid in time. This being the case, it follows, under the plain provisions of section 581b and the principles established by the decisions above cited in regard to the meaning and application thereof, that the superior court had then no power or jurisdiction to entertain the motion or to do anything in the action except to dismiss it. If there had been no judgment of dismissal at that time, the only duty resting upon the court and the only power it had, from the admitted facts, was to enter a judgment of dismissal. And this was a continuing duty and the sole power of the court even after it had made the order vacating the dismissal. * * * It had no power to do anything else. * * *

To the same effect, see Sauer v. Superior Court, 74 Cal. App. 580, 241 P. 570.

[3, 4] In the instant case, on the motion to vacate the order of dismissal of the action, the defendant made no showing which in any way tended to controvert the fact that the cause had been at issue for more than five years without having been brought to trial. That fact was acknowledged; indeed, the motion to dismiss having been made by the defendant, the success of his motion depended upon that fact. The only circumstance suggested by the defendant as constituting even an approach to "mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect" on his part was that at the time he made the motion to dismiss the action he was not aware of the fact that under the writ of execution hereinbefore referred to the trust deed note belonging to the defendant had been sold by the sheriff, and that "if he had had notice or knowledge that the said note had been levied upon and sold by the sheriff as aforesaid, he would not have made the motion to dismiss said action. * * * " But it is apparent that such lack of knowledge or notice on the part of the defendant could in no wise either prove or tend to prove that the time limit of five years after the cause was at issue without having been brought to trial had not expired, or that any legal excuse existed for the delay beyond the statutory period. Nor would either the fact that the said trust deed note had been regularly levied upon and sold by the sheriff, or that the defendant was wholly unaware of or without notice of such circumstance, be pertinent or relevant to the only issue which could be properly raised on the motion to vacate the order of dismissal of the action. The ground relied upon by the defendant for such result was wholly immaterial to and had no bearing upon the question as to whether the five-year period prescribed by the statute had legally and within the intent and purpose of the statute expired without the cause having been brought to trial. From the authorities hereinbefore cited the principle of law may be deduced that, unless the motion to vacate a dismissal of an action is based upon some state of facts which directly affects the grounds upon which the dismissal was authorized and granted, the court is without jurisdiction and may be prevented from proceeding with a consideration of the motion to vacate the order of dismissal.

Although as having some bearing upon a decision of the main point in the present proceeding before this court, many different suggestions are made by the respective parties hereto, each of such points being dependent upon the points already considered, it is thought unnecessary to devote the necessary time and energy to a decision of any of them which otherwise they would be entitled to receive.

It is ordered that the respondents and each of them be and they are restrained from further proceeding in the action to which reference has been had herein and which is entitled and numbered respectively in the superior court, Cora Cruse, Plaintiff, v. Edgar Cruse, also known as Edward P. Cruse, Defendant, No. B26529.

We concur: CONROY, P. J.; YORK, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. On petition for rehearing respondents direct the attention of this court to an error which occurred in the statement of facts in the opinion herein, wherein in effect it is said that in compliance with said (written) order the defendant Cruse delivered the trust deed note to the trust appointed by the trial court. As a matter of fact, the trust deed note in question was delivered by defendant Cruse to said trustee in compliance with the requirements of the original order (as distinguished from the written order) made by the trial court and entered on its minutes several days preceding the date of the written order to which reference is had in the opinion. It should also be noted that the original order as entered on the minutes of the trial court did not contain the statement that "nothing herein set forth is intended to prevent or limit the plaintiff from levying an execution and selling the said note and trust deed to satisfy said judgment of $989.50."

The petition for rehearing is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

Action by Nicholas B. Harris, doing business under the fictitious firm name of the Nick Harris Detectives, against Joe Moore. From a judgment for defendant in the Superior Court on appeal from judgment for plaintiff in Municipal Court, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph L. Call, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. R. Elam, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, Acting P. J. The appellant instituted an action in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles for services alleged to have been rendered to the respondent herein. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, whereupon the defendant appealed to the superior court, wherein judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed here.

[1] Inasmuch as the jurisdiction of this court in proceedings brought before us is fundamental, we are required to determine the question of our authority to review them, although it be not raised by the parties. By amendments to article 6 of the Constitution (sections 4b, 5, art. 6, Cal. Const.; St. 1927, ch. 77, p. 2389), the people voted on November 6, 1928, to limit appeals from the superior court to those proceedings wherein it has original jurisdiction. The effect of these amendments has heretofore been discussed by the District Court of Appeal, and by the Supreme Court, and in at least one instance the appeal was dismissed. Johnston v. Wolf (Cal. App.) 274 P. 1028; Moye v. National Surety Co. (Cal. App.) 277 P. 499, Id. (Cal. Sup.) 280 P. 982. In those cases, however, the appeals were perfected after said amendments became effective, whereas the instant case was appealed here on April 21, 1927. Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, at page 62, observed: "Retrospective legislation, except when designed to cure formal defects, or otherwise operate remedially, is commonly objectionable in principle, and apt to result in injustice; and it is a sound rule of construction which refuses lightly to imply an intent to enact it. And we are aware of no reasons applicable to ordinary legislation which do not, upon this point, apply equally well to constitutions." In Black on Interpretation of Laws, at page 20, it is said upon cited authority: "A constitutional provision should not be construed with a retrospective operation unless that is the unmistakable intention of the words used, or the obvious design of the authors." In Cassard v. Tracy, 52 La. Ann. 835, 27 So. 368, 369, 49 L. R. A. 272, an appeal was perfected prior to the date upon which a constitutional provision became effective. The Supreme Court of Louisiana, reviewing the above and many other authorities upon the subject, remarked that previously to being deprived of jurisdiction the appellate court might have set aside the judgment. "But no authority was vested in any other department of the government either to set the judgment aside or to control the discretion vested in the appellate court in the premises, or in any other manner, without due process of law." It was there concluded: "It is in view of consequences such as these that all writers upon the construction of law concur in the opinion that, whether constitutional or statutory, it should be construed to operate prospectively only, unless such construction is absolutely precluded by the language used.

* * * It must be presumed that the members of the convention which adopted the constitution of 1898 were familiar with these commonly accepted canons of construction, and that, when they intended any particular provision incorporated in that instrument to operate retrospectively, they formulated it in such language as to leave no room for doubt." By section 4b, article 6, of our Constitution, the people ordained that "district courts of appeal shall have appellate jurisdiction on appeal from the superior courts (except in cases in which appellate jurisdiction is given to the supreme court) in all cases at law in which the superior courts are given original jurisdiction." That retroactive operation of this provision was not intended is manifest from the language of section 2, article 22, of our Constitution, which is similar to that considered in Cassard v. Tracy, supra. Except upon the abolition of a court, when provision for the transfer of its proceedings is made, the only mention of the effect of the Constitution upon pending litigation appears in said section. It is there expressly ordained that "all writs, prosecutions, actions, and causes of action, except as herein otherwise provided, shall continue and remain unaffected by the adoption of this Constitution." We conclude that the instant case, having been appealed prior to the adoption of section 4b of article 6, was not affected thereby.

[2] It appears that in response to a telephonic communication from respondent, a representative of the detective agency called upon him at his place of business, and was informed that respondent was desirous of obtaining a divorce from his wife, inquiring if the detectives could obtain sufficient evidence to accomplish such purpose. To quote the evidence presented by appellant: "Mr. Holcomb testified that he agreed to get sufficient evidence for defendant and appellant herein to get a divorce and agreed that if they caught Mrs. Moore in a room with a man that they wanted three hundred dollars ($300.00) bonus for extra services." "Mr. Cowen testified that he explained the terms of the contract to Mr. Moore and that he agreed to get sufficient evidence to file a divorce action or to obtain a divorce from Mrs. Moore." "Joe Moore testified * * * that Mr. Holcomb then explained the terms of the contract and said that they could get sufficient evidence for him to get a divorce." It was further testified that the two operatives thereafter saw Mrs. Moore in the embraces of a man other than her husband while seated upon a park bench. The superior court held that the contract of employment was against public policy, and was therefore illegal. This is the only question presented for decision.

Each of the parties relies upon Hare v. McGue, 178 Cal. 740, 174 P. 663, 664, L. R. A. 1918F, 1099, wherein it was held that inasmuch as the investigators were to be paid whether they procured witnesses or discovered any evidence or not, the contract was not against public policy; that they did not agree "nor were they asked by appellant, to procure witnesses to testify to any particular state of facts, but only to obtain from witnesses information of what they knew, and report the matters to the attorneys for appellant." It appears that in the instant case the operatives were employed for an agreed daily fee to make an investigation, and that they were promised a bonus upon conditions specified. The defendant testified that they did nothing. In this he was contradicted by the agents of appellant, but there is no contention that the bonus was earned. We think it also apparent that they would not have been employed had they not represented to the respondent that they could and would furnish sufficient evidence for the accomplishment of the desired litigation, and that the contract was founded upon such contingency. For aught that is before us the detectives knew nothing of the probability of existing grounds for divorce, yet the uncontradicted evidence showed that "they would get sufficient evidence for him to get a divorce." They were not employed to obtain from witnesses information of what they knew and to report such matters, but solely upon their agreement to furnish a particular state of facts. As stated in the case above cited: "It is the element of payment contingent on the success of the litigation in which the evidence is to be produced, or the fact that the agreement is to procure evidence, not of facts as they exist, but of particular facts necessary to the success of the party litigant, who contracted for their production, which vitiates the contract."

The judgment is affirmed.

BROWN v. LANE. (Civ. 5667.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 5, 1929.

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨109(4)—Lessor's acceptance of surrender of possession after notice demanding payment of rent was not, under circumstances, termination of lease by mutual consent.

Lessor's acceptance of surrender of possession of premises by lessee after service of notice demanding payment of rent or, in the alternative, that lessee quit and deliver up premises, was not sufficient to constitute a termination by mutual consent of the lease within meaning of provision of lease granting right of re-entry and recovery of damages by reason of any breach.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨108(1)—Provisions of lease requiring notice to terminate lease on retaking of premises after default in payment of rent are controlling.

Where lease itself expressly provides that retaking of premises by lessor in accordance with his rights after default in payment of rent shall not be effective to constitute a termination of lease unless lessor further gives notice of election to treat lease as terminated, such provisions are controlling.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. C. Valentine, Judge.

Action by G. C. Brown against Percy A. Lane. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Porter & Sutton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

R. D. McLaughlin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for a portion of the money deposited with the defendant at the time of the making of a certain lease of real property for a term of four years and ten months, ending October 31, 1927.

G. C. Brown and Percy A. Lane entered into a written lease whereby plaintiff leased from the defendant a certain storeroom, known as No. 432 South Spring street, Los Angeles, for the term of years above stated. Under the terms of said lease, plaintiff deposited with defendant the sum of $1,500, which the defendant was to hold as security for the payment of rent and faithful performance by lessee of all obligations therein undertaken by him until the termination of said lease, at which time lessor was to apply said deposit or so much thereof as might be necessary as a credit on any damages he might sustain by reason of the breach or breaches of any of said obligations by lessee, and to repay the balance of said deposit, if any, to lessee.

Plaintiff paid rent which became due under said lease up to and including March, 1925. On April 16, 1925, defendant served upon plaintiff a written notice demanding of plaintiff the payment of rent for the month of April, within three days of the service of said written notice, or, in the alternative, demanding that plaintiff quit and deliver up said premises to the defendant. Plaintiff did not pay defendant said rent, but did deliver up the premises to the defendant on April 30, 1925. Plaintiff then brought action to recover the balance claimed by him out of said deposit of $1,500. The court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $860, with interest thereon at 7 per cent. per annum from April 30, 1925 (being the difference between $1,500 plus $110 collected from a subtenant, and $750, the amount of the rent for the month of April), together with plaintiff's costs of suit. This judgment was entered on the 23d day of November, 1926, nearly one year before the end of the term of the lease.

Under the terms of the lease, upon the failure of the lessee to pay the rent or surrender premises within the time specified in the notice given, it was provided that the lessor should have the right to re-enter the premises. The lease further provided as follows: "Should lessor elect to re-enter and take possession of said premises under the provisions herein made, he may either terminate this lease and recover from lessee all damages lessor may incur in recovering possession of said premises, because of any breach, or breaches by lessee; or lessor may re-let said premises or any part thereof for all or any part of the remainder of said term, to a tenant or tenants satisfactory to him, and at such monthly rental as he may with reasonable diligence secure; and should such monthly rental be less than that herein agreed to be paid by lessee, lessee agrees to pay such deficiency to lessor, in advance, on the day of each month hereinbefore specified for payment of rental; and to pay to lessor, within ten days after such reletting, the costs and expenses lessor may incur by reason thereof. No re-entry of said premises by lessor as herein provided, shall be construed as an election on his part to terminate this lease unless written notice of such intention is given lessee or mailed to him at his last-known address."

[1, 2] There was no evidence that the landlord gave any written notice of intention to terminate the lease, also there was no evidence tending to prove any oral agreement or consent of the lessor terminating the lease. Nevertheless, the court found that, between the 16th and 30th of April, 1925, the lease was terminated by mutual consent of the parties. Finding 11 contains the following: "Further finds that it is not true that on the 30th day of April, 1925, the plaintiff surrendered the possession of the premises other than under the mutual agreement of the parties that the lease was terminated, and that it is not true that the defendant took possession of said premises from plaintiff under the provisions of paragraph 11 of said lease, or otherwise than under said mutual agreement to terminate said lease; that it is not true that defendant elected not to terminate said lease but to relet said premises for the account of the plaintiff, but that all subsequent reletting was on defendant's own behalf." It is evident that, in making the foregoing findings, the court must have been of the opinion that the mere acceptance of the surrender of possession of the premises at the time and under the circumstances to which we have referred was sufficient to constitute a termination by mutual consent of the said lease. We are of the opinion that this was an erroneous conclusion. It follows that the findings are not sustained by the evidence. Where the lease itself expressly provides that the re-taking of premises by the lessor in accordance with his rights, after default in the payment of rent, shall not be effective to constitute a termination of the lease unless the lessor further gives notice of election to treat the lease as terminated, these provisions of the lease are controlling. Burke v. Norton, 42 Cal. App. 705, 184 P. 45; Security Realty Co. v. Kost (Cal. App.) 274 P. 608.

Since the judgment must be reversed, and since the term of the lease has now expired, it is appropriate to suggest that supplemental pleadings should be allowed, and that upon a retrial of the case the amount of damages, if any, which the lessor has sustained by reason of the tenant's failure to pay the rental provided for in the lease, may be fully determined and judgment rendered in accordance with the facts.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further trial in accordance with the views herein stated.

ENGSTROM v. ATKINS. (Civ. 7157.)

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California. Dec. 7, 1929.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 627(2)—Reviewing court will not dismiss appeal for lack of diligence in preparing transcript until trial court has been moved to terminate proceedings for procuring transcript (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 953a).

Where appellant has complied with jurisdictional requirements of Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 953a, by filing notice of appeal, and there is delay in procuring transcript either on account of lack of diligence on part of officers of court to prepare transcript or for other reasons, remedy for such delay is by motion in trial court to terminate proceedings for procuring transcript, and, until such remedy is exercised and trial court has determined such matter, reviewing court will not dismiss appeal.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 628(2)—Reviewing court would not dismiss appeal for delay in obtaining transcript, where delay was occasioned by absence of reporter.

Where delay in procuring of transcript was occasioned by absence of substitute reporter acting during part of trial, reviewing court would not dismiss appeal for lack of diligence in causing transcript to be settled and allowed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco.

Action by James E. Engstrom against Bertram C. Atkins. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. On plaintiff's motion to dismiss defendant's appeal. Motion denied.

Henry Heidelberg, of San Francisco, for appellant.

James Sykes, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. Plaintiff moves to dismiss defendant's appeal upon the ground that, "although said appeal was taken on the 30th day of April, 1929, no steps have been taken to perfect said appeal by causing a transcript or bill of exceptions to be settled and allowed."

The action was tried in extra session of the superior court, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, before a judge from another county sitting with a jury. The trial consumed two days, and on the second day the court reporter regularly assigned to said court was absent and his place was filled by a substitute employed only temporarily in the superior court. On April 30, 1929, in conformity with the requirements of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, defendant filed a notice with the clerk, stating that he had appealed from the judgment, and requesting that a transcript be made up and prepared in accordance with the provisions of said section. Shortly after the trial, however, the substitute reporter moved away from San Francisco and thereafter his whereabouts were unknown until a few days prior to the hearing of this motion when defendant's attorneys were informed that he was living in Los Angeles or San Bernardino. They wrote to him at once and after several days' delay received a reply from San Bernardino, dated November 12, 1929, indicating that he would be able to furnish the transcript within a short time. The reply letter was received subsequent to the submission of this motion and has been made a part of the record herein.

[1] As will be noted from the statement of the grounds urged in support of respondent's motion, the dismissal of the appeal is not sought upon the ground that there has been a failure to file the transcript within 40 days after the appeal was perfected, because the time thus allowed does not commence to run until the transcript is certified by the trial judge, and here the transcript has not yet been prepared (rule I, § 1, Rules for Supreme and District Courts of Appeal; Mill Valley v. Massachusetts Bonding & Ins. Co., 189 Cal. 52, 207 P. 253), but the dismissal is sought upon the ground that there has been a lack of diligence on defendant's part to procure the transcript. In this connection the law is well established that when, as here, an appellant complies with the jurisdictional requirement of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure by filing the notice provided by that section and there is unreasonable delay in procuring the transcript, either on account of a lack of diligence on the part of the officers of the court to prepare the same or for other reasons, the remedy for such delay is by way of motion in the trial court to terminate the proceedings for procuring the transcript; and that until such remedy is exercised and the trial court has determined the matter, the reviewing court will not dismiss the appeal. Crocker v. Crocker, 76 Cal. App. 606, 245 P. 438, 439, and authorities therein cited; Mill Valley v. Massachusetts Bonding & Ins. Co., supra. Admittedly, in the present case respondent has not exercised such remedy, and consequently upon that ground his motion to dismiss the appeal should be denied.

[2] Aside from that matter, however, it is apparent from the undisputed facts appearing in the record before us that the delay in procuring the transcript herein has not been due to any lack of diligence on the part of appellant, but was incident to a matter over which the trial court had control; and, moreover, that the delay has not been of great duration. Therefore, as held in Crocker v. Crocker, supra, "this court ought not to order a dismissal of an appeal where jurisdiction is not shown to be wanting and the alleged delays are only in matters of procedure, which are in no wise fatal to a hearing of the cause upon its merits."

For the reasons stated the motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

GUNN v. GUNN et al. (Civ. 7197.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 17, 1929.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 151(2)—Defendant in partition suit failing to assert interest in property is not "party aggrieved" by decree, so as to entitle him to appeal.

Defendant, in suit for partition and sale of real property, denying allegations as to ownership of undivided one-half interest and failing to assert any claim of interest in property, was not a "party aggrieved" by decree in favor of plaintiff, and was therefore not entitled to urge any contentions on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Aggrieved Party.]

2. Partition $\S$ 55(2)—Plea of ownership of undivided one-half interest was equal to averment of title in "fee" authorizing partition suit; "estate of inheritance" (Civ. Code $\S$ 762; Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 752).

Plea of ownership of undivided one-half interest by plaintiff in partition suit was equivalent to averment of title in fee, in that under

Civ. Code, § 762, every estate of inheritance is a "fee" and a tenant in common holding interest in fee has an "estate of inheritance" within meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 752, entitling him to sue in partition.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Estate of Inheritance; Fee.]

3. Appeal and error §149—Appellate court, where interests of parties not represented are involved, will not enter decree to cure defects in failing to expressly define interests, but will remand for modification (Code Civ. Proc. § 956a).

Where decree failing to expressly define interests of parties also fails to determine interests of parties who are not represented on appeal, appellate court will not, in exercise of power given by Code Civ. Proc. § 956a, enter a new decree to cure defect, but will remand cause with directions for modification to conform to finding.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Suit by Minnie Rose Gunn against John W. Gunn and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals. Cause remanded with directions.

Walter McGovern, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Joseph Edward Connolly and Stanley Burke, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued for the partition and sale of certain real property. The cause was tried before the court, which made findings and entered an interlocutory decree for plaintiff. From this decree the defendant has appealed on typewritten transcripts.

The complaint alleged that plaintiff and defendant John W. Gunn "are each the owners of an undivided one-half interest in the property described." The answer of defendant Gunn denied this allegation. On the trial this defendant's deed of conveyance was received in evidence. The deed conveyed to the plaintiff herein an undivided one-half interest in the property. The trial court found the allegation of the complaint true and ordered judgment for plaintiff.

[1] By reason of his denials in his answer and his failure to assert any claim of interest in the property, the appellant is not a party aggrieved by the decree and is therefore not entitled to urge any of his contentions on this appeal. Ritzman v. Ritzman, 190 Cal. 505, 506, 507, 213 P. 493.

[2] Respondent's plea of ownership of an undivided one-half interest was equal to an averment of title in fee. Directors F. I. District v. Abila, 106 Cal. 355, 363, 39 P. 794. Every estate of inheritance is a fee. See section 762, Civ. Code. Hence a tenant in common who holds his interest in fee has "an estate of inheritance" within the meaning of section 752, Code of Civil Procedure, entitling him to sue in partition. Failure to allege the precise character of the estate held by plaintiff is cured by the evidence and findings showing that the pleader comes within the category of those authorized to sue for partition under the Code sections. But in reference to the ruling on the demurrer to the complaint, since tenants in common who held the fee to realty were entitled to partition at common law under the Statutes of 31 and 32, Henry VIII (20 R. C. L., p. 743), therefore, though the complaint here did not strictly follow the terms of section 752, Code of Civil Procedure, it nevertheless stated a cause of action for equitable relief and the demurrer was properly overruled. Brown v. Anderson-Cottonwood Irr. Dist., 183 Cal. 186, 188, 190 P. 797.

[3] Respondent suggests that the decree is defective in that it does not expressly define the interests of these parties. Respondent asks this court to exercise the power given by section 956a, Code of Civil Procedure, and enter a new decree to cure this defect. But the decree fails to determine the interests of other parties who are not represented on this appeal. There is no necessity of a further hearing to determine any of the facts as the findings fully cover every issue, but we deem it the better practice to remand the cause with directions to the trial court to modify the decree to conform to the findings on file and that, as so modified, the decree shall stand affirmed, each party to bear its own costs on this appeal.

So ordered.

BLADE v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO
et al. (Civ. 7156.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 6, 1929.

I. Justices of the peace §160(4)—Appeal was "taken from justice's judgment" when notice thereof was served and filed as regards applicability of statute governing such appeals in certain cities (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 974, 982a).

Appeal from money judgment in justice's court to superior court was "taken," as regards applicability of Code Civ. Proc. § 982a, governing appeals from justice's courts in cities of over 30,000 population, when notice of appeal was served and filed under section 974, which provides appeal is taken by filing notice of appeal with justice or judge and serving copy on adverse party.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Taken.]

2. Justices of the peace §159(10)—Filing of undertaking constituted no part of process of taking appeal from justice judgment as regards applicability of statute governing such appeals in certain cities (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 978, 982a).

Although appeal from judgment of justice's court, notice of which was served and filed, was not sufficient for any purpose until undertaking was filed, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 978, filing thereof constituted no part of process of taking appeal, and process was complete when notice of appeal was served and filed, as regards applicability of section 982a, governing appeals from justice's courts in cities of more than 30,000 population.

3. Justices of the peace §140—Appeal from justice's judgment, taken before effectual date of statute providing for appeals as from municipal courts, was not affected thereby (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 3, 982a, 988a, 988b).

Where appeal from judgment of justice's court was taken prior to effectual date of Code Civ. Proc. § 982a, providing that appeals from courts of justices of the peace in jurisdictions having population of 30,000 or more must be according to appeals from municipal courts, which are required to be taken on record containing bill of exceptions or certified transcript by sections 988a and 988b, legal sufficiency of appeal was not affected by provisions of new statute, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 3, and should be determined by law in force when appeal was taken.

4. Statutes §263—Statute will not be construed retrospectively, unless clear Legislature so intended.

Statute will not be construed retrospectively, unless it is clear that such was the intention of Legislature which enacted it.

5. Justices of the peace §171(1)—Defendant appealing from justice's judgment on questions of law and fact was entitled to trial de novo in superior court (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 974, 976).

Where, at time appeal from judgment of court of justices of peace was taken, prior to effective date of Code Civ. Proc. § 982a, law afforded appellant option of appealing on question of law or fact or both under section 974, and appellant elected to and did appeal on questions of law and fact, appellant was entitled as matter of right to trial de novo in superior court, as provided by section 976.

6. Justices of the peace §140—Statute providing for appeals from courts of justices of peace in places having population of 30,000 same as appeals from municipal courts held not retroactive (Code Civ. Proc. § 982a).

Code Civ. Proc. § 982a, providing that appeals from courts of justices of peace in places having population of 30,000 or more shall be taken, heard, and determined according to provisions relating to appeals from municipal courts, as regulated by sections 649, 650, 651, 953a, 983, 988a, 988b, 988h, held not retroactive in its effect, and not to apply to appeal from judgment of justice's court taken before effectual date of section 982a.

Application by Dante R. Blade for certiorari to the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco and Hon. John J. Van Nostrand to review an order denying petitioner's motion to dismiss an appeal in an action in justices' court wherein petitioner obtained a money judgment. Writ denied.

James H. Boyer, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Clarence E. Todd, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. Petitioner obtained a money judgment in the justices' court of the city and county of San Francisco, and the defendant in the action took an appeal therefrom to the superior court upon questions of law and fact. Subsequently petitioner moved for a dismissal of the appeal upon the ground that it was not supported by a proper record. The motion was denied, and thereupon he instituted this proceeding in certiorari for the purpose of having the order made in that behalf annulled.

The judgment was rendered on July 29, 1929; the notice of appeal was served and filed on August 13th; the undertaking on appeal was filed on August 16th; and petitioner concedes that the proceedings thus taken conformed to the requirements of the law relating to justices' court appeals in force at the time of the rendition of the judgment and the filing of the notice of appeal. It appears, however, that between the dates on which the notice of appeal and the undertaking were filed, to wit, on August 14, 1929, a new Code section became effective, which, in substance, provided that all appeals from justices' courts in cities, cities and counties, towns and townships, having a population of 30,000 or more, must be taken, heard, and determined in the manner provided for taking, hearing, and determining appeals from municipal courts (Code Civ. Proc. § 982a), and admittedly such appeals are required to be taken on a record containing a bill of exceptions or a certified transcript (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 988a and 988b). Petitioner contends, therefore, that, since the undertaking herein was not filed until after the new Code section became operative, the legal sufficiency of the appeal must be determined by the law in force at that time.

[1-3] The appeal was "taken," however, when the notice of appeal was served and filed (Code Civ. Proc. § 974; Farrisee v. Superior Court, 40 Cal. App. 469, 181 P. 73), and, although the appeal was not sufficient for any purpose until the undertaking was filed (Code Civ. Proc. § 978; Moffat v. Greenwalt, 90 Cal. 368, 27 P. 296), the filing thereof constituted no "part of the process of taking the appeal. That process was complete when the notice of appeal was served and filed." Rigby v. Superior Court, 162 Cal. 334, 122 P. 958, 960. And in this connection it is held in the early case of Caulfield v. Doe, 45 Cal. 221, that " * * * when, in pending actions, proceedings [on appeal] have been taken prior to the taking effect of the Code of Civil Procedure, the sufficiency of such proceedings must be determined by the law in force at the time and by no other rule." The legal principle thus declared is founded on section 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that no part of the Code is retroactive, unless expressly so declared; and this same rule applies as well to the amendments to the Code. Estate of Frees, 187 Cal. 150, 201 P. 112. It follows, therefore, that, since the appeal herein was taken prior to the date on which the new Code section became operative, its legal sufficiency could be in no way affected by the provisions of the new Code section, but should be determined by the law in force at the time the appeal was taken.

[4] To make the new Code section applicable to appeals taken before the section went into operation would be to give its provisions a retroactive effect, and in this regard it is a well-settled rule of statutory construction that a statute will not be construed retrospectively, unless it is clear that such was the legislative intention. Estate of Frees, supra. As said in Pignaz v. Burnett, 119 Cal. 157, 51 P. 48, 49: "Laws which create new obligations, or impose new duties, or exact new penalties because of past transactions, have been universally reprobated by civil and common law writers, and it is to be presumed that no statute is intended to have such effect, unless the contrary clearly appears. This is especially so where to give the statute retrospective effect would work manifest injustice." See, also, Estate of Parker, 200 Cal. 132, 142, 251 P. 907. The same principle is given in Cooley on Constitutional Limitations (7th Ed.) p. 529, as follows: " * * * It is a sound rule of construction that a statute should have a prospective operation only, unless its terms show clearly a legislative intention that it should operate retrospectively." And in Endlich on the Interpretation of Statutes, p. 362, the rule is stated thus: " * * * Indeed, the rule to be derived from the comparison of a vast number of judicial utterances upon this subject, seems to be, that, even in the absence of constitutional obstacles to retroaction, a construction giving to a statute a prospective operation is always to be preferred, unless a purpose to give it a retrospective force is expressed by clear and positive command, or to be inferred by necessary, unequivocal and unavoidable implication from the words of the statute taken by themselves and in connection with the subject matter, and the occasion of the enactment, admitting of no reasonable doubt, but precluding all question as to such intention."

[5] There was no language used in the enactment of section 982a indicating that the Legislature ever intended that it should apply to appeals taken prior to the date on Cal.Rep. 281-283 P.—43 which it was to become operative; and it is evident from an analysis of the present situation that an injustice would be done if a retrospective effect were given its provisions, for the following reasons: At the time the appeal was taken, the law afforded the appellant the option of appealing on questions of law or fact or both. Code Civ. Proc. § 974. He elected to and did appeal on questions of law and fact, and, having done so, was entitled as a matter of right to a trial de novo in the superior court (Code Civ. Proc. § 976); whereas under the provisions governing appeals from municipal courts an appeal may be taken only on questions of law (Code Civ. Proc. § 983), and, as stated, must be based upon a bill of exceptions settled pursuant to the provisions of sections 649, 650, and 651, or on a transcript certified as provided in section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 988a and 988b); and, if a new trial be granted, which may be ordered only for error, the action is tried anew in the court of original jurisdiction and not in the superior court (Code Civ. Proc. § 988h). Moreover, from the record before us it would appear that in the present case the statutory time to prepare a bill of exceptions expired before the new Code section became operative. It will be seen, therefore, that, unless the provisions of the new Code section be given a prospective operation, the appealing defendant will not only be deprived of a trial de novo in the superior court to which he was entitled as a matter of right under the law as it stood at the time of the entry of judgment and the service and filing of notice of appeal, but will be deprived of any appeal whatever because of the absence of a record which he had no opportunity to prepare.

A similar situation arose some years ago when the Legislature shortened the time for taking appeals from judgments in the superior court from one year to six months. In dealing with the question involved, the Supreme Court said: "It is quite obvious that a great hardship is likely to result if a retroactive effect is given to this statute. One may be presumed to know the laws of the land, but the very instant this amendment took effect, if it be retroactive, the right of appeal was cut off at once. No time whatever was given to appeal in those cases in which judgments had been entered six months or more previously. Unless it is absolutely necessary, we should not impute such an intention to the Legislature. In view of the construction which has almost invariably been given to statutes of this character, I feel sure that the Legislature intended that its operation should be limited to judgments thereafter entered." Accordingly, it was held that the new law should be given prospective operation and the sufficiency of appeal determined by the law in force at the time the judgment was entered. Pignaz v. Burnett, supra.

[6] It is our conclusion, therefore, that for the reasons stated section 982a of the Code of Civil Procedure is not retroactive in its effect, and that consequently the respondent court's action in denying the motion to dismiss the appeal was proper. It follows that the writ prayed for herein should be denied, and it is so ordered.

102 Cal. App. 536

MORRISON v. SYCAMORE CANYON GRAVEL CO. (Civ. 3962.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 14, 1929.

1. Contracts ⇨147(2)—Intent of parties to contract must be determined from terms thereof.

In construing a contract, the intent of the parties must be determined from the terms of the agreement.

2. Contracts ⇨221(3)—Subcontract for hauling materials which permitted contractor to delay payments to subcontractor until after contractor's receipt of money held not to make performance of main contract by other contracting party condition precedent to contractor's liability to subcontractor.

Agreement between contractor and subcontractor for latter's furnishing truck for hauling materials at specified rate, under main contract for furnishing materials for work on road, and providing further that contractor should not be compelled to pay subcontractor for hauling charges except on contractor's receipt of money for materials hauled in preceding month, held not to make contractor's performance under subcontract contingent on other party's fulfillment of main contract, so as to relieve contractor when provision of main contract for hauling of materials was canceled.

3. Contracts ⇨322(3)—Evidence in action by subcontractor for breach supported finding that contractor repudiated subcontract.

In action against contractor by subcontractor for damages for breach of contract for employment of plaintiff to haul gravel used in highway construction, in which defense was that the main contract had been canceled with reference to hauling of materials, evidence held sufficient to support finding that defendant repudiated subcontract.

4. Contracts ⇨221(3)—Clause in subcontract authorizing contractor's delay in payment for hauling materials until after contractor received payment held no defense to subcontractor's action for damages for breach.

Clause in subcontract for hauling of materials for highway construction, authorizing delay in payment of subcontractor for hauling until 24 hours after contractor had received payment for hauling of materials in preceding month, held no defense to action by subcontractor against contractor for damages for breach of contract, since method or conditions affecting payments under contract were immaterial.

5. Contracts ⇨221(3)—Payment for services may be conditioned upon receipt of special fund or made payable from designated source.

By agreement, payment for services may be made conditional upon receipt of special fund or made payable from a designated source.

6. Contracts ⇨313(1)—Contractor's repudiation of contract employing subcontractor prevented contractor's resort to condition delaying time for payment of subcontractor as defense in action for damages (Civ. Code, § 1511).

Contractor's repudiation of subcontract for employment of another to haul materials for construction of highway prevented contractor from subsequently relying on condition of subcontract, delaying time for payment of subcontractor until contractor should be put in funds, as excuse for escaping liability, and such condition furnished no defense to action for damages for breach of contract, since, under Civ. Code, § 1511, party to contract cannot take advantage of his own act or omission to escape liability.

7. Contracts ⇨313(1)—One absolutely repudiating contract cannot escape liability by reliance on conditions delaying time or designating source for payment of obligation.

Absolute repudiation of contract by one of contracting parties precludes him from subsequently resorting to a condition delaying the time or designating the source from which he expects to procure the funds with which to meet his obligation, as an excuse for escaping liability.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry B. Archbald, Judge.

Action by J. V. Morrison against the Sycamore Canyon Gravel Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. A. Lewis and Thomas A. Wood, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Thomas L. Clay, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

R. L. THOMPSON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for damages for the breach of a contract of employment to haul gravel to be used for the purpose of highway construction.

On June 23, 1925, the respective parties executed a written contract of employment providing in part: "Whereas first party (Sycamore Canyon Gravel Co.) has secured the contract to furnish certain materials to Kuhn Bros. for work on the Whittier Boulevard * * * and is desirous of obtaining the assistance of second party (Morrison) in hauling the same * * * it is agreed that second party shall furnish the trucks * * * hauling continuously such materials as may be required by first party from the beginning of the work on said job until the completion thereof, and first party agrees to pay second party therefor the sum of $1.15 per five sack * * * batch, subject to the conditions hereinafter contained. * * * First party shall not be compelled to pay second party for such hauling charges until twenty-four hours after first party shall have received the money from said Kuhn Bros. for the hauling of the materials in such preceding month, and that payment by first party to second party is contingent upon the receipt thereof of the money for such materials so hauled. * * *

Pursuant to this contract, the plaintiff purchased and procured the necessary trucks and prepared to do the hauling. On June 30, 1925, the defendant sent plaintiff the following notice: "We regret very much to have to inform you that Kuhn Bros. have cancelled their contract with us calling for the delivery of material on Whittier Blvd. We entered into our contract with you in good faith and trust you may see it in that light. We would ask that the first time you are by Whittier Blvd. that you would stop and talk to Mr. Walker Kuhn, so that he may more fully explain the matter to you. It is simply a case over which we have no control. We are still selling them the material at our El Monte bunkers, but Kuhn Bros. are buying enough additional trucks to do their own hauling. We wish to thank you for the trouble that you have been to in looking up this job, and trust that this will not inconvenience you to any great extent."

Subsequently the plaintiff did interview Walker Kuhn as requested, who informed him they had decided to haul their own material, but would hire him at 90 cents per batch in lieu of the contract price therefor. This modification of the contract was refused by the plaintiff. The plaintiff regarded the contract as renounced by the defendant, and filed this complaint for damages on July 24, 1925. The complaint contained two counts. The last one, however, was abandoned and is therefore not involved in this appeal.

Upon trial, the court rendered judgment for plaintiff for the sum of $3,942.75 and adopted findings to the effect that the defendant, on June 30, 1925, repudiated and abandoned the contract; that the terms thereof were not subsequently modified; that the plaintiff was at all times ready, willing, and able to perform its covenants; and that he was damaged by its breach in the sum mentioned. The amount of the ascertained damages is not challenged.

[1, 2] In the appellant's brief a single ground of reversal is urged. It is asserted that the contract of employment is conditional upon the fulfillment of another agreement with defendant on the part of Kuhn Bros. authorizing the defendant to haul the materials for the highway construction, and that this contract was subsequently canceled by Kuhn Bros., so far as hauling the material is concerned, thus releasing the defendant from its obligation to plaintiff. In support of this contention, the defendant relies upon the case of H. Hackfeld & Co. v. Castle, 186 Cal. 53, 198 P. 1041.

There is no merit in this contention. The contract is definite and certain regarding the employment, the material to be hauled, and the amount of compensation for service. The only condition mentioned relates to deferred payments from month to month on account of a possible delay in receiving defendant's money from Kuhn Bros. A total failure to pay, on the part of Kuhn Bros. is not contemplated. In construing a contract, the intent of the parties must be determined from the terms of the agreement. In considering the present agreement as a whole, it seems quite evident the defendant himself fully expected to provide for the hauling of the material. There was no suggestion that any one else might undertake to do so. But it was foreseen that Kuhn Bros. might delay their payments to the defendant for about a month. And so the contract reserved the privilege of delaying the payments to plaintiff, "24 hours after the first party shall have received the money from said Kuhn Bros. for the hauling of the materials in such preceding month." This language may not be said to create a condition precedent which will authorize the termination of the contract.

[3-5] There is ample evidence to support the findings that the defendant repudiated the contract. The question of deferred payments was not mentioned or involved in the cancellation of the contract of employment. This is not a suit for compensation of services. The clause authorizing the delay in the payments for hauling is therefore no defense. This is an action for damages for the breach of the contract. The method or conditions affecting the payments under the terms of the contract are immaterial in this action for damages. It is true that by agreement the payment for services may be made conditional upon receipt of a special fund or from a designated source. 6 Cal. Jur. 452, § 269; 6 R. C. L. 944, § 325; 13 C. J. 630, §§ 698-703; Lynch v. Keystone Const. Mining Co., 163 Cal. 690, 126 P. 968.

[6, 7] In the present case the provision relied upon is not a condition precedent, but is merely a proviso for deferred payments, and confers no option to cancel the contract for failure of the fund. The absolute repudiation of a contract by one of the parties thereto precludes him from subsequently resorting to a condition delaying the time or designating the source from which he expects to procure the funds with which to meet his obligation, merely as an excuse for escaping his liability. Such condition will furnish no defense to a suit for damages for the breach of a contract. A party to a contract may not take advantage of his own act or omission to escape liability. Section 1511, Civ. Code; 13 Cal. Jur. 647, § 721; 6 Cal. Jur. 438, § 261; Ross v. Tabor, 53 Cal. App. 605,

612, 200 P. 971. In 6 Ruling Case Law, 946, § 326, it is said: "An absolute repudiation of his part of a contract by one of the parties thereto prior to the time fixed by the contract for performance * * * will entitle such other party to an action for damages as for a breach of the contract."

The foregoing rule is not modified by the case of H. Hackfeld & Co. v. Castle, supra, relied upon by appellant. In that case the plaintiff contracted to sell defendant an output of honey for a specified season, to be shipped from Honolulu by way of Tehuantepec to Hamburg, "or at our [buyers'] option, via Panama Canal, in case the Tehuantepec route is discontinued." The last-mentioned route was discontinued. It was held that the contract was thereby terminated unless the buyer saw fit to exercise his option to permit the honey to be shipped by way of the Panama Canal. There was no breach of contract in that case.

In the present case, if the contract had been conditioned upon Kuhn Bros. exercising an option to haul the material themselves and had subsequently decided to do so, that would have terminated the contract with the plaintiff. No such condition, however, existed. The Kuhn Bros. fulfilled their agreement to purchase the material from the defendant, and it was subsequently hauled and delivered. The evidence indicates that the motive for repudiating the contract with the plaintiff for hauling the material was an expectation on the part of Kuhn Bros. or the defendant to procure the hauling for less than the contract price.

The judgment is affirmed.

BENCE v. TEDDY'S TAXI et al. (Civ. 3832.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 12, 1929.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 9, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ¶832(1) — Appellate court's opinion, reversing judgment for plaintiff because of undisputed evidence of his lack of due caution, held not to justify rehearing because not stating that his contributory negligence was proximate cause of injury.

Statement in appellate court's opinion that judgment for plaintiff must be reversed because undisputed evidence of his lack of due caution precludes recovery warranted conclusion that court invoked doctrine of contributory negligence, which is based on assumption that plaintiff's negligence contributed to his injuries, thereby precluding rehearing for failure to state that plaintiff's negligence was proximate cause of injury.

2. Negligence ¶136(32)—Application of last clear chance doctrine may be question for jury.

Application of the last clear chance doctrine may properly be a question for submission to, and determination by, the jury.

3. Appeal and error ¶173(13)—Effect of last clear chance doctrine, not presented to jury by instructions or otherwise, cannot be considered on appeal.

Appellate court cannot consider effect of last clear chance doctrine, where issue was not presented to jury by instructions or otherwise, and there is nothing in record indicating that jury considered it in rendering verdict.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Petition for rehearing. Petition denied.

For original opinion, see 282 P. 392.

Irving D. Gibson, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Fred J. Harris and M. F. Shelley, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. [1] Upon a petition for rehearing, two points are insisted upon: First, that the opinion which reversed the judgment for plaintiff upon the ground that he was guilty of contributory negligence fails to state that his negligence was the proximate cause of the injuries which he sustained; second, that, in spite of the contributory negligence of plaintiff, the judgment should, nevertheless, be sustained on the doctrine of the "last clear chance." The first point is without merit. After reviewing the evidence, the opinion clearly states that the failure of the plaintiff to look in the direction from which he should have anticipated the approach of vehicles, before attempting to cross the street, constituted contributory negligence. It was then said it was therefore necessary to reverse the judgment because "the undisputed evidence showing a lack of due caution on the part of plaintiff precludes his right of recovery." This conclusion is ample upon which to assume the appellate court was invoking the doctrine of contributory negligence which is necessarily based upon the assumption that the negligent acts or omissions on the part of the plaintiff in fact contributed to the cause of his injuries. Upon a careful review of the evidence, we are unable to reach any other conclusion.

[2, 3] It is true that the application of the doctrine of the last clear chance to avoid the accident may properly be a question to be submitted to, and determined by, the jury. 19 Cal. Jur. 653, § 80; also page 733, § 139. Although a construction of the evidence in the present case which would be most favorable to the plaintiff would admit of the application of this doctrine of the last clear chance (Darling v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 197 Cal. 702, 242 P. 703; Haber v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 78 Cal. App.

617, 632, 248 P. 741), unfortunately this court is precluded from considering its effect, since the issue was not presented to the jury by instructions or otherwise. There is nothing in the record indicating that the jury, in rendering its verdict, considered the doctrine of the last clear chance. No instruction upon this subject was offered. It therefore becomes necessary to deny the petition for rehearing. It is so ordered.

HUMMEL v. MULLER et al. (Civ. 32.)*

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California. Dec. 10, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 6, 1930.

1. Partnership $\S$ 64—Contention that plaintiff suing under firm name failed to prove she was doing business as such held without merit, where stipulations and evidence showed contrary.

Contention that plaintiff suing under firm name failed to prove she was doing business under that name at times mentioned in complaint held without merit, where it was stipulated at trial that plaintiff was doing business under firm name and had filed certificates and due affidavit of publication, and testimony of manager of plaintiff that he was such and had authority to act for company and make arrangement with defendants in question was not contradicted.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 1074(2)—Denying motion to stay execution pending motion for new trial held not prejudicial, where no showing was made in support thereof or bond furnished.

Denying motion for stay of execution pending hearing of motion for new trial in action for labor and materials furnished held not prejudicial, where no showing of any kind in support of motion was made and no bond was furnished and same purpose was accomplished by filing stay bond on appeal.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 891—Statutory provisions for producing additional evidence on appeal apply only where appellate court can make contrary findings.

Statutory provisions for producing additional evidence in courts of appeal apply only to cases where appellate court could appropriately make findings of fact contrary to or in addition to those made by trial court.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 891—Application for leave to produce additional evidence on appeal, where materiality was not shown nor diligence in producing it at trial, was denied (Rule 38, Supreme and District Courts of Appeal).

Application for leave to produce additional evidence on appeal by defendant in action for labor and materials furnished was denied, where there was no showing whatever why certain matters sought to be produced were not proved in trial court as required by Rule 38 governing Supreme and District Courts of Appeal, and that other evidence if produced would have any effect whatever on questions involved.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; H. G. Ames, Judge.

Action by Emma Hummel, doing business under the firm name and style of the Placentia Welding Company, against A. R. Muller, doing business under the firm name and style of the A. R. Muller Tool Company, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Will H. Winston, of Long Beach, for appellants.

Arthur E. Koepsel, of Orange, and John T. Houser, of Long Beach, for respondent.

BARNARD, J. Under an arrangement made by their respective managers, the plaintiff operated a welding shop in a machine shop run by defendants at Huntington Beach, Cal. The arrangement was never reduced to writing, but the defendants were to deduct a percentage from the bills for work done by the welding company, and pay the balance to the plaintiff. After some months of operation, plaintiff sued defendants for the value of labor and materials done and furnished. Judgment was for the plaintiff, and defendants have appealed.

[1] Appellants first contend that the respondent failed to prove that she was doing business as the Placentia Welding Company at the times mentioned in the complaint. They argue that two parties, other than the plaintiff, were the real copartners in the Placentia Welding Company, at the time involved, basing this claim upon statements set forth in an affidavit filed in support of a motion for a new trial. The contention is utterly without merit. Aside from the impossibility of considering such evidence, under the circumstances, there was no failure of proof in this regard. It was stipulated at the trial that the respondent "is doing business under this name and has filed a certificate and due affidavit of publication." The record shows no contradiction of the testimony of the manager for respondent that he was such manager; that he had authority to act for the company; that he made the arrangement in question; and that the Placentia Welding Company performed the work and services involved in this action. And during the progress of the trial it was stipulated that an audit of the work done, after deducting all of the credits, left a balance of $7,781.04 due from the defendants to the plaintiff.

It was further agreed by the parties that the above stipulation did not take into consideration whether defendants were entitled to an additional 5 per cent., as claimed, or whether, under the agreement, it was incumbent upon plaintiff to wait for her money until the same had been collected by the defendants from the customers. The court proceeded to hear evidence upon these two questions, and resolved them both in favor of plaintiff.

Appellants urge that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings of the court upon these two points. In effect they argue that the preponderance of the evidence is the other way. But the manager of the plaintiff company testified positively that no additional 5 per cent. was agreed upon, and that the agreement was that the amount of the bills should be paid on the first of each month. Defendant A. R. Muller testified that on one occasion he used $5,000 of a larger sum borrowed from the bank to pay a portion of respondent's account, although corresponding bills had not then been collected from the customers. The findings are amply sustained by the evidence, and the matters called to our attention by appellants create, at best, no more than a conflict in the evidence.

[2] Appellants have included in their notice of appeal a statement that they further appeal from an order of the court denying a motion for a stay of execution pending the hearing of a motion for a new trial. Assuming that this was an appealable order, no showing of any kind in support of the motion appears to have been made in the trial court, and none is made here. Although mention of a bond is made in an order shortening the time for hearing of the motion, no bond of any kind appears in the record, and even the one so mentioned is not for double the amount of the judgment. Nothing appears, either at the hearing or since, to show any reason why the motion should have been granted, and no harm or prejudice is shown. While the record itself is silent on the point, appellants' brief indicates the purpose was accomplished by filing a stay bond on appeal.

[3, 4] An application was filed for leave to produce additional evidence, the hearing on which was continued until the time for presenting the cause on its merits. Two matters of evidence are sought to be produced here. As to the first one, it is contended that it was shown at the trial, by uncontradicted evidence, that one particular item should not have been included in the account between these parties. And we are asked to take the testimony of the auditor, whose audit was used at the trial, that this item is in fact included in the sum stipulated, except for the questions left to the decision of the court, to be due to the plaintiff. Not only was the correctness of the auditor's statement of the work done and the amount due fully covered by stipulation of the parties, but no showing whatever is here made as to why the facts sought to be produced here were not proved in the trial court. Rule 38, Rules, Supreme and District Courts of Appeal. We are also asked to order to be produced here a bond for release of attachment said to have been filed with the sheriff of Orange county. Nothing appears in the record to show how this, if produced, could have any effect whatever on any question involved in this appeal.

The provision for taking additional evidence in courts of appeal applies only to cases in which it would be appropriate for such court to make findings of fact contrary to, or in addition to, those made by the trial court. No such case is presented by the record here. The findings of the trial court are fully sustained by the evidence, and no good reason for adding to or changing them is shown.

The application for leave to produce additional evidence is denied, and the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles E. Haas, Judge.

Actions by Florence Ritzman and Hannah Ritzman against James E. Mills. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lon A. Brooks, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. The above-named actions are brought by two sisters on account of personal injuries sustained by them from an automobile driven by the defendant while the plaintiffs were crossing a certain street in the city of Pasadena. The actions were consolidated and tried together, submitted to the jury upon the same testimony, and a verdict was returned in each case in the sum of $5,000. The two cases are presented to us upon one transcript, and will be considered as one. From the judgments entered upon the verdicts, the defendant appeals in each case.

The record shows that the plaintiffs were both injured as they were crossing Pasadena avenue, on April 5, 1926; that the injuries were inflicted by an automobile owned and operated by the defendant. The jury found that the injuries were inflicted by reason of the negligent operation of the automobile, at said time and place, by the defendant.

The defendant's motion for a new trial being denied, the defendant appeals, and presents for our consideration three questions: Error of the court in instructions to the jury; that the damages awarded were and are excessive; and that the court erred in denying the defendant's motions for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. These are the only grounds argued by the appellant, and will be the only ones considered by the court. No question is raised as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict.

[1, 2] Departing from the order of the argument presented in the briefs, we will consider the question of excessive damages first. A statement of what the record exhibits we consider a complete answer. The transcript shows that Florence Ritzman suffered such injuries that she was required to remain in St. Vincent's hospital 10 weeks; that there was a wound on the right side of her skull with sutures in it; a large swelling on the right side of the skull with a large bloodclot; right eye swollen practically shut; bruises all over her body; that the fracture in the skull extended from four to five inches on the right side; that she suffered from concussion of the brain and hemorrhages within the skull cavity; that at the time of the trial she was in a normal mental condition, but not able to work as had previously been the case; that she was a woman 26 years of age; that by reason of the injuries she had been subjected to the following expenses: Paid a hospital bill in the sum of $631.85, nurses' bill $332, ambulance $5, damage to clothing $40, damage to hat $10, damage to glasses $13, fountain pen $5, lost in salary $1,542.59, still indebted for doctors' bills in the sum of $400, making a total sum of $2,-

974.44 special damages. This sum, deducted from the $5,000 awarded by the jury, allows but $2,025.56 for the personal injuries stated above. The plaintiff Hannah Ritzman had many bruises on her body, the particulars of which we need not state: two broken ribs, the left shoulder broken, some stiffness left in the shoulder, rendered somewhat lame in walking. Prior to the injury this plaintiff also was employed, receiving a salary of $175 per month. This plaintiff was confined to the hospital 81 days; paid hospital bills in the sum of $465.55, doctors' bills $100, nurses' bills $356, ambulance $5, damage to clothing, etc., $97.50; lost nine months' salary, amounting to the sum of $1,692, doctor bill still owing $600—aggregating special damages in the sum of $3,196. This, subtracted from the $5,000 awarded by the jury, left for personal injuries the sum of $1,804.

Neither argument nor citation of authorities is necessary to show that the damages awarded were not excessive. If there is any valid complaint in this particular, it belongs to the plaintiffs and not to the defendant.

The main contention of the appellant is that a new trial should be granted by reason of a certain instruction given to the jury. That instruction reads as follows: "You are instructed that there are two cases being tried together, but you should consider the evidence as applying to each case separately, and render a separate verdict in each of said cases, according to the evidence and the law that the court gives you and in view of the fact that two cases are being tried together you should not consider whether the judgment is large or small in either case, but if you find for the plaintiffs, and each of them, you should bring in a verdict in each particular case for a sum not greater than the amount prayed for in the complaints respectively. In the complaint entitled Hannah Ritzman against James E. Mills, the amount prayed for is $12,119; in the complaint entitled Florence Ritzman against James E. Mills the amount prayed for is $11,650. You are to bring in a verdict for the amount in each case that will reasonably and fairly compensate for the injuries received and proven as the proximate result of the accident to the plaintiffs Florence and Hannah, respectively."

[3] It may be admitted that this instruction standing alone does not fully state the law applicable to the case. However, it is fully supplemented by other instructions, as the court very fully and carefully instructed the jury on all phases of the subjects of negligence and contributory negligence. In this particular it is urged by the appellant that the instructions, other than the one referred to, are contradictory of, and conflict with, the instruction which we have set out. This contention, however, is not borne out by an examination of the instructions. All the other instructions contained in the record given by the court are simply supplemental to the instruction which we have set out, and cover every phase of the subject of negligence. Our attention has not been called to a single instruction which conflicts, or is contradictory, with the quoted instruction. In addition to instructing the jury correctly on the question of damages and the burden of proof resting upon the plaintiffs, and also that, if the plaintiffs were guilty of any contributory negligence whatsoever proximately leading to their injuries, no recovery could be had, the court in one of its instructions specifically told the jury that they were not to infer from any instruction given by the court that the court was intimating that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover damages; that the jury must find that the injuries were caused by the negligence of the defendant, without any contributory negligence whatsoever on the part of the plaintiffs, and that this applied to both cases.

[4] The main contention of the appellant that reversible error appears from the instruction which we have quoted, and that it affirmatively appears therefrom that the appellant has suffered prejudice is by reason of the fact that the amount of damages claimed by the respective plaintiffs was stated to the jury by the court. In other words, that in giving the instructions the court called the attention of the jury to the amount claimed by the respective plaintiffs, and was an intimation that such sum should be awarded. In support of this contention the appellant cites the case of Hollinger v. York Ry. Co., 225 Pa. 419, 74 A. 344, 17 Ann. Cas. 571, where the following instruction was condemned: "The plaintiffs' claim for damages suffered by them, respectively, $20,000 and $1,000, * * * for certain injuries suffered by Nora M. Hollinger as a passenger on one of the York and Dallastown cars of the York Railways Company, from the collision of two cars on said railway on August 18, 1907, near Dallastown through the negligence of the railway company." The jury in that case returned a verdict of $3,500 in favor of Nora M. Hollinger and $500 in favor of her guardian Frederick F. Snyder, the other plaintiff. That case refers to a former case of Reese v. Hershey, 163 Pa. 253, 29 A. 907, 43 Am. St. Rep. 795, where it was held to be exceedingly bad practice to place before the jury the averment as to damages, on the theory that it tends to get figures and amounts into the jury's mind without evidence. What other instructions were given in that case does not appear from the opinion of the court or the facts stated preceding the opinion.

The case of McIntyre v. Quaker City Cab Co., 283 Pa. 395, 129 A. 112, is also cited as supporting the appellant's contention. There, the instruction under consideration reads: "I think you understand that I took the figure that was given as an example. You will determine * * * what * * * he earned. * * * Any loss of those earnings he is entitled to recover." This is all of the instruction as appears in the record. In that case it was held that the reference was not prejudicial, by reason of the fact that the figures quoted by the court had been testified to by some of the witnesses. The appellant also cites the case of Illinois Ry. Co. v. Becker, 119 Ill. App. 221, as sustaining the contention that the giving of the instruction which we have quoted constitutes reversible error. However, as appears by an examination of the opinion in that case, the judgment was not reversed on account of the court having referred to the amount of damages claimed in the declaration, as appears by the following language contained in the opinion: "The reference in the fourth instruction, to the amount claimed in the declaration, when taken in connection with the errors in the third and the failure in all three of the series here under consideration, to require on the part of appellee a preponderance of the evidence, was error calculated to mislead the jury. While it is not always error to refer in an instruction to the amount claimed in the declaration, it is always error to do so when the state of the instructions or of any other feature of the record is such that the jury might be misled by such reference." The court then proceeds to say that many cases have been reversed for this error alone, and such reference in instructions has been "roundly" condemned in many more, citing a number of decisions of the appellate court of the state of Illinois. In the case at bar the instructions show that the jury was specifically and clearly instructed that no verdict could be had unless the plaintiffs established their cases by a preponderance of the evidence, and were also shown to be absolutely free from any contributory negligence.

In the case of Muren Coal & Ice Co. v. Howell, 204 Ill. 515, 68 N. E. 456, 458, the court instructed the jury with reference to the amount of damages claimed, in the following language: "The jury may give such damages as they may deem a fair and just compensation with reference to the pecuniary injuries resulting from such death to the widow and next of kin of such deceased person, not to exceed, however, the sum of $5,000." It was held in that case that the mentioning of the sum of $5,000, the limit allowed by statute in such cases, was an intimation to the jury that the court expected it would render a verdict for that amount, and that such an instruction "could not fail to have had an improper influence on the jury, and in a doubtful case like this, the verdict rendered either way, not subject to be disturbed, to tell the jury they must find to the extent of the law, was improper and ought to prejudice the finding."

Just how the instructing of a jury that they can find in favor of the plaintiffs only such sum as will reasonably and fairly compensate the plaintiff, as shown by the testimony, not exceeding the amount claimed in the declaration, amounts to an intimation that the court expects the jury to find that sum, does not clearly appear. We see no logical connection between the conclusion arrived at in the cases referred to and the instructions given by the court there under consideration. It is true that some of the instructions considered in the cases referred to were defective for other reasons, but the statement of the amount claimed in the declaration does not appear to us to be any reason whatever for concluding that the court expected the jury to be guided by the declaration when the jury has been explicitly advised that their verdict must be based solely upon the testimony showing the injuries must preponderate in favor of the plaintiff, and as well, also, that the negligence of the defendant in causing the injuries must be shown by a preponderance of the testimony, and likewise that no plaintiff can recover where his own contributory negligence has proximately caused the injury.

While our own decisions have not expressly passed upon this question, there are a number of cases where the instructions to the jury with regard to the finding of damages conclude with the statement "not exceeding the amount claimed in the complaint," and a number of them stating the amount.

In the case of Hersperger v. Pacific Lumber Co., 4 Cal. App. 460, 88 P. 587, 590, 591, the concluding portion of the instruction attacked read as follows: "Not exceeding in amount the sum claimed in the complaint." In Scally v. W. T. Garrett Co., 11 Cal. App. 138, 104 P. 325, 330, the concluding portion of the instruction attacked read: "Not exceeding the amount claimed in his complaint, as amended, to wit, $15,000." In the case of Storrs v. L. A. Traction Co., 134 Cal. 91, 66 P. 72, the instruction read: "* * * Not exceeding the amount alleged in the complaint." The court, in speaking of damages, said: "The third and fourth elements are, from necessity, left to the sound discretion of the jury; but the damages in all cannot exceed the amount alleged." In Scott v. San Bernardino Valley Co., 152 Cal. 604, 93 P. 677, 681, the concluding portion of the instruction read: "The court instructed the jury that if they found for the plaintiffs, the verdict should be in such * * * damages, not exceeding the sum of $15,000," etc. In the case of White v. Red Mountain Fruit Co., 186 Cal. 335, 199 P. 318, 320, the concluding portion of the instruction we find to be as follows: "And necessary amount of money paid to any nurse or nurses for caring for her said injuries in all not exceeding the amount alleged in the complaint, to wit, $965." It is true that in the California cases it does not appear that the court, in any of them, expressly considered the naming of the amount, to wit, the dollars and cents claimed in the complaint. The practice, however, of instructing the jury, with reference to damages, to conclude an instruction with the words "not exceeding the amount claimed in the complaint," as shown by the few decisions which we have cited, has been general in this state for a long period of time. In most cases the complaint is read to the jury, and in this particular our practice differs from the practice apparently prevailing in the state of Pennsylvania, where the pleadings, called declarations, are not permitted to be read to the jury. In this state, so far as we are advised, the practice is general at the very beginning of the case to read the pleadings and to make an opening statement as to what is claimed by the respective parties.

While we recognize the eminence of the authorities cited by the appellant, the reasoning of the cases where not controlled by statute, upon which the appellant relies, does not appeal to us as being sound. Where the trial court explains to the jury fully the law relative to the testimony to be considered by them in determining the amount of damages to be awarded, and then adds that their judgment shall in no case exceed the amount claimed by the plaintiff, a holding that such statement by the court is the expression of an opinion that the verdict should be for the amount claimed by the plaintiff appears to us to be more in the nature of an assumption than a logical conclusion from the premises laid down. In the case at bar no contention is made that the negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of the injury. All that is urged in this particular is that the instruction of the court affirmatively appears to be prejudicial by reason of naming the damages claimed by the respective plaintiffs. While the respondent calls our attention to the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution relative to errors in instructions and that judgments are not to be reversed for errors, unless, upon a review of the entire case, including the evidence, the appellate court is satisfied that there has been a miscarriage, we do not deem it necessary to rest our decision upon the section of the Constitution which we recognize would apply in this case, but are of the opinion that, without reference to the constitutional provision, no prejudice has resulted to the defendant from the giving of the instruction objected to, and especially is this true when considered in connection with all the instructions given by the court to the jury, particularly explaining how a verdict should be arrived at in damage cases.

[5-8] The assignment of error by reason of the court's denial of the appellant's motion for a new trial requires but little consideration. In the first place, such a motion is not looked upon with favor; in the second place, it is primarily addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court; and, in the third place, it must be shown that diligence was exercised before the trial in obtaining the proffered evidence, and that it could not be discovered by reasonable efforts before the trial. An examination of the uncontradicted affidavits of Sylvester Wilder and Paul Blackwood, submitted by respondents upon hearing of appellant's motion for a new trial, establish clearly that counsel for the appellant knew about the witnesses alleged to be able to give the newly discovered evidence, long before the trial. The affidavits also show the questionable character of the evidence and that the witnesses who were to give the so-called newly discovered evidence were negotiating for compensation for their testimony prior to the trial. The affidavits also show that counsel for the appellant was advised of the whereabouts of the so-called newly discovered witnesses before the trial of the action at a time before counsel for the appellant appeared as an attorney in the case.

With these facts before the trial court, and others which show the questionable character of the so-called newly discovered evidence, and also that the presence of the witnesses might have been secured, if reasonable efforts had been put forth, no basis is laid for our holding that the trial court abused its discretion in denying the appellant's motion for a new trial.

The judgments of the trial court are affirmed.

Clara E. DEACON, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. Daniel A. DEACON, Defendant and Appellant. (Civ. 3689.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 14, 1929.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Charles C. Haines, Judge.

Glen H. Munkelt, of San Diego, for appellant.

Sloane & Sloane, of San Diego, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action, Civil No. 3689, is before us upon appellant's appeal from the interlocutory judgment entered in said action, and also upon respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal.

As stated in appellant's brief, this appeal was primarily for the purpose of keeping undetermined questions open until a decision was rendered, taken by the appellant from the final judgment in said cause, which appears upon the records of this court as Civil No. 3653. Deacon v. Deacon, 281 P. 533. A stipulation was entered by the parties that, if the motion to dismiss the appeal should be denied, the appeal involved herein should be submitted upon the briefs filed in the main appeal, No. 3653.

As the questions involving all the merits presented herein have been determined in said appeal No. 3653, all questions now before the court are moot.

It is therefore ordered that the motion to dismiss the appeal be denied, and, in so far as the appeal involved herein affects the judgment, the judgment is affirmed. And, by reason of what is stated in the opinion filed in the appeal No. 3653, the costs incurred upon this appeal are taxed against the community property belonging to the respective parties.

Action by A. E. Stenzel against Rosina M. Kronick and others. Judgment of dismissal, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John C. Packard, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robert I. Kronick, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

R. L. THOMPSON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment which was entered against the plaintiff upon sustaining a demurrer to the complaint to quiet title.

The complaint alleges only an interest in a particularly described piece of real property by virtue of a general money judgment which, as the law then existed, gave him a statutory lien upon all the real property of the judgment debtor which was situated in the county where the judgment was procured. Section 671, Code Civ. Proc. The usual other allegations of an ordinary suit to quiet title pursuant to section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure are made. The complaint further alleges that a controversy exists between the respective parties to the action regarding the validity of the asserted lien upon the property described as security for the payment of the judgment.

A demurrer was sustained upon the ground that the complaint failed to state a cause of action. The plaintiff was denied the privilege of amending his pleading, and a judgment of dismissal was thereupon entered against him, from which this appeal was perfected.

The appellant contends that under the provisions of section 671 of the Code of Civil Procedure he was given such a vested interest in the real property as authorized the maintenance of a suit to quiet title, and that the complaint stated a cause of action entitling him to declaratory relief pursuant to section 1060 of the same Code.

[1] The plaintiff had a speedy and complete remedy at law for the satisfaction of his valid and binding judgment, by procuring and levying an execution under section 681 of the Code of Civil Procedure and selling this or any other available property. A suit to quiet title under such circumstances would accomplish no more than to affirm the validity of the lien already established by virtue of the provisions of section 671 of the Code of Civil Procedure. A suit to quiet title will not lie in the present case. The judgment does not create an actual interest in the real property upon which it becomes a lien, such as will warrant the maintenance of an action to quiet title. The general lien which is created upon all the real property of the judgment debtor, by the provisions of section 671, supra, is not such a vested interest in a particular piece of real property as authorizes the maintenance of a suit to quiet title. A specific lien attached by decree of a court upon a particular property for the sat-

STENZEL v. KRONICK et al. (Civ. 3965.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 11, 1929.

1. Quieting title § 10(2)—General lien created by virtue of general money judgment was not "vested interest" in particular property, authorizing suit to quiet title (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 671, 681).

General lien created upon real property of judgment debtor by provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 671, by virtue of general money judgment, does not constitute such a "vested interest" in particular piece of real property as authorizes maintenance of a suit to quiet title; there being a speedy and complete remedy at law for satisfaction of judgment by procuring and levying an execution under section 681 and selling any available property.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Vested Interest.]

2. Quieting title § 10(2)—Judgment creditor, in absence of decree specifically attaching lien to particular property, has no interest enabling him to maintain suit to quiet title.

Judgment creditor, in absence of decree specifically attaching lien to particular property and in absence of levying of execution, has no such interest in real property of judgment debtor as will enable him to maintain a suit to quiet title.

3. Action § 6—Judgment creditor was not entitled to declaratory relief by reason of statutory lien of general money judgment, in view of other adequate remedy (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 671, 681, 1060, 1061).

Judgment creditor was not entitled to declaratory relief under Code Civ. Proc. § 1060, by reason of lien created under section 671 by virtue of general money judgment, in that he had a speedy and adequate remedy for satisfaction of judgment under section 681, within provision of section 1061, justifying court in refusing to exercise power in any case where declaration of determination was not necessary or proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon R. Yankwich, Judge.

isfaction of a judgment would suffice for this purpose. But the statutory lien created by the entry of a mere money judgment is too general in its nature to furnish such a claim of title as may constitute the foundation of a suit to quiet title. In 1 Jones on Liens, 8, § 13, it is said: "Even a judgment does not constitute a (specific) lien upon (particular) real estate to be enforced by an execution and levy upon some part or the whole of it." In the case of Bagley v. Ward, 37 Cal. 121, 133, 99 Am. Dec. 256, quoting approvingly from Mr. Justice Kent's Commentaries, the court says: "The lien [created by the money judgment], after all, amounts only to a security against subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers; * * * the judgment creditor gets no estate in the lands." In Huff v. Sweetser, 8 Cal. App. 689, 695, 97 P. 705, it is said: "The lien created by a judgment is not a transfer or conveyance of the property. (Wilcoxson v. Miller, 49 Cal. 193.) It is not a specific lien on the real estate of the judgment debtor, but is merely a general lien, and is subject to all prior liens, either legal or equitable. The lien is not an interest in the real estate of the judgment creditor, he [the judgment creditor] having neither a jus in re nor a jus ad rem, as regards the debtor's property; the lien merely confers the right to levy thereon, to the exclusion of other adverse interests subsequent to the judgment. These principles are laid down and fully supported by cited authorities in Metz v. State Bank of Brownville, 7 Neb. 165."

In the case of French Lumbering Co. v. Theriault, 107 Wis. 627, 83 N. W. 927, 931, 51 L. R. A. 910, 914, 81 Am. St. Rep. 856, the court says: "When the right to a lien upon the property fraudulently conveyed ripens into a lien in fact by an actual seizure of the property under attachment or execution, a court of equity will then lend its aid to free the lien from the cloud upon it created by the fraudulent conveyance."

[2] In the present case no specific lien upon any particular property was decreed. Upon proper pleadings in an action for that purpose the court may render a money judgment and attach a lien upon specific real property to secure the payment thereof. However, that was not done in this case. So far as the pleadings in the present case are concerned, the judgment debtor may have possessed several separate tracts of real property, any one of which would satisfy the judgment. In the absence of a decree specifically attaching the lien to a particular property and in the absence of the levying of an execution, obviously the appellant has no such interest in the real property described as will enable him to maintain a suit to quiet title.

[3] Nor will a suit for declaratory relief necessarily lie under such circumstances.

Section 1061 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "The court may refuse to exercise the power granted by this chapter in any case where its declaration or determination is not necessary or proper at the time under all the circumstances."

Since the appellant has a speedy and adequate remedy for the satisfaction of his judgment by means of levying an execution, upon which proceeding the validity of the lien may be tested if it should then be questioned, the court had a discretion to refuse to accept jurisdiction under section 1060 of the Code of Civil Procedure on the ground that it was unnecessary.

The judgment is affirmed.

HALLER v. HALLER et al. (Civ. 3919.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California. Dec. 5, 1929.

1. Fraudulent conveyances ⚡208—Excluding testimony regarding husband's purchase of property deeded wife and their intention held not error, where parties in action to quiet title stipulated husband was not then defendant creditor's debtor.

Sustaining objection to questions as to source of money with which defendant who conveyed property to wife had purchased it, and as to when property was acquired, and intention of husband and wife, as being incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, held not error, where it was stipulated by parties in action to quiet title that, at time of conveyance of property by defendant husband to plaintiff wife, husband was not indebted to defendant creditor.

2. Fraudulent conveyances ⚡208—Subsequent creditor of grantor to wife could not avail himself of fraudulent conveyance statute, unless grantor was insolvent or contemplated insolvency (Civ. Code, § 3442).

Where there was no allegation in answer of defendant in action to quiet title that, at time of transfer of property by defendant husband to plaintiff wife, grantor was either insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, and at time of conveyance defendant creditor was not then existing creditor of grantor, he could not avail himself of provisions of Civ. Code, § 3442, providing that any transfer of property without valuable consideration by party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency shall be fraudulent and void as to existing creditors.

3. Fraudulent conveyances ⚡269(1)—In absence of allegation and proof by subsequent creditor of fraudulent intent of husband deeding wife property, refusing testimony thereon held not error.

Refusing testimony as to what intent of parties was in making deed from husband to wife held not error, where answer of one subsequently becoming creditor of grantor raised no issue as to fraudulent intent of grantor when he conveyed property to his wife, and fraudulent intent was neither alleged nor proved.

4. Witnesses ⇨190—Declarations of grantor husband and grantee wife regarding intent of deed held inadmissible as privileged communications (Code Civ. Proc. § 1881).

Declarations of grantor husband and grantee wife regarding intent of deed held inadmissible, in action to quiet title, since declarations were privileged communications, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 1881.

5. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨208—Husband's subsequent creditor cannot question validity of husband's deed to wife, executed while free from debt (Civ. Code, § 1040).

One subsequently becoming creditor of husband who conveyed property to wife cannot question validity of deed from husband to wife, where husband at time was free from debt, under Civ. Code, § 1040, providing voluntary transfer is an executed contract, subject to all rules of law concerning contracts in general.

6. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨208—Subsequent creditor of husband conveying property to wife could not dispute presumption property became wife's separate property (Civ. Code, § 164).

One not an existing creditor of grantor at time deed of property to grantor's wife was made could not inquire into fact in action to quiet title by grantee wife against husband and subsequent creditor whether property is still separate or community property, though Civ. Code, § 164, providing that, whenever property is conveyed to married woman by instrument in writing, it is presumed that title is thereby vested in her as separate property, may be controverted by any competent evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Jennie M. Haller against Jacob H. Haller, Paul Stewart, and others. From an adverse judgment, the defendant Stewart appeals. Affirmed.

A. T. Stewart, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Richard A. Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendant Paul Stewart from a judgment entered against him in an action to quiet title.

The undisputed facts are these: The plaintiff, Jennie M. Haller, and Jacob H. Haller were at all times herein mentioned, husband and wife. The property involved was purchased and title taken in the name of Jennie M. Haller and Jacob H. Haller, and is conceded to have been at the time of the purchase community property. Thereafter, and on August 7, 1921, Jacob H. Haller made, executed, and delivered to his wife, Jennie M. Haller, a grant deed, conveying said property to her, which deed was acknowledged on May 6, 1922, and duly recorded on the same date. Said deed contained this clause: "This deed is made for the purpose of making the property herein described the separate property of the grantee herein." Thereafter, and on January 15, 1923, appellant, Paul Stewart, became a creditor of said Jacob H. Haller, and subsequently and at the time this action was commenced, had become a judgment creditor of said Jacob H. Haller in the sum of $1,407.83. Appellant had an execution issued on said judgment and caused the property in question to be levied upon in satisfaction of said judgment.

The present action was instituted to clear the cloud of that execution and judgment from said land, and quiet the title in plaintiff as her separate property.

The case was tried before the court without a jury, and judgment was entered quieting plaintiff's title, from which judgment the defendant Paul Stewart alone prosecutes this appeal.

The following stipulation was entered into at the time of the trial of said action: "It was stipulated that at the time of the transfer of the property, the subject of the above entitled cause, by Jacob H. Haller to Jennie M. Haller, to-wit, the 7th day of August, 1921, and at the date of the recordation of said deed, to-wit, May 6, 1922, that the said Jacob H. Haller was not indebted in any sum of money, or any other obligation of any kind or character, to the said Paul Stewart, and that the said Paul Stewart did not become an existing creditor of the said Jacob H. Haller until subsequent to the transfer of said property, to-wit, until February 15, 1923. It was further stipulated that the defendant, Paul Stewart, is a creditor of Jacob H. Haller upon a judgment upon which the sum of $1,407.83 is due, owing and unpaid, and that said judgment was obtained against said defendant upon an obligation incurred by Jacob H. Haller with the said Paul Stewart subsequent to the transfer of the property mentioned in the deed."

Therefore it is clear from the stipulated facts that the appellant, Paul Stewart, was not an existing creditor of Jacob H. Haller at the time Jacob H. Haller conveyed to his wife, Jennie M. Haller, the real property in question, and did not become a creditor until one year and six months after the delivery of said deed.

The bill of exceptions shows the following: "On cross examination of the said Jennie M. Haller, to the question as to what was the source of the money with which her husband had himself purchased the property set forth in said deed, objection by counsel for plaintiff that the same was incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, was sustained by the court, after counsel for defendant Paul Stewart had stated that he proposed to prove that the property was in fact community property and that said defendant was a creditor of J. H. Haller. * * * To the further question of said defendant's counsel as to when the property covered by said deed was acquired by J. H. Haller the same objection was made followed by the same ruling. To the further question by said defendant's counsel as to what was the intention of herself and her husband and what their arrangement as to this property so deeded to her, there was the same objection interposed and followed by the same ruling of the court. * * * The defendant, Jacob H. Haller, called as a witness on behalf of defendant Paul Stewart, testified that he was the husband of the plaintiff and was familiar with the deed introduced in evidence. * * * To both the questions as to the time he acquired the property in question and what was the source of the funds with which he purchased it, counsel for plaintiff objected on the ground that each of such questions was incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial and the court sustained such objections, and the court further stated that no evidence would be permitted unless it was first shown that defendant Stewart was an existing creditor of the husband of the plaintiff at the time of the execution of the deed in question. * * * To the further question as to what was the understanding between himself and his said wife as to the rights each should have in the property under this deed, the objection of counsel for plaintiff that the same was incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial was sustained by the court."

[1] Appellant contends that in all these rulings the trial court committed prejudicial error. In view of the foregoing stipulated facts, we think the court's ruling was correct in each instance.

[2] Appellant seems to rely on section 3442 of the Civil Code. This section provides that any transfer of property without a valuable consideration "by a party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, shall be fraudulent, and void as to existing creditors." As appellant was not an existing creditor of Jacob H. Haller at the time of the delivery of the deed in question, and as there is no allegation in appellant's answer that at the time of said transfer the said Jacob H. Haller was either insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, this provision can be of no assistance to appellant in the case at bar. Tainter v. Broderick Land & Investment Co., 177 Cal. 666, 171 P. 679; Bull v. Bray, 89 Cal. 286, 26 P. 873, 13 L. R. A. 576; Atkinson v. Western Development Syndicate, 170 Cal. 506, 150 P. 360.

[3] Furthermore, the answer of appellant raised no issue as to the fraudulent intent of Jacob H. Haller when he conveyed the property to his wife. Fraudulent intent is neither alleged nor proved. For this reason alone the proffered testimony as to what the intent of the parties was in making the deed was properly rejected.

If the conveyance was made by Jacob H. Haller to his wife with intent to defraud creditors, it is void as against those creditors, but the intent is a question of fact, and must be alleged and proved. Careaga v. Moore, 70 Cal. App. 620, 234 P. 121; Emmons v. Barton, 109 Cal. 662, 42 P. 303.

[4] The questions propounded to Mrs. Haller and to Jacob H. Haller regarding the intent and purpose in making the deed in question, were also inadmissible, for the reason that such declarations were privileged communications. Section 1881, Code Civ. Proc.

In Emmons v. Barton, supra, it is said: "The declarations of the husband to the wife at the time of the conveyance to her of certain property, as to his purpose in making it, are privileged, and it is error to compel the wife to testify thereto."

Appellant also states in his brief as follows: "There appears, therefore, to be really but the two main questions before the court upon this appeal: (1) Was the deed, reciting a consideration of $10.00, and the stipulation of respondent that no money was in fact passed as consideration therefor, a void deed? (2) If the deed was valid, was the presumption raised by it, that the property thereby became the separate property of the wife, as grantee, a rebuttable or a conclusive presumption?"

Section 1040 of the Civil Code provides: "A voluntary transfer is an executed contract, subject to all rules of law concerning contracts in general; except that a consideration is not necessary to its validity." See Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 17 P. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189; Treat v. Treat, 170 Cal. 329, 150 P. 53, 57; Tillaux v. Tillaux, 115 Cal. 663, 47 P. 691.

[5] The proof that there was no valuable consideration would not affect the validity of the deed as a conveyance. Jacob H. Haller was free from debt and had a perfect right to give his property to his wife. Under such circumstances, his deed of gift was perfectly valid. Appellant was not at that time an existing creditor of the said Jacob H. Haller, and cannot be heard to question the validity of the deed.

Section 164 of the Civil Code provides in part that, "whenever any property is conveyed to a married woman by an instrument in writing, the presumption is that the title is thereby vested in her as her separate property."

[6] That this is a disputable presumption there can be no doubt, and the same may be controverted by any competent evidence tending to overcome it (Killian v. Killian, 10 Cal. App. 312, 101 P. 806); but, as we have already repeatedly stated, the appellant was not an existing creditor at the time the deed was made and has not by his pleadings shown himself entitled to inquire into the fact whether the property is still separate or community property.

Further discussion seems entirely unnecessary. We find no merit in the appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

GULLEY v. TRADERS' OIL CORPORATION.
(Civ. 7100.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 16, 1929.

1. Landlord and tenant §169(8)—Evidence supported conclusion that one traveling on road on landlord's premises to visit tenant was "invitee" and not "licensee."

Evidence held sufficient to support conclusion of trial court that plaintiff traveling on road across landlord's premises to visit his brother, who was tenant, was not "licensee" on premises but "invitee."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Third Series, Invitee; First, Second, and Third Series, Licensee.]

2. Landlord and tenant §167(8)—Landlord retaining right of way across premises to house of tenant must see that road is kept in safe condition for traveling.

Where landlord retained right of way across property to house of tenant, it was landlord's duty to see that the road was kept in safe condition for traveling.

3. Landlord and tenant §169(8)—Evidence supported conclusion that oil well operator did not use ordinary care in protecting from danger traveling public crossing land to visit tenant.

In action against oil well operator for injury sustained by plaintiff while crossing defendant's land to visit defendant's tenant when cable used in operation of oil well broke from supports, evidence held to justify holding that defendant did not use ordinary care in protecting traveling public, even though accident was caused by the crystallization or fatigue of iron rod which could not have been detected.

4. Landlord and tenant §167(8)—That oil well operator's employee passed over lease to ascertain whether cables were in place did not constitute inspection of supporting rod as regards landlord's liability for injury to invitee.

In action for injuries to invitee crossing land to reach defendant's tenant when cable used in operation of oil well broke away from supports, fact that defendant's employee on day before accident passed over lease to ascertain whether cables were in place held not to show any inspection of "hold-down rod," breaking of which caused injury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; E. W. Owen, Judge.

Action by James Gulley against the Traders' Oil Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Adams, Adams & Binford and John Q. Adams, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. A. Klein, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been suffered by him through the negligence of the defendant. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff, and from said judgment the defendant appeals.

Appellant contends that the findings and judgment are not supported by the evidence in two particulars: First, that at the time and place of the accident that caused the plaintiff's injuries the latter was a licensee, and not an invitee upon the property of the defendant, and therefore the defendant owed him no duty other than to refrain from committing a willful or wanton injury to him. Second, that the equipment, appliances, and methods in use by the defendant in carrying on its business were, at the time of the accident, the same as generally used by others in the same business in that locality; that the cause of the accident was a defective iron rod; that said defect in the rod could not, by any amount of diligence or care on the part of the defendant, have been anticipated, guarded against, or prevented.

[1, 2] Bearing in mind the well-established principle of law that courts of appeal will not interfere where a finding of fact is based upon conflicting evidence, the evidence in support of the findings of the court shows that on January 10, 1926, and for some time prior thereto, the defendant was engaged in the business of operating oil wells in the Kern river oil fields, in Kern county; that it was the owner of a piece of property called "The Rambler Oil Lease," on which there were a number of oil wells; that on the day last mentioned the plaintiff was riding in an automobile on a road on the said "Rambler Oil Lease," and that a cable used in the operation of one of defendant's oil wells broke away from its supports and struck the automobile in which the plaintiff was riding; that as a result thereof the automobile was damaged, and the plaintiff suffered personal injuries, both of which injuries are the basis of this action. The evidence further shows that at the time of the accident the plaintiff was on his way to visit a brother, who, though not employed by the defendant, lived in a house on the "Rambler Oil Lease" as the defendant's tenant; that the road was generally used, and was the most direct road to the brother's house from the direction plaintiff was traveling; that there were other residences near the house in which the brother lived, and tradesmen, mail carriers, and visitors, and, in fact, any one desiring to do so, had used this road for a number of years before the accident; that there were no signs or marks to indicate that it was claimed as a private road. The defendant introduced evidence to the effect that a road to the east of the one upon which the plaintiff was traveling was a public road and also the most direct road to the house occupied by the plaintiff's brother, but such evidence merely raised a conflict, and the court was not bound to accept it.

Without detailing any more of the evidence on this phase of the case, we are satisfied that the authorities bear out the conclusion of the trial court that the plaintiff was not a licensee upon the premises, but an invitee.

In 15 Cal. Jur. 741, it is said: "Where a building is let in flats or offices, the hallways, entrances and stairways not being demised to the tenants, but used in common by all, the landlord owes a duty to those visiting the premises and entering such passageways to visit a tenant, * * * as they are invitees of both landlord and tenant." We think that this language applies to the facts of the case at bar. The plaintiff was on his way to visit his brother, who was a tenant of the defendant, and the inference from the testimony is clear that the defendant retained the right of way to the house of the brother of plaintiff, and it was therefore its duty to see that the road was kept in a safe condition for travel. In Brown v. Pepperdine, 53 Cal. App. 334, 200 P. 36, 37, in passing upon the sufficiency of a complaint dealing with the distinction between a licensee and an invitee, the court used the following language: "We are of the opinion that the plaintiff, while using the common entrance to the basement to transact business with the tenant of the defendants, was an invitee of both the tenant and the defendants, and that, having been injured while he was such an invitee, the complaint states a cause of action against the defendants."

In Grant v. Sunset Telephone, etc., Co., 7 Cal. App. 267, the court, at page 273, 94 P. 368, 370, quoted approvingly from Sweeny v. Old Colony, etc., R. R. Co., 10 Allen (Mass.) 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644: "The general rule or principle applicable to this class of cases is that an owner or occupant is bound to keep his premises in a safe and suitable condition for those who come upon and pass over them, using due care, if he has held out any invitation, allurements, or inducements, either express or implied, by which they have been led to enter thereon. * * * The gist of the liability consists in the fact that the person injured did not act merely for his own convenience and pleasure, but from motives to which no act or sign of the owner or occupant contributed, but that he entered the premises because he was led to believe that they were intended to be used by visitors or passengers, and such use was not only acquiesced in by the owner or person in possession and control of the premises, but that it was in accordance with the intention and design with which the way or place was adapted and prepared or allowed to be so used."

The following language, taken from Phillips v. Library Company of Burlington, 55 N. J. Law, 307, 27 A. 478, is quoted with approval in Grant v. Sunset Telephone, etc., Co., supra: "A person entering premises of right or by invitation, expressed or implied, and using a path which for many years had been used with the acquiescence of the owner, is not precluded from recovering damages for an injury caused by a danger placed by the owner across the path solely on the ground that the owner had provided another way that was safe and might have been used by the plaintiff. In such a case it is a question of fact whether the path taken by the plaintiff has by its accustomed use, with the knowledge of the defendant, become a way which by its use and appearance indicated a way that persons so using the premises were invited to use."

Counsel for appellant has cited authorities in support of his contention that the respondent was a licensee upon the property, and not an invitee. We are satisfied that, under the statement of evidence above set forth, such authorities are not in point, and that the plaintiff was not a licensee, but an invitee upon the premises of the defendant at the time of the accident.

[3, 4] We next consider the claim that the accident was proximately caused by the breaking of the wrought-iron "hold-down rod," which could not, by any amount of diligence or care on the part of the defendant, have been anticipated, guarded against, or prevented, and that the method used by the defendant was the same as is customarily used for similar purposes in the locality of the defendant's lease. On this phase of the case the evidence discloses that, in pumping oil from the wells, the pumps were operated from a central power plant connected with the wells by cables. A number of cables crossed the road over which the plaintiff traveled at the time of the accident. These cables were suspended from posts set in the ground. Attached to each post was an iron rod seven-eighths of an inch in diameter and about three and a half or four feet long. The rod was attached to the top of the post by an eyebolt. The lower end of the rod was a hook, and the cable was suspended in this hook. There was also driven in the ground an iron pipe called a "dead man," which was attached to the rod above described by a cable, and held the rod in place, and thus steadied the cable that runs from the power plant to the well and kept it from coming out of the hook. Shortly before the accident one of these rods broke and allowed the cable to swing up and down across the road, and, when plaintiff reached this place, his car was struck by the cable, and the injuries complained of resulted.

The court received evidence offered by the defendant to show that this method used to hold the cable in place was in general use by oil operators in that locality, and further evidence to show that the breaking of the "hold-down rod" was due to crystallization or fatigue of the metal in the rod, and that it could not have been detected except by the breaking of the rod itself. However, Albert Lucas, a witness for the plaintiff, testified that he had worked in and about the oil fields and in the locality of the "Rambler Oil Lease" for many years, and that at the time of the accident he was working for the defendant; further, he was familiar with the various methods used to suspend the cables in that vicinity, and that there was in general use throughout that district an additional appliance; that in case of the breaking of the "hold-down rod" the cable could not come down; that since said accident that method has been used by the defendant. This witness further testified that it was not unusual for hold-down rods to break. In the light of the evidence of this witness, the court was justified in holding that the defendant did not use ordinary care in protecting the traveling public from the danger attendant upon the method in use by it. It also appears that, even though the accident was caused by the crystallization or fatigue of the hold-down rod itself, and that it could not have been detected, the defendant was in duty bound to use every reasonable precaution to protect invitees upon the premises—such a method for instance, as testified to by the witness Lucas.

In Phillips v. Pickwick Stages, 85 Cal. App. 571, 259 P. 968, 969, the answer alleged "that the accident was unavoidable by reason of the fact that the brake foot pedal suddenly broke while being used to stop said stage at the time and place of the accident, and that the breaking of said brake foot pedal was caused by a latent defect in said brake foot pedal, which was unknown to defendant under constant use and careful inspection." It is further said in the opinion that the question of the latent defect in the brake foot pedal was a question of fact for the jury, and, further: "The auto stage in question, as is universally the custom to-day, was equipped with two sets of brakes; that is, the customary foot brakes operated by means of a foot pedal and a so-called emergency brake operated by means of a hand lever. Upon the breaking of the foot pedal, it was not possible to operate the foot brake, and according to the testimony of the driver of the auto stage, the emergency brake was not adequate at the time to stop the car, due to it not being in 'prime condition.' It is apparent that, if the emergency brake had been in prime condition the auto stage could have been brought to a stop and the accident avoided."

In the instant case, had the defendant used the system to hold up the cable which was testified to by Lucas as being generally used in that locality, it is only reasonable to believe that the accident would not have occurred. So far as the inspection of the various "hold-down rods" are concerned, it appears that on the day previous to the accident employees of the defendant passed over the lease to ascertain if the cables thereon were in place. This, however, could not be held to be an inspection of the "hold-down rod." Indeed, under the theory of appellant, such an inspection would not have revealed any defect in the rod.

No good reason has been shown why the judgment should be disturbed, and it is therefore affirmed.

FARIS v. WILLIAMS et al. (Civ. 6259.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 9, 1929.

Appeal and error $\Rightarrow$ 757(3)—Appellate court would not make exhaustive analysis of transcript to review facts, where appellant set out only skeleton interpretation of testimony.

Appellate court would not make exhaustive analysis of whole transcript in order to determine whether appellant's theory, that careful review of facts would disclose necessity for formal demand, rescission, and suit for damages, whereas these steps were not taken, was tenable, where appellant set out only skeleton interpretation of testimony covering less than 30 pages from transcript of more than 300 pages and no references were made to pages of official record.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action for money had and received by W. A. Faris against J. H. Williams and another. From the judgment, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Leonard Comegys, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Clark J. Milliron and George H. P. Shaw, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, Acting P. J. An action was commenced by the respondent against appellant and the defendant bank, alleging by a common count in the usual form for money had and received that they were indebted to the plaintiff in a sum for which demand had been made, but that no part had been paid. Each of the defendants denied all of said allegations, except as to a form of demand which the defendant bank admitted. By supplemental complaint it was alleged that since the commencement of the action Williams had transferred his interest in certain property, as collateral security. To this pleading the defendant Williams also filed an answer. Much evidence was introduced tending to elucidate asserted contractual relations and negotiations leading to the plaintiff's claim, and all of the issues were strenuously contested. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant Williams, and absolving the bank from liability. Respondent has remitted $10,000 of the amount of the judgment.

Appellant, J. H. Williams, attacks the judgment and findings by a lengthy discussion of the evidence, involving asserted agreements for the disposition of bonds, a purchase of an interest in a realty syndicate, and attempted but ineffective rescission, and urges a reversal upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the judgment as rendered. It is argued throughout the briefs that a careful review of the facts would disclose the necessity for a formal demand, rescission, and a suit for damages, whereas these steps were not taken. However, we have before us only a skeleton interpretation of the testimony by the appellant which, aside from exhibits, covers less than 30 pages, from a transcript of more than 300 pages. The evidence is not attempted to be quoted, nor are references to pages of the official record supplied for our assistance. No rulings of the trial court are assigned as error, yet an exhaustive analysis of the whole transcript is demanded for the purpose of determining whether or not appellant's theory of a more propitious and expedient cause of action against him is tenable.

The case is so similar to that presented in Title Insurance & Trust Co. v. Wilson, 87 Cal. App. 143, 261 P. 767, 768, wherein we called attention to repeated infractions of the rule in such cases, that we need but quote therefrom: "The provision of the Code here involved is intended for the benefit of the adversary party as well as of the appellate court. It is unfair to both, and also to other litigants whose appeals are pending awaiting decision, to cause this court to devote its time to a performance of the labors of investigation and research expressly required of the appellants by law."

The judgment is affirmed.

BARROWS et al. v. WM. SIMPSON CONST. CO. et al. (Civ. 3918.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 30, 1929.

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨80(3)—Provision for cancellation of lease on damage to building did not preclude sublessees from recovering for negligent excavation of adjoining property, where rent was required to be paid without exception.

In sublessees' action for damages to building caused by negligent excavation of adjoining property, contention that sublessee had proved no damages held not supported by fact that original lease provided for cancellation thereof in case of damages to building, since sublease provided for payment of rent without exception or deduction for any cause.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨101—Lease and sublease held not terminated by destruction of part of building by negligent excavation of adjoining property so as to preclude sublessees' recovery of damages (Civ. Code, § 1933).

Lease and sublease held not terminated by destruction of one wall of premises by negligent excavation of adjoining property so as to preclude sublessees from recovering damages therefor, although Civ. Code, § 1933, provides that contract of hire is terminated by destruction of thing hired, since only portion of building was damaged and rendered untenable and balance of building remained tenable.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨80(3)—Excavator could not escape liability for damages caused adjoining property because sublessees could have proceeded against landlord (Civ. Code, §§ 1941, 1942).

In sublessees' action for damages to building caused by negligent excavation of adjoining property, fact that sublessees did not elect to follow remedy against landlord under provisions of Civ. Code, §§ 1941, 1942, held not grounds on which negligent excavator could escape liability.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨80(3)—Limiting sublessees' damages to rent paid for untenable portion of building could not be complained of by party excavating adjoining property (Civ. Code, § 3333).

In sublessees' action against excavator for damages caused to building by negligent excavation of adjoining property, excavator could not complain because court limited damages to actual rent paid by sublessees for portion of building rendered untenable, where sublessees were probably entitled to more damages, since, under Civ. Code, § 3333, which provides for proper measure of damages, rent was only one element thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Action Willard Barrows and R. E. McGinnis, copartners doing business under the fictitious name of the Barrows Motor Car Company, against the Wm. Simpson Construction Company and the Guaranty Building & Loan Association. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

G. R. Dexter and Howard B. Henshey, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Maurice C. Sparling, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendants, the Wm. Simpson Construction Company, a corporation, and Guaranty Building & Loan Association, a corporation, from a judgment entered against them in the sum of $1,120 in an action for damages.

In the month of November, 1923, plaintiffs and respondents herein were occupying a building in Hollywood, Cal., used by them for the display and sale of Chrysler automobiles; that, as found by the trial court, "for some days prior to November 13, 1923, the defendants negligently and without use of ordinary care or skill, and without taking reasonable precautions to sustain the land occupied by the plaintiffs, excavated the land adjoining on the west to the said lands and buildings so occupied by the plaintiffs, and excavated and removed the earth therefrom to a depth in excess of twenty feet, without leaving sufficient support for the land and building so occupied by the plaintiffs, and by reason thereof, and by its own natural weight, a great part of the land so occupied by plaintiffs sank and gave way, and by reason thereof, the walls and foundation of the said building on said land so possessed by plaintiffs were undermined, and by reason thereof, the westerly wall of plaintiffs' said building, and the westerly half of the floor thereof, bulged, buckled and broke, and plaintiffs were thereby deprived of the occupancy and use of the west one-half of said building so possessed by them for a period of four months from November 13, 1923."

Plaintiffs were occupying said land and building under a sublease from Paul G. Hoffman Company and paying $560 per month therefor, and, because of their said loss of the use of the west half of the premises for four months, they claimed damages in the sum of $5,000, and were awarded by the court, sitting without a jury, damages in the said sum of $1,120.

[1] Appellants first contend that no damages were proved. This contention is based upon the following facts: The property in question was leased by the former owner to Paul G. Hoffman Company, who in turn subleased the premises to plaintiffs. After these leases had been made, the property was conveyed to one E. V. Rosenkranz. The original lease to Paul G. Hoffman Company contained a provision that, in the event of certain catastrophes happening to said premises, and in the event said premises, because thereof, were damaged so they could not be repaired within 90 days after the work of reconstruction could reasonably be begun, then, in that event, said Paul G. Hoffman could cancel said lease.

Under this provision of the original lease, appellants argue "that respondents were under no obligation to pay rental during the time the building was unusable, and the rental, if so paid by them, was a voluntary payment, not made under any legal obligation, and not a basis for damages."

We are unable to agree with this contention. In the first place, appellants introduced no evidence whatever that we are able to discover as to the time within which said damage could have been repaired in order to even bring this case within the conditions set forth in the original lease. Furthermore, the respondents were occupying said premises under a sublease from Paul G. Hoffman Company, which said lease was complete and entire within itself, and did not even refer to or mention the original lease, and did not contain any such provisions as referred to by appellants; but, on the contrary, specifically provided that said rental payments of $560 per month were to be paid without exception or deduction for any cause, and that the "strict performance of which shall be precedent to the rights of lessees to remain in possession of said premises or to have this lease continue in effect."

[2] Appellants also contend: "The lease had terminated by the destruction of the premises (Civ. Code, § 1933), and plaintiffs could have vacated the premises and been discharged from the further payment of rent."

Neither the original lease nor the sublease of respondents terminated with destruction of the west one-half of the wall of said building. A lease of land with a building thereon is not terminated by the destruction of or damage to one of the walls of the building, unless so provided by contract or statute. No such provision is contained in either of the leases in question.

Section 1933 of the Civil Code provides: "The hiring of a thing terminates * * * (4) By the destruction of the thing hired." Here the "thing hired" was the land and building thereon, and only a portion of the building was damaged and rendered untenable, and the balance of the building remained tenable; therefore the "thing hired" was not destroyed, and the lease did not terminate by the operation of said statute. Hamer v. Ellis, 40 Cal. App. 57, 180 P. 30.

[3] It is true that respondent might have, in the absence of an expressed contract in the lease relating to repairs, pursued the remedy against the landlord, provided for in sections 1941 and 1942 of the Civil Code, and, if they had done so and the landlord had failed to repair, respondents would have had, against the landlord, either one of two remedies, viz.: (a) Treat the failure to repair as a breach of the lease and vacate the premises; (b) themselves make the repairs at the expense of the landlord, after notice to him, provided they do not entail an expenditure of more than one month's rent. Van Every v. Ogg, 59 Cal. 565;

Grazer v. Flanagan, 35 Cal. App. 724, 170 P. 1076; Priyer v. Young, 62 Cal. App. 405, 216 P. 966; Gately v. Campbell, 124 Cal. 520, 57 P. 567; Ferber v. Greenberg (Cal. App.) 277 P. 534.

However, the respondents did not elect to follow the provisions of sections 1941 and 1942, Civil Code, against the landlord alone or terminate the lease, but elected to keep their lease alive and sue the parties who caused the injury to the building they had leased. This they had a perfect right to do. They were not required to surrender up a valuable lease and move, or discontinue business altogether, to avoid payment of rent, simply because appellants had injured their leased property and rendered a portion thereof untenable. It seems to us that it was no concern of the appellants whether respondents elected to continue paying rent or surrendered the lease. If appellants wrongfully injured respondents' leased property, they are liable in damages and cannot escape the consequences of their negligent act by simply saying that respondents could have surrendered the lease and thereby avoided paying any rent.

If appellants' argument be sound, then they could negligently and wantonly destroy the entire building and then say to respondents: "You can not recover damages from us because you had the right to terminate the lease and move out, which you did not do, therefore we are immune from damages, no matter how valuable your leasehold may have been." This would put a premium upon the wanton and negligent destruction of leased property, and is certainly not the law.

[4] Appellants next complain that the court did not adopt the proper measure of damages. Section 3333 of the Civil Code provides the proper measure of damages in such an action, but the trial court limited the damages to the actual rent paid by respondents for the portion of the building rendered untenable. The rent was only one element going to make up respondents' damage. Respondents undoubtedly held a valuable lease and were probably entitled to more damages, but, if they are satisfied with the trial court's award, certainly appellants are in no position to complain.

Appellants next complain that there was no showing that the defendants failed to use ordinary care. There is likewise no merit in this contention. The court found that the defendants failed to use ordinary care or skill in the work of excavating and also in the shoring up of the building, all of which is amply supported by the evidence.

Neither is there any merit in the contention that there is no evidence to support a judgment against the Guaranty Building & Loan Association. The evidence against this particular defendant is not as strong as it is against the other defendant, but, when all the facts and circumstances in the record are considered, we cannot say that the court was not warranted in rendering a judgment against them also.

Other contentions made by appellants are without merit and need no special discussion.

After a careful review of the entire record, we are satisfied that the appellants have no legal ground for complaint, and that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

RHOADES v. PETROLEUM EXPORT CORPORATION (two cases). (Civ. 7105.) ★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 16, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 14, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 13, 1930.

1. Brokers ⇨52—Under contract showing commissions were contingent on sale, broker's assignee could not recover commission on goods shipped to subagent in absence of actual sale.

Under contract by which one became agent for sale of petroleum products which fixed prices as sale price, and which included commission to agent showing that contract for commissions was contingent on a sale, agent's assignee held not entitled to recover commissions on goods which principal shipped to one whom agent appointed as subagent, where there was no actual sale of goods.

2. Brokers ⇨49(1)—Broker's assignee could recover commission on goods sold and paid for, under contract fixing price including broker's commission.

Under contract by which sale price of petroleum products was fixed, including commission of 5 per cent. to broker, where broker sold goods to another which were paid for, his assignee was entitled to recover commissions from principal therefor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Actions by F. C. Rhoades against the Petroleum Export Corporation. From the judgment in the first action, defendant appeals, and from judgment in the second action, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Black, Hammack & Black and Carey McWilliams, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Thomas T. Robinson and Thomas A. Sanson, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem. These actions were commenced to recover the sum of $6,572.27, alleged to have been earned by the plaintiff's assignor as a commission on the sale of certain petroleum products manufactured by the defendant. The court awarded plaintiff a judgment in the sum of $2,626.50, which was $1,920 commission and interest thereon from 1921. Both parties have appealed from the judgment.

Plaintiff's assignor, Zenon C. Malis, and the defendant, by virtue of a letter written by the latter on May 4, 1921, entered into a contract by the terms of which Malis became the agent of the defendant for the sale of its said products in the Levant. The contract quotes fixed prices per case as the sale price of benzine and kerosene, which included a commission to Malis of 5 per cent.; there is a further provision that, if Malis sold goods for a greater sum than the price quoted, the excess should be divided equally between the parties. There is a further proviso in said contract that "commissions will be payable immediately after payment has been received for each order, or will be paid to you quarterly or semi-annually as you prefer."

[1, 2] By virtue of this contract Malis sold to one Tavernaris, of Famagusta, merchandise, which was paid for in full, and it is alleged in the complaint there became due thereon a commission of $1,920. Thereafter the defendant shipped to Assiha Safar Trad, of Beirut, goods of the value of $51,647.50, upon which there was paid to the defendant the sum of $26,000, and no more, and it is alleged in the complaint there became due thereon a commission of $4,652.27. The facts surrounding the sale to Assiha Safar Trad are as follows: The goods were shipped to Trad, who had been appointed by Malis as his agent for certain designated territory in the Levant, and he paid defendant $26,000 at the time the goods were shipped, and upon the arrival at the point of destination it was claimed by Trad that the articles were not as represented by the defendant, either in quantity or quality, and that they had been damaged in transit. This claim resulted in a controversy between the parties, and a number of investigations were made. One of these was made by the United States consul and resulted in a report adverse to the defendant. There were no further sums paid for these goods. Defendant claims it developed for the first time at the trial that Assiha Safar Trad was the agent of Malis and was simply the dummy who received the goods for Malis, and that Malis having acted in bad faith he is not entitled to recover any commissions whatever. It is clear from the record that at least a month before the shipment defendant knew Trad was the agent of Malis; further, from the defendant's letter of October 7, 1921, that upon payment of $26,000 it was defendant's intention to make the shipment to the Bank of Syria upon the payment to the bank of the balance due on each case of merchandise released as the same was sold, but upon the receipt of a cablegram from Malis to the effect that the shipment could not be handled that way the shipment was made and the goods released without any further payment than the initial payment of $26,000, and the balance due was to have been paid when the goods were sold by Assiha Safar Trad. From this statement it is apparent that the contract for commissions was contingent upon a sale, and, so far as the record discloses, there was no sale made, and therefore plaintiff is not entitled to recover a commission on the so-called Trad sale. In the case of the sale to Tavernaris the goods were sold and the money paid to the defendant, and therefore entitled plaintiff to the judgment rendered by the court.

The judgment is affirmed, without costs to either party.

We concur: KOFORD, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

IN RE DES GRANGES' ESTATE AND GUARDIANSHIP.

APPLING v. DES GRANGES.

(Civ. 36.)

District Court of Appeal. Fourth District. California. Dec. 16, 1929.

1. Insane persons ~~Code~~ 29—Evidence of sanity of absent ward, in proceedings for restoration to capacity, held insufficient to sustain finding that ward was capable of caring for herself and property; "Insane"; "Incompetent" (Code Civ. Proc. § 1766).

Evidence produced by deposition as to sanity of 76 year old ward, who had been in hospital for insane for about 14 years and was not present at trial limited to issue of sanity, held insufficient to sustain finding of capacity of ward to take care of herself and her property, in proceedings for restoration of capacity, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1766, requiring as condition to restoration that person be of sound mind and capable of caring for himself and his property; words "insane" and "incompetent" being not necessarily convertible terms, as person may be incompetent by reason of insanity or for some other cause, as indicated by section 1763, relative to beginning of guardianship proceedings; condition of incompetency being measured by sections 1767 and 1764.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Incompetent; Incompetency; Insane; Insanity.]

2. Appeal and error ~~Code~~ 1011(1)—Trial court's conclusions on substantially conflicting evidence will not be disturbed.

Where there is any substantial conflict in the evidence, the conclusion reached by the trial court after weighing the evidence and considering the inferences that may reasonably be drawn therefrom will not be disturbed.

3. Insane persons ~~Code~~ 29—In proceeding for restoration to capacity, court must require proof of ward's ability to care for his property, and that he is not likely to be imposed upon (Code Civ. Proc. § 1766).

It is the duty of the court to zealously guard the property of a person who has been declared insane or incompetent, and, upon proceeding for restoration to capacity under Code Civ. Proc. § 1766, proof is required, not only of sanity, but of ward's ability to care for his property, and that he is not likely to be deceived or imposed upon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; James L. Allen, Judge.

Proceeding by Alfred A. Appling for legal restoration to capacity of Katherine des Granges, opposed by J. D. des Granges, guardian. From a judgment restoring the ward to capacity, the guardian appeals. Reversed.

Allen & Lyon, of Fullerton, for appellant.

Alfred A. Appling and S. M. Davis, both of Santa Ana, for respondent.

BARNARD, J. Katherine des Granges was declared insane by the county court of Brown county, Wis., on October 12, 1911. Thereafter, in a proceeding in the superior court of Orange county, Cal., the appellant herein was appointed guardian of the person and estate of said Katherine des Granges, and is still acting as such guardian. On July 1, 1926, the county court of Brown county, Wis., entered a judgment and decree declaring Katherine des Granges to be sane. Thereafter the respondent herein, as friend and attorney for said Katherine des Granges, filed a petition alleging that the said Katherine des Granges is now sane and competent, and praying that the court order an investigation into her mental condition, to the end that she be restored to capacity. The cause went to trial upon the issues presented by this petition and an answer thereto. Judgment was entered in favor of the petitioner, and the guardian has appealed.

The court found "that the said Katherine des Granges is now sane and of sound mind and fully capable of caring for herself and managing her property." The only question involved in this appeal is whether or not the evidence sustains this finding. The ward was not present at the hearing, being then in the state of Wisconsin, and all of the evidence introduced by the petitioner was in the form of depositions. The respondent sets forth in his brief, his own summary of the evidence introduced, and relied on as being sufficient to sustain the finding in question, as follows:

"Summarized the Witnesses Testify as Follows:

"1. Dr. A. O. Olmsted—"She is sane."

"2. Dr. R. M. Burdon—"She appeared to be normal. Is sane."

"3. Lorraine Ross, Nurse—"She was exceptionally bright. Is sane."

"4. Dora Brown—"She was sane."

"5. Arthur Brown—"She was well enough to be paroled. She is sane. She is all right."

"6. Jacob Landenklos—"She is all right as near as I can tell."

"7. Emma Luecke—"I think she is sane."

"8. Charles F. Luecke—"She conversed normally. I judged her sane."

"9. Minnie Schoen—"She is sane. I have never seen anything wrong with her. Her memory is good."

"10. L. M. Schoen—"I regard her sane. I never saw anything wrong with the woman."

"11. Harrie des Granges—"She appears to be intelligent. She acted normally."

While the parties testified as stated, it is necessary to consider their testimony in the light of the questions asked of them, and the context. Dr. Olmsted was asked as to whether he had examined the ward and whether he had formed an opinion as to whether she was sane. Also, the following: "Q. State whether or not you and Dr. Burdon did determine her sanity? A. We certified that we believed she was sane." Dr. Burdon was asked as to his examinations of and conversations with the ward, including:

"Q. When Dr. Olmsted and yourself were appointed to examine her, the purpose of your examination was to determine sanity or insanity? A. Yes it was.

"Q. And as a result of the examination of Dr. Olmsted and yourself, you reported a finding of sanity? A. Yes."

Lorraine Ross was asked for a definite statement as to whether she regarded the ward as sane or insane. As a reason for her opinion she testified: "My opinion of her is that she was exceptionally bright because her memory was so good. She could memorize—She was in a room with other people, and she could tell you about the people that came in, their names and things they did, that I knew were done, things like that. * * * Well, she talked about things that happened in her childhood days, and about different things that she had read in papers and that we had read and knew that they were true." Dora Brown was asked if she had formed an opinion as to whether or not the ward was sane. Arthur Brown was asked the same question. Jacob Landenklos testified: "Q. From your acquaintance with her, knowledge of her, examination or observation, you have made an opinion, have you formed an opinion as to whether or not she is sane? A. Whenever I see her she is all right as near as I can tell. I have kept a close watch all the time, as close as I could." Emma Luecke was asked only as to her opinion on the ward's sanity, and the reasons for it. Charles F. Luecke was asked for his opinion on her sanity. He testified: "Q. What were her actions as to whether she was a woman of normal mind or otherwise? A. She behaved herself, acted normal, obeyed orders, and did what little work she had to do.

"Q. How did she converse with you? Did she converse readily and normally? A. She did during all the conversation I had with her."

Minnie Schoen, on being asked her opinion as to her sanity, and the reasons therefor, testified: "She has been with me nine months and I have never seen anything wrong with her. She understands everything about what she reads and her memory is good about years ago. I see nothing wrong with her." Harrie des Granges testified as follows: "Q. From your visit with her back there in September, state whether or not in your opinion that your mother is sane or insane? A. As far as I could see she was sane but I do not feel she was competent to handle business; her memory is very good on things that happened years ago, but not very good on present day things."

[1] While the evidence is sufficient to sustain the findings that the ward is sane, that is, of sound mind, we think it is not sufficient to sustain the other essential finding that she is "fully capable of caring for herself and managing her property." There is a difference between insanity and mental incompetency to handle one's property. "The words, 'insane' and 'incompetent' are not necessarily convertible terms, as a person may be incompetent by reason of insanity or from some other cause." 14 Cal. Jur. 333. "A weak mind may be sound, and a strong mind unsound." 14 Cal. Jur. 335, and cases cited.

This action was brought under section 1766 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This section relates to the legal restoration to capacity of a person whose capacity to act in matters of business has been legally taken away through the procedure provided for by other sections of the same article of this code. Section 1763, providing the manner of beginning such a guardianship proceeding, reads in part: "When it is represented * * * that any person is insane, or from any cause mentally incompetent to manage his property." Section 1764 provides what must be found by the court before a guardian is appointed. The essential thing to be found is that "the person in question is incapable of taking care of himself and managing his property." Sections 1767 and 1764 together provide a test by which the condition of the alleged incompetent is to be measured. In re Cassidy (Cal. App.) 273 P. 69. If, measured by the test, the person in question is found to be incompetent a guardian is appointed, regardless of whether the incompetency is due to insanity or to some other cause. Matter of Coburn, 165 Cal. 202, 131 P. 352. It being necessary only to prove such incompetency to secure the appointment of a guardian, this being in the interest of the person affected and for the preservation of his property, it would be logical that the converse would be true in a proceeding to do away with the guardianship. Not only logic, but the statute dictates this. Section 1766, under which this proceeding is brought, provides also what must be found by the court in order to restore the person to capacity. That is, "that the person is of sound mind, and capable of taking care of himself and his property."

Respondent says in his brief: "The appellant takes the position that it is necessary for the respondent to allege and prove that Katherine des Granges is not only sane but also competent." We agree with appellant in this regard. It is therefore necessary that the sufficiency of the evidence be considered in connection with that portion of the finding holding her capable of caring for herself and her property. The petitioner alleged in his petition that the ward was sane and competent, but offered proof only of sanity. There was no direct or affirmative evidence on the matter of competency. All of the questions asked were on the question of sanity. In fact the record shows the court tried the case on that theory. During the progress of the trial the court said: "The question is whether the woman is sane or insane." "We will adjourn now until two o'clock; get the stuff that pertains to sanity or insanity; if sane she has the right to do what she pleases with her money; the question is whether she is sane or insane; it isn't a question of whether she owes a bill or not."

Upon the conclusion of petitioner's case the appellant moved for a dismissal upon the ground that, irrespective of insanity, there was no proof that the ward was competent. Answering this, the attorney for respondent said, in part: "This court is not going to split hairs to the extent of pleading of this sort when we allege sufficient in our petition and sufficient to have her discharged from the Insane asylum; as to how competent she is is another matter; in the evidence it says she is a smart, old woman; there is nothing in the record, your Honor; no evidence offered to show she was incompetent or insane, and we have the record before the court that she is sane, and that court can't hold people in asylums when they are sane; the Wisconsin courts don't—." This proceeding bears no relation to the question of confinement or release from an insane asylum. Sullivan v. Dunne, 198 Cal. 183, 244 P. 343. When the case was submitted the court said: "I think the only thing we are concerned with is whether or not the woman is sane or insane; it is conclusively shown that J. P. des Granges was appointed guardian of the person and property of Katherine des Granges, an insane person, in 1916; he is still acting in such capacity; from the testimony of these depositions it shows that she was paroled from the Institution some time in June—June 23, 1926—and the Superintendent of the Institution said she would not be paroled unless they thought she was sane.

On top of that we have an order of court finding she was sane and declaring her to be a sane person. I think that the evidence is conclusive if we recognize the order of the court from that State; it shows that it was done upon notice that she has been declared a sane person."

[2, 3] There is no evidence to support the finding of the court as to competency, unless, from the testimony of the witnesses on the question of insanity, an inference may reasonably be drawn that she was capable of taking care of herself and her property. The ward was about 76 years of age, had been in a state hospital for the insane in Wisconsin for about 14 years and was not present at the trial. Viewing the evidence as a whole, under the existing circumstances, we think such an inference cannot be reasonably drawn. The rule is that, where there is any substantial conflict in the evidence, the conclusion reached by the trial court, after weighing the evidence and considering the inferences that may reasonably be drawn therefrom, will not be disturbed. Not only is it true that the inferences referred to cannot reasonably be drawn from the evidence here, but the record discloses that the court proceeded upon the theory that the question of the ward's ability to handle her property was not in issue. It is the duty of the court to zealously guard the property of a person who has been declared to be insane or incompetent (Sullivan v. Dunne, supra), and upon a proceeding to restore such a person to capacity, to require proof, not only of said person's sanity, but also of his ability to take care of his property, and that he is not likely to be deceived or imposed upon by artful or designing persons.

For the reasons given the judgment is reversed.

MARKS, J., deeming himself disqualified, takes no part in the decision of this case.

SLOANE, P. J. I concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice BARNARD. Were it not for the fact that the investigation before the court in the proceeding from which this appeal was taken was obviously confined to the question of the mental sanity of the ward, the sufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment of restoration to capacity to manage her own affairs might be upheld.

The trial court found in favor of capacity, and there were general statements of the witnesses for petitioner as to her general competency. But, as pointed out in the opinion here, the testimony was all directed to the question of sanity, and the statements of the trial judge, as shown in the record, so clearly indicate that the findings were governed by the sole question as to whether the petitioner was sane or insane, that it must be conceded that the further conditions affecting her competency to take care of herself or her property, were not taken into account.

Insanity implies want of capacity, but the mere restoration to sanity, such as justifies a discharge from detention in an asylum, does not determine such a restoration as to terminate the necessity for guardianship.

This is indicated by section 2189 of the Political Code, which provides under the sub-head "Certificate of Discharge" that such certificate of discharge, where no guardian has been appointed, "shall have the same legal force and effect as a judgment of restoration to capacity made under the provisions of section seventeen hundred and sixty-six of the Code of Civil Procedure." See, as bearing on this point, Aldrich v. Barton, 153 Cal. 488, 95 P. 900.

Where such guardian has been appointed there is no method of restoration to capacity provided excepting by the procedure under section 1766, Code of Civil Procedure, and that section distinctly provides for the calling and examination of witnesses on the hearing, and, if it is found that the person is of sound mind, "and capable of taking care of himself and his property, his restoration to capacity must be adjudged, and the guardianship of such person, if such person is not a minor, must cease."

In a case like this, where the person under disability is shown to be 76 years of age and has been for 14 years confined for insanity, the question not only of mental sanity, but that also of capacity to take care of herself and her property should be made a definite issue before the protection of a guardian is withdrawn.

102 Cal. App. 213

DOUD v. JACKSON. (Civ. 3.)

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California. Nov. 27, 1929.

1. Appeal and error ⇨768—Absent brief by respondent in record on appeal, appellate court may decide case on statement of facts contained in appellant's brief.

Where record on appeal from order dissolving attachment consisted of clerk's transcript and appellant's opening brief, but contained no brief in behalf of respondent, appellate court may, under Rule 5 governing appellate courts, decide case on statement of facts contained in appellant's brief.

2. Attachment ⇨8—Implied contract to repay money, where consideration entirely failed, may be contract for direct payment of money and support attachment only where no consideration was received and damages are liquidated.

Implied contract to repay money received under contract, consideration for which had entirely failed, may be considered contract for direct payment of money as basis for attachment proceedings only, where nothing has been received in consideration for amount sought to be recovered, and where damages may be said to be liquidated and definitely ascertainable.

3. Sales ⇨404—Plaintiff suing for breach of contract, having received 63 of 64 rabbits contracted for, there was not entire failure of consideration entitling plaintiff only to damages.

Where plaintiff received 63 of 64 rabbits of designated sex contracted for, though rabbits had not fulfilled breeding obligations called for by contract and failure to do so was not shown to have been caused by any organic disability, there was not an entire failure of consideration, and plaintiff was only entitled to damages.

4. Sales ⇨92—Where defendant, sued for breach of contract, refused to accept plaintiff's offer to return rabbits on conditions specified, there was no rescission.

Where plaintiff suing for breach of contract offered to return rabbits purchased on condition that he be repaid money and compensated in damages, but defendant refused to agree to such settlement, there was no rescission of contract.

5. Cancellation of instruments ⇨1—Contracts ⇨252—Contract may be rescinded by consent and agreement or by notice of rescission and action to place parties in status quo.

Contract may be rescinded by consent and agreement of parties or by serving notice of rescission and action to place parties in status quo.

6. Sales ⇨391(1)—If consideration entirely failed, breach of contract would establish implied contract to refund purchase money.

Breach of contract for sale of rabbits for breeding purposes by failure of seller to perform obligations thereunder, if there was entire failure of consideration, would establish implied contract to refund purchase money.

7. Sales ⇨404—On partial failure of consideration purchaser could affirm contract and sue for damages or give timely notice of rescission and enforce same.

Where there was only partial failure of consideration for contract for sale of rabbits for breeding purposes, purchaser's remedy was either to affirm contract and sue for damages, or give timely notice of rescission and enforce same by proper action, neither of which would imply agreement by seller for direct payment of money.

8. Contracts ⇨274—Mutual rescission on breach of contract involves promise of defaulting party to refund money received.

Mutual rescission on breach of contract involves promise of defaulting party to refund any money he may have received under contract.

9. Attachment ⇨14—That plaintiff suing for breach of contract asked for damages did not affect right to attachment for part of demand based on contract to repay purchase price.

Fact that plaintiff suing for breach of contract, in addition to return of purchase price, demanded damages for expenses incurred, for which admittedly attachment lien would not lie, held not to affect right to attachment for any part of demand which was based on implied contract to repay money advanced.

10. Attachment ⇨105—Affidavit for attachment, including in lump sum stated unliquidated damages, held defective as not stating amount of defendant's indebtedness (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 537, 538).

Affidavit for attachment, alleging defendant was indebted to plaintiff in specified sum, which included implied contract to return purchase price of rabbits and unliquidated damages for expenses incurred, held defective, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 537, 538, requiring affidavit for attachment to state amount of defendant's indebtedness.

11. Appeal and error ⇨843(2)—On affirmance of order dissolving attachment, failure to file undertaking on appeal from order dissolving attachment became immaterial (Code Civ. Proc. § 946).

On appeal from order dissolving attachment, plaintiff's failure to file undertaking on appeal, under Code Civ. Proc. § 946, resulting in lapse of attachment, became immaterial on affirmance of order dissolving attachment.

12. Appeal and error ⇨460(2)—Statute providing appeal does not continue in force attachment unless undertaking be filed applies only to appeal from judgment on merits when attachment is involved (Code Civ. Proc. § 946).

Code Civ. Proc. § 946, providing that appeal does not continue in force attachment unless undertaking be executed applies only to appeal from judgment on merits when attachment is involved.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

Action by W. H. Doud against Robert Jackson. From an order dissolving an attachment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. S. Maloney and Chas. Bagg, both of San Bernardino, for appellant.

Le Roy B. Lorenz, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff, an attaching creditor, from an order of the superior court of San Bernardino county dissolving an attachment. Plaintiff brought suit to recover from defendant the sum of $1,375 damages from breach of a contract entered into between plaintiff and defendant.

The complaint alleges:

That the contract was entered into on the 27th day of June, 1926, under the terms of which plaintiff purchased from defendant, who was engaged in a business known as the Fontana Fur Industries, 64 rabbits, sex does, for breeding purposes, paying therefor the sum of $640. That it was represented to plaintiff that the 64 rabbits were does and were bred and would be "cleared" in about 30 days. That the rabbits delivered included 63 does and one buck. That it turned out that the 63 does were not bred, and they had not "cleared" to date of filing suit, November 22, 1926. That by the terms of the contract of purchase it was further agreed that all breeding, feeding, housing, and graduating of litters was to be done under the supervision of the defendant, without charge to the plaintiff, and that it was further agreed that defendant would furnish bucks for breeding without charge, and that defendant would purchase from plaintiff all young does at the age of three months at $2.50 per head, and all bucks at the price of 75 cents each. That plaintiff expended for housing and maintaining said rabbits the sum of $360, in addition to the purchase price paid of $640.

That the representations so made by the defendant to plaintiff "did defraud the plaintiff in the sum of one thousand three hundred and seventy five ($1,375.00) dollars, $640.00 being the purchase price of said bred does, $360.00 for hutchies, $375.00 for care and feed, making a total of $1,375.00, representing the amount which plaintiff was compelled to expend and did expend, through the deceit, misrepresentation and fraud practiced by the defendant upon the plaintiff," and that the defendant wholly failed to live up to any terms of the agreement entered into with the plaintiff in any manner whatsoever.

That the plaintiff has offered, and does now offer, to return the rabbits in his possession upon the return by defendant of the sum of $1,375 so expended by plaintiff, but that defendant has refused to accept said offer.

No demurrer was filed to this complaint, but defendant has answered by a general denial of each of the allegations of the complaint.

After answer filed, plaintiff took out a writ of attachment on the claim set out in the complaint and levied same on property of the defendant. Defendant was at all times a resident of this state, and the affidavit for attachment is in the form prescribed for attachment against residents, and alleges that "the defendant is indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $1,375.00 over and above all legal set-offs and counterclaims upon a contract for the direct payment of money, and that such contract was made payable in this state and that the payment of the same has not been secured by any mortgage, lien or pledge, upon real and personal property," etc.

Thereafter in due time respondent served and filed his notice of motion to have the attachment dissolved and the writ quashed. A hearing on this motion was on due notice thereafter had on the records and files in the case and upon the affidavit of defendant that he was, and had at all times covered by the proceedings been, a resident of the state of California.

The motion to dissolve attachment was noticed and made on the grounds, among others: That the writ was not issued in an action based upon a contract expressed or implied for the direct payment of money, and that it was not issued in accordance with the provisions of sections 537 and 538 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That the action is for damages for the fraudulent breach of a contract, and that the damages are unliquidated and cannot be ascertained with reasonable certainty from an inspection of the complaint or of the affidavit upon which the attachment is based.

An order granting motion to dissolve attachment was made January 10, 1927, and notice of appeal from said order was served and filed January 11, 1927.

The record on appeal consists of the clerk's transcript and appellant's opening brief. No brief was filed in behalf of respondent.

On oral argument, attorney for respondent appeared and stated that he had made no appearance for his client on appeal, for the reason that the respondent had refused to advance money for a brief or to go to further expense in the matter. Counsel for respondent suggested, however, that the court was without jurisdiction by reason of the fact that the record had not been certified by the trial judge, and that in any event the attachment had not been kept alive by filing the bond provided for by section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The transcript was thereafter, by leave of court, certified by the trial judge, and, the parties not having availed themselves of leave of court to file further briefs, the matter was ordered submitted.

The respondent, having failed to answer appellant's opening brief, is not entitled to much attention from the court in protecting his rights. It is scarcely fair to the appellate court, no matter what the ultimate rights of the respondent may be, to leave the burden on the court to search out his defense.

[1] We would ordinarily be justified under rule 5 of this court in deciding the case on the statement of facts contained in appellant's brief. Unfortunately for appellant's case, we do not find from such statement that he is entitled to the reversal of the order appealed from. It appears from appellant's own statement of the facts that the writ of attachment in question was not issued on a contract for the direct payment of money, but in an action for unliquidated damages for the alleged fraudulent breach of a contract.

[2] It is true, as argued by appellant, that an implied contract to repay money received under a transaction where the consideration has entirely failed is sometimes recognized as a contract for the direct payment of money, which will serve as a basis for attachment proceedings. But we think this application of the law must be confined to cases where nothing has been received in consideration for the amount sought to be recovered and where the damages may be said to be liquidated and definitely ascertainable under the facts shown.

Appellant's own citations from Santa Clara Valley Peat Fuel Co. v. Tuck, 53 Cal. 304, and Willett & Burr v. Alpert, 181 Cal. 652, 185 P. 976, 979, point out this distinction.

In the Peat Fuel Co. Case, the court, referring to the complaint upon which the affidavit for attachment was predicated, says: "We think this is substantially an averment that the defendant had failed and refused to perform any part of the contract; and the action is to recover the money advanced, on the ground that the consideration upon which it was paid had wholly failed. The authorities appear to be uniform to the effect that where a sum of money has been paid upon a consideration which has entirely failed, the law implies a promise to refund it. On the facts stated in the complaint there was, therefore, an implied contract for the direct payment of money, which brings the case within the very terms of the statute defining the cases in which an attachment may issue."

In the case of Willett & Burr v. Alpert, supra, the order of the trial court discharging the writ of attachment was affirmed. The action was brought as arising under a contract for sale of personal property to recover damages for the failure of the vendor to deliver the full quantity of property called for under the contract, and attachment issued upon an affidavit alleging a contract on part of vendor, the defendant, for direct payment of money. In sustaining the discharge of the attachment, the court says: "But where, as in the present case, there is neither an entire failure of consideration nor a rescission of the contract, so as to entitle the vendee to recover back his money, with the result that he is limited to his remedy of damages, or where there has been an entire failure of consideration and the vendee yet elects not to recover his money, but to recover damages, the action does not proceed upon any theory of the defendant having received money which he should return to plaintiff, and which the law can therefore imply a promise on his part to return, and so indebitatus assumpsit will not lie."

[3] In the instant case there cannot be said to have been an entire failure of consideration. The plaintiff received 63 of the 64 rabbits contracted for, of the designated sex, and, while they had not, up to date of suit, fulfilled their family obligations, there is nothing to indicate any organic disability. It would seem a case for damages.

[4] Neither has there been a rescission of the contract. It is true plaintiff offered to return the rabbits on condition he was repaid his money and compensated in damages, but defendant refused to agree to such settlement. If he had, it might reasonably be argued that there would be an implied promise, as well as obligation, to refund the purchase money, as well as to respond in damages for other expenses incurred by plaintiff in an attempt to realize on his contract.

[5] There are two ways of effecting a rescission—one is by consent and agreement of the parties; the other is by serving notice of rescission and action in court to place the parties in status quo.

[6-8] The original contract here involved no promise on the part of defendant to pay money. The breach of the contract by failure of defendant to perform his obligations thereunder, had there been an entire failure of consideration, would under the decisions, have established an implied contract to refund the purchase money. The failure of consideration, however, being only partial, plaintiff's remedy was either to affirm the contract and sue for damages, or give timely notice of rescission, and enforce the same by proper action. Neither of these would imply an agreement on the part of defendant for the direct payment of money. Where there is a mutual rescission it may be reasonably held that such settlement involves a promise on the part of the defaulting party to refund any amount in money he may have received on the contract.

[9] Appellant probably is also right in his contention that the mere fact that he has joined in his action to recover the purchase price of these rabbits, damages for expenses incurred in housing and caring for the same, for which he concedes that an attachment lien will not lie, does not affect his right to attach for any part of the demand which is based on a contract to repay the money advanced.

In Hamilton v. Baker-Hansen Mfg. Co., 176 Cal. 569, 169 P. 238, the Supreme Court has said that where, in an action to recover for breach of a contract, the affidavit for attachment is predicated on an implied promise to refund money paid on a purchase price, which amount is set out in the affidavit, the fact that the complaint seeks to recover other elements of damage not subject to attachment, does not defeat the attachment for the specified cash repayment. To quote from the opinion:

"The affidavit for attachment states 'that in addition to certain claims for damages for breach of contract hereinafter referred to, defendant in said action is indebted to her in the sum of three hundred and seventy-five ($375) dollars * * * upon an implied contract for the direct payment of money.' * * *

"The first ground of defendant's motion to dissolve the attachment is that the affidavit does not state the amount of defendant's indebtedness, as required by section 538 of the Code of Civil Procedure, because of the inclusion in the affidavit of the words 'in addition to certain claims for damages for breach of contract hereinafter referred to.' It is claimed that this renders the amount of the indebtedness uncertain. The contention is without merit. The affidavit itself shows very clearly that the sum for which the attachment is sought is $375. The intimation that the plaintiff is also claiming additional damages, for which no attachment is asked, is mere surplusage, and in no way throws any doubt upon the amount for which the attachment is requested."

[10] The affidavit in the present case contains no such segregating clause. It alleges that "defendant is indebted to him in the sum of one thousand three hundred seventy five ($1,375.00) dollars of the United States, over and above all legal setoffs and counterclaims, upon a contract for the direct payment of money"; thus including in the alleged implied contract, not only the $640 in money paid for the rabbits, but the unliquidated expense incurred, of $360 for hutches and $375 for care and feed.

This subjects the affidavit for attachment under consideration to the objection that the amount of the alleged indebtedness which might be claimed as arising on an implied contract for the direct payment of money is not stated as required by section 538 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

As the Supreme Court says in the opinion in Willet & Burr v. Alpert, supra: "If this distinction between actions for the recovery of money paid because of failure of consideration or of rescission resulting from a breach of contract, and actions for damages for a breach of contract be not sound, it would follow that indebitatus assumpsit would lie in every case of a breach of contract."

[11, 12] The point suggested by respondent on oral argument, that the attachment lien had in any event lapsed by failure to file undertaking on appeal under section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure, becomes immaterial on the affirmance of the order dissolving the attachment, and in any event applies to an appeal from a judgment on the merits when an attachment is involved.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

G. C. EWER, Plaintiff and Appellant, v. Robert JACKSON, Defendant and Respondent.
(Civ. 4.)

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California. Nov. 27, 1929.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

A. E. Maloney and Chas. Bagge, both of San Bernardino, for appellant.

Le Roy B. Lorenz, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, P. J. The facts and issues involved in this appeal are practically identical with those in civil action No. 3, in the case of W. H. Doud, Plaintiff and Appellant, v. Robert Jackson, Defendant and Respondent, 92 Cal. App. page —, 283 P. 107 the opinion in which is filed of this date.

The cause of action arises on a complaint alleging a contract entered into between plaintiff and defendant on the 5th day of May, 1926, for the purchase of fur-bearing rabbits, for a cash consideration of $400; said contract also providing that plaintiff, under the supervision of defendant, should provide for the hutches and care and feed of the rabbits, for which plaintiff alleges that he expended the sum of $490, making a total claim of $890.

A writ of attachment was issued in this action, based on an affidavit identical in its terms, except as to dates and amount, with that in the Doud Case. The same action was taken in the matter of dissolving said attachment, and on the same grounds.

There being no difference in the nature of the liability of the parties, or of the legal questions involved, between the two cases, the order of the court appealed from, dissolving attachment, is affirmed, on the grounds set out in the decision of the preceding case.

HARRIS & HULL, Inc., v. McCARTY-VAUGHAN-EVANS CORPORATION
et al. (Civ. 3956.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 10, 1929.

1. Principal and agent $\S$ 171(7)—Seller's acceptance of payments under contract with knowledge of its terms constitutes "ratification," and precludes defense of execution by person not having authority to bind seller.

Objection that contract for sale of realty was not executed by person having authority to bind seller is not available in an action on the contract, where such contract was delivered to defendants, who with knowledge of the terms accepted payment thereon, which they still retained, such conduct constituting "ratification."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Ratification.]

2. Vendor and purchaser $\S$ 39—Purchaser is entitled to recover money paid under contract void because of description with reference to unrecorded map.

Notwithstanding a contract for sale of realty is void by reason of description of the lots with reference to unrecorded map, purchaser under such contract is entitled to recover money paid thereon, it being immaterial that purchaser knew map was unrecorded.

3. Specific performance $\S$ 127(3)—Complaint seeking specific performance of void contract held to state cause of action for recovery of money paid thereunder.

Notwithstanding purchaser's prayer for specific performance of contract for sale of realty by reference to unrecorded map, complaint stated cause of action for recovery of purchase money paid under the void contract; it not being essential that complaint state cause of action for particular relief demanded.

4. Vendor and purchaser $\S$ 341(5)—Plaintiff, recovering judgment for money paid under void contract for sale of realty, held entitled to interest at least from time of entry of judgment.

Purchaser in action to recover money paid under void contract for sale of realty is entitled to interest on amount so paid from time of entry of judgment at least.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Harris & Hull, Inc., against McCarty-Vaughan-Evans Corporation and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Abrahams & Sadicoff, of Los Angeles (Paul J. Ziegler, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Kemp, Partridge & Kemp and Douglas D. Crystal, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINCH, R. J. This is an action for specific performance of an alleged contract for the sale to the plaintiff of a number of lots in Los Angeles county. The defendants were given judgment for costs, and the plaintiff has appealed.

The alleged contract is attached to the complaint and made a part thereof. The lots are therein described by reference to an unrecorded map, which the contract recites is not recorded. It is signed on the part of the seller as follows: "McCarty-Vaughan-Evans Corporation, Sellers, Fred T. Linstrum." The prayer of the complaint is for judgment "for specific performance of said contract, * * * or for damages in case specific performance cannot be had, * * * and for such other and further relief in the premises as may be equitable." The answer denies the execution of the alleged contract, and, among other defenses, alleges that it "is illegal and void," because the map referred to therein had not been filed for record.

[1] Respondents contend that the contract was not executed by any person having authority to bind the seller. This may be conceded for the purposes of this opinion, but the alleged contract was delivered to the defendants, and, admittedly, the plaintiff paid them, and, with knowledge of the terms of the contract, they accepted four payments thereon, aggregating $1,960.12, which they still retain. This was such a ratification of the contract as to bar any defense on the ground of want of authority to execute it.

[2] It is equally clear that the alleged contract is void by reason of the description of the lots by reference to the unrecorded map, but the plaintiff had the right to recover the money paid on the contract. Smith v. Bach, 183 Cal. 259, 191 P. 14; Hartzell v. Doolittle (Cal. Sup.) 269 P. 527; Letteau v. Dumas (Cal. App.) 278 P. 459; Shortell v. Evans-Ferguson Corporation (Cal. App.) 277 P. 519; Krause v. Marine Trust & Savings Bank (Cal. App.) 270 P. 246. The fact that the plaintiff knew that the map was unrecorded is not a bar to its recovery of the money paid on the contract. White v. Jacobs (Cal. Sup.) 267 P. 1087.

[3] The effect of the judgment is to leave the defendants in the ownership of the lots and also the money which the plaintiff paid them therefor. An action by the plaintiff for the recovery of such money, filed after the entry of judgment herein, would have been barred by the statute of limitations, in part at least. The complaint herein alleges that "the plaintiff made certain payments of principal and interest under the aforesaid contract to the defendants, and that said payments have been accepted by the defendants." It appears from the face of the complaint that the alleged contract is void and the answer expressly so alleges. Since the complaint shows that the contract is void, it does not state a cause of action for specific performance, but it does state sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action for the recovery of the purchase money paid to the defendants. "It is not essential that a complaint state a cause of action for the relief which plaintiff seeks, provided the facts stated show some right of recovery, and a party cannot be thrown out of court merely because he may have misconceived the form of relief to which he is entitled." Zellner v. Wassman, 184 Cal. 80, 88, 193 P. 84, 87; Estate of Brown, 196 Cal. 114, 126, 236 P. 144; Von Schrader v. Milton (Cal. App.) 273 P. 1074; Masero v. Bes-solo, 87 Cal. App. 262, 262 P. 61; Gregg v. Carey, 4 Cal. App. 354, 88 P. 282.

[4] Since the court found that the alleged contract is void, but that the plaintiff paid thereon and the defendant accepted the sum of $1,960.12, it appears unnecessary to send the case back for a retrial. The appellant is entitled to interest on the amount so paid from the time of the entry of judgment at least. The court found that the "McCarty-Vaughan-Evans Corporation was succeeded in its property rights by the defendant John A. Vaughan Corporation, and that said last-named defendant assumed all of the obligations of the said McCarty-Vaughan-Evans Corporation with respect to the property described" in the contract.

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to enter judgment on the findings in favor of the plaintiff against the defendants McCarty-Vaughan-Evans Corporation, a corporation, and the John A. Vaughan Corporation, a corporation, for the sum of $1,960.12, together with interest thereon at 7 per cent. per annum from the day of the entry of the judgment appealed from, and for costs of suit.

(Civ. 78.)

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California. Dec. 9, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 20, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 6, 1930.

1. Guardian and ward ⇨13(7)—Order appointing guardian must be based on fact findings essential to sustain order.

Order appointing guardian must be based on findings on facts essential to sustain such order.

2. Guardian and ward ⇨13(7)—Order appointing guardian which recited supporting findings held based on sufficient findings, findings not being required to be in separate document.

Order appointing guardian, which recited that said guardian was a fit and proper person to be appointed guardian of minor and that child's father, who appeared in opposition to appointment, was not a fit and proper person to have child's care and custody, held based on sufficient findings; there being no rule requiring findings and judgment to be incorporated in separate documents.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1071(1)—Trial ⇨393(1)—Adverse party is entitled to service of copy of findings ordered by court, but, in absence of showing of prejudice, failure to serve copy will be disregarded on appeal.

Where findings are ordered by the court, adverse party is entitled to service of a copy before they are signed by the judge; but even then, in absence of showing of prejudice from failure to serve a copy, the error will be disregarded on appeal.

4. Trial ⇨393(1)—In absence of record showing that trial court directed preparation of findings, service of findings was not required.

Service of findings was not required, where record failed to show that trial court gave any directions for preparation of findings.

5. Parent and child ⇨2(4)—Law presumes child's interest will be best subserved by awarding its care to parent, unless parent be unfit.

Unless the parent be unfit, the law presumes the interest of child will be best subserved by awarding its care to such parent.

6. Parent and child ⇨2(4)—Prima facie presumption is that parent is fit and competent to have child's care and custody.

There is a prima facie presumption that parent is fit and competent to have care and custody of child.

7. Parent and child ⇨2(3)—Parent's present fitness determines his right to child's care and custody.

Question of parent's fitness to have custody and care of child is one of the present time, and parent, if now competent, does not lose his right to child's custody because his conduct may have at one time fallen short of being ideal.

8. Parent and child ⇨2(3)—Question of parent's fitness, rather than child's welfare, determines right to its care and custody.

In determining right to custody and care of child, question is as to fitness of parent, rather than as to welfare of child.

9. Parent and child ⇨2(3)—Where question of child's health is one that may affect its life, court may consider this in determining parent's fitness to have its custody and care.

Where question of health of child is not one of its general welfare, but one that may quite possibly affect its life, court may properly take this into consideration in awarding its custody and care as having a bearing on fitness of parent who is willing to risk a change in order to sustain his legal right.

10. Parent and child ⇨2(4)—Evidence held to warrant inference that any change in care of three months' old girl in delicate health by giving her custody to father would be unsafe.

In proceeding by maternal aunt to be appointed guardian of person of three months' old girl, in which child's father asserted his legal right to child's custody, evidence held sufficient to warrant inference that any change in care of infant would be unsafe for her well-being because of the very delicate condition of her health which required special care.

11. Parent and child $\Rightarrow$ 2(4)—Where there is substantial evidence that father is not fit to have child's custody, trial court's determination is largely discretionary and will not be set aside except for abuse.

When there is substantial evidence sustaining finding that father is not fit and proper person to have care and custody of his minor child, determination of question is largely in trial court's discretion, which will not be interfered with except for abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Charles L. Allison, Judge.

Proceeding by Jessie Lynn to be appointed guardian of Lyda Lynn Bensfield, a minor, opposed by H. F. Bensfield, contestant. From an order appointing petitioner as guardian of his minor child, contestant appeals. Affirmed.

Golden & Kaufman, for appellant.

Duckworth & Harrison, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

BARNARD, J. The facts as shown by the evidence, are as follows:

Early in January, 1929, appellant and his wife were living in San Diego. The wife was subject to epileptic spells, and because of her ill health, her brother, H. C. Lynn, husband of respondent, brought them to San Bernardino, took them into his home, and gave appellant employment as an automobile salesman. Thereafter, on January 29, 1929, the minor, Lyda Lynn Bensfield, was born, and on February 20, 1929, the mother died. The child was a weakling and needed special care. The respondent, with the consent of appellant, took charge of the infant and, under the advice of a child specialist, fed the baby partially from her own breast and partially on a special formula of prepared food. Under the care given, the child had come up to normal weight. For nearly two months after the birth of the child the appellant made his home with respondent and her family. Difficulties having arisen over the alleged conduct of appellant, he left respondent's home. His demand for the possession of the child was refused. Respondent filed this action, asking to be appointed guardian of the child, alleging that to remove the child from her care and custody would have a tendency to endanger the life of the minor, and that the father was not a fit and proper person to have the care, control, and custody thereof. After a trial, the court entered an order appointing the respondent guardian of the person of said minor, and the father has appealed. While he concedes that the child would be well cared for by respondent, he insists upon his natural and legal right as a parent to the custody of his offspring.

It is insisted by appellant that the court made no findings of fact of any kind, and thereby erred. It is conceded that no findings were made by the court, other than the following:

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of San Bernardino.

"In the Matter of the Guardianship of F. Bensfield, objector to the appointment of said Jessie Lynn, and petitioner for the appointment of himself as guardian of said minor, appearing in person and with his attorneys, Golden and Kaufman, and after the introduction of evidence by the respective parties, the matter was submitted to the Court for decision, and after due deliberation, the Court finds that all the allegations of the petition of Jessie Lynn are true, and that all the allegations of the petition and objections of H. F. Bensfield, in conflict with the petition of Jessie Lynn, are untrue, and that Jessie Lynn is a fit and proper person to be appointed guardian of the person of said minor, and is a fit and proper person to have the care and custody of said minor, and that said H. F. Bensfield is not a fit and proper person to have the care and custody of said minor, and is not a fit and proper person to be appointed guardian of the person of said minor.

"It is Therefore Hereby Ordered, that said Jessie Lynn be and she is hereby appointed Guardian of the person of said minor, Lyda Lynn Bensfield, and that Letters of Guardianship of the person of said minor be issued to her upon her giving a personal bond to Lyda Lynn Bensfield, said minor, in the penal sum of One Hundred and no/100 Dollars, and upon her taking and subscribing an oath according to law.

"Chas. L. Allison, Judge."

Indorsed:

"Filed May 10, 1929.

"By M. L. Aldridge, Deputy."

[1, 2] Beyond question an order appointing a guardian must be based upon findings on the facts essential to sustain such an order. Frascona v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 48 Cal. App. 135, 191 P. 968; In re Campbell, 130 Cal.

380, 62 P. 613. And equally beyond question, we think, such findings are contained in the above instrument. There is no rule requiring the findings and the judgment to be incorporated in separate documents. Hopkins v. Warner, 109 Cal. 139, 41 P. 868.

[3, 4] It is further argued that, even if the document set forth be deemed to include findings on the facts, appellant was entitled to a copy thereof before the same were signed by the court. Where findings are ordered by the court, the adverse party is entitled to service of a copy before they are signed by the judge. Even then, in the absence of a showing of prejudice from such failure to serve a copy, the error will be disregarded on appeal. Miller v. Murphy, 186 Cal. 344, 199 P. 525, and citations therein. It does not appear from the record herein that the trial court gave any direction for the preparation of findings. Service of the findings was therefore not required. Hoffman v. Guy M. Rush Co., 27 Cal. App. 167, 149 P. 177.

[5-8] The only remaining question is as to whether there is sufficient evidence to support the findings of the court that appellant is not a fit and proper person to have the care and custody of said minor. The fitness and the competency of the father is the controlling question in a case of this kind. Matter of Galleher, 2 Cal. App. 364, 84 P. 352. Unless the parent be unfit, the law presumes the interest of a child will best be subserved by awarding its care to such parent. Newby v. Newby, 55 Cal. App. 114, 202 P. 891. There is a prima facie presumption that the parent is fit and competent. In re Campbell, supra. The question of fitness is one of the present time, and a parent, if now competent, does not lose his right because his conduct may have at one time fallen short of being ideal. In re Green, 192 Cal. 714, 221 P. 903. The question is as to the fitness of the parent, rather than as to the welfare of the child. Estate of Moore, 179 Cal. 302, 176 P. 461. It has been held that where the father is found to be a fit and proper person to have the care and custody of the child, he may not be deprived thereof, although another home, with more opportunity for fresh air and exercise, might be more beneficial to the delicate health of the child. In re Salter, 142 Cal. 412, 76 P. 51.

[9, 10] However, where the question of the health of the child is not one of its general welfare, but one that may quite possibly affect the life of the child, the court may properly take this into consideration as having a bearing upon the fitness of a parent, who is willing to risk a change in order to sustain his legal right. There was some evidence in this case along that line. The child was about three months old at the time of the trial; it had been in a very bad condition and required special care; and it had been found necessary to institute partial breast feeding, since it had not thrived on the other formula prescribed by the child specialist. Respondent was dividing her own baby's milk with this child. It was also in the evidence that the mother of the child had been, in her lifetime, subject to epileptic fits. The doctor testified that epilepsy is hereditary, that it is now known that those with a tendency to that disease should have a special diet, and that this was being considered in feeding the baby. Upon the question of making any change in the care of the child, the doctor testified in part as follows:

"Q. Doctor, in your opinion, having had charge of this baby and the treatment of it, do you consider in your opinion, that it would be to the best interest of the baby for it to be taken away from its present course of treatment and care? A. That is a very hard question to answer. If the present condition can be maintained without change, that child can be taken care of anywhere.

"Q. In other words, if the same course of feeding and care the child now receives is given to it? A. If the child is maintained on its present feeding and hygiene without any change whatsoever, that child could get along.

"Q. And that takes into consideration the type of food it is getting at this time? A. The type of food and management, and the sacrifices that are entailed with the nurse, such as Mrs. Lynn is giving."

The inference could reasonably be drawn by the court, from this evidence, that any change in the care of the infant would be unsafe for its well-being. This could be taken into consideration in reference to the fitness of the father, especially in the absence of any evidence that he could furnish the same care and treatment.

There was other evidence that supports the finding of the trial court. Several witnesses testified that appellant usually had the smell of liquor on his breath; one fellow employee testified he saw him daily and that there were only a few times he ever talked to him when he did not have liquor on his breath; and another fellow worker testified he drank too much. There was evidence that some nights he did not come home at all; that once he came home between 8 and 9 o'clock in the morning, stating he had been on a wild party until 4 o'clock; that he usually was out nights until 2 or 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning; that because of his habit of keeping late hours, he did not attend to business; and that at times (how many is not clear) he went home and went to bed in the daytime. Another fellow employee testified to seeing him drunk on at least one occasion.

The evidence also shows that at another time he came home intoxicated at about 10 o'clock at night, talked to his sister-in-law for about two hours, and then told her he had left a friend outside in his automobile, whom he must take home. He presently returned with the friend, who was so drunk he could hardly stand up and had his coat on crossways. While talking with the sister-in-law, she turned around and saw appellant with his shirt open, and his friend standing there with his clothes off. Upon her remonstrating, and demanding that he get the man out of the house, appellant refused to do so.

There was also evidence that he took no interest in the baby whatsoever; that he himself had stated that he never wanted her, that he had tried to get rid of her before she came, and that he wished the baby had died; and that one day he asked where the fool baby was. And that this is his general attitude toward the baby.

[11] When there is substantial evidence that sustains the finding that the father is not a fit and proper person to have the care and custody of his minor child, the determination of the question is largely in the discretion of the trial court. Estate of Bedford, 158 Cal. 145, 110 P. 302. Unless this discretion is abused, the action of the court will not be set aside. We think there was sufficient evidence here to sustain the finding complained of.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

MORANDA et ux. v. MAPES et al.★
(Civ. 3831.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 4, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 3, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 30, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1002, 1011(1)—Appellate court will not disturb verdict or findings based on conflicting evidence, where there is some evidence in support thereof.

Judgment cannot be reversed because evidence is conflicting, but, on the contrary, appellate court will not disturb verdict of jury or findings of court where there is substantial conflict of evidence on material points and where there is some evidence to support verdict or findings.

2. Damages ⇨183(1)—Evidence held to support finding that no damage was done to any of plaintiffs' property by fires negligently permitted to burn over plaintiffs' lands.

In action for damages for negligently setting out fire on defendants' lands and permitting it to burn over plaintiffs' lands, evidence held to support finding that no damage was done to any property of plaintiffs by fires.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Action by Barthol Moranda and wife against Sophia Mapes and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter and Charles Andersen, both of Stockton, for appellants.

Woodward, Briggs & Blewett and Von Detten, Henry & Goodrum, all of Stockton, for respondents.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem. This action was brought by appellants against respondents, as set forth in the first count of their complaint, for negligently, intentionally, and maliciously setting out fire on the lands of defendants within 20 yards of plaintiffs' lands, and on plaintiffs' land, and for negligently permitting same to be communicated to, and to burn over, the lands of plaintiffs, thereby destroying fruit, nut, and shade trees, fences, wood, etc., to plaintiffs' damage. And in the second count of said complaint appellants further allege that by reason of the destruction wrought by said fire in burning the said fences and driftwood and drift, the levees protecting the land of plaintiffs broke and washed out, and as a result thereof plaintiffs' said land was flooded and trees and vines thereon were destroyed to plaintiffs' damage.

The action was tried by the court without a jury, and at the close of plaintiffs' evidence the court granted a nonsuit as to defendants Sophia Mapes, Sophia Bollinger, and Nanette Bollinger, and at the close of defendants' evidence, and upon submission of the case, the court rendered judgment in favor of defendants, and from this judgment plaintiffs have appealed.

It appears from the evidence that in the fall of 1925 respondent Clarence Wells Mapes was the owner of land lying near that owned by appellants, and that on the 25th day of October, or the 15th day of November, 1925, respondent Carroll Mapes, who was acting for his brother Clarence Mapes, went upon his brother's said land and burned off some 20 acres of stubble. He completed this burning about 4 o'clock p. m., and then went to a shallow slough, same being a fork or prong of the slough known as the Mormon slough, and started a fire on an island that lies between the shallow slough and the deep water of the said Mormon slough. Carroll Mapes testified that the purpose of starting the fire on the island was to burn off the drift and driftwood that had accumulated thereon and obstructed the flow of water in said slough; that the accumulation of drift and driftwood on said island obstructed the flow of the waters of said slough, and thereby endangered the levees that protected his brother's land. This same witness further testified that a few minutes after he had started the fire on the island, appellant Barthol Moranda came from his home and demanded of said Mapes why he had started the fire; that some conversation took place between them; and that said Moranda then said, "I will fix you," and started for his house. Witness, then fearing that said Moranda was going after a gun, retreated to the other end of the island some 400 feet distant; that he remained there until 6 o'clock p. m. watching the fire and then went home; that when he left the fire it was practically out; that it was just smoldering; that he returned about 9 o'clock p. m. that same evening to look after the fire, and found that it was no longer burning. Appellant Barthol Moranda denied that he had threatened the said Carroll Mapes in any way. He further testified that in spite of his efforts to prevent it, the fire crossed the slough and burned over a strip of his land a thousand feet long and 60 feet wide and destroyed a large number of his nut and fruit trees and grapevines. He also claimed it burned a lot of driftwood and a large oak tree on the island. It appears that the boundary line between appellant's land and that of respondent Clarence Wells Mapes is in dispute, and was in dispute at the time of the fire, and since then each of them was claiming this island. This dispute finally ended in a lawsuit in which judgment went for Clarence Wells Mapes, and from said judgment the said Moranda and wife appealed, and this appeal is still pending. Respondent Clarence Wells Mapes testified that on several occasions after the fires he held consultations with appellants, and that one of these was with their attorney, in which the boundary dispute was discussed, but that at none of these times was any mention made that appellants had suffered any damage from said fires. Respondents Clarence Wells Mapes and Carroll Mapes testified that the fires never crossed over upon appellants' land, or any part thereof, nor did said fires burn or injure any of appellants' nut or fruit trees or grapevines, or other property, or do any injury to any property of appellants, and this testimony was corroborated by the testimony of other witnesses. Respondents further produced testimony to the effect that the burning of the drift, driftwood, and riff-raff on the island did not cause appellant's levees to break or wash out, or cause appellants' fruit trees or vines to be damaged by flooding.

[1, 2] The trial court found in substance that appellants did not own the said island, and had never owned it; that said fires were not negligently set, nor did they burn over the lands of appellants; that said fires did not burn, damage, or destroy the property, or any part thereof, set forth in appellants' complaint, or any other property belonging to appellants; that the levees of appellants were not broken or washed out as a result of said fires, or of any act of respondents, or of either of them, nor were the fruit trees or vines of appellants flooded or damaged or destroyed because of said fires or by any acts of respondents, or either of them. Appellants claim that the finding of the court to the effect that they did not own the island is not supported by the evidence. In support of their claim that they owned the island, appellants introduced in evidence a deed which conveyed to them a certain tract of land described as "all of that portion of the east half of the southeast quarter of section 32 and the west half of the southwest quarter of section 33 in township 2 North of Range 8 E., M. D. M., containing 15.25 acres and lying southeast of the southeast bank of Mormon Slough." Appellant Allie Moranda was on the witness stand when this deed was offered in evidence, and to the following questions she gave the following answers:

"Q. This (referring to the above description) is the description of the property marked on the board? A. Yes.

"Q. And that is the property on which the fire was set? A. Yes.

"Q. And where the trees were burned? A. Yes."

Maps were used in questioning the witnesses, but none appear in the transcript. A careful examination of the evidence, as same appears in the transcript, fails to reveal any other evidence tending to show that the island is included in the above description. However, admitting that the finding of the court that the island was not the property of appellants is not supported by the evidence, yet if, as a matter of fact, no damage was done to the property of appellants by the setting out of said fires, there can be no recovery in this action. Upon the question of whether or not the fires set out by respondent Carroll Mapes damaged the property of appellants, there is a decided and irreconcilable conflict. A judgment cannot be reversed because the evidence is conflicting. On the contrary, the rule is established by a host of decisions that an appellate court will not disturb a verdict of the jury or findings of the court where there is substantial conflict of evidence on material points and where there is some evidence to support the verdict or findings. 2 Cal. Juris. 921, and authorities cited. There is ample evidence to support the finding of the court that no damage whatever was done to any property of appellants by said fires, or either of them.

The judgment is affirmed.

SAN JOAQUIN FINANCE CORPORATION v. ALLEN. (Civ. 3859.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 7, 1929.

1. Usury ☞66—Conditional sales contract in lieu of original, including amount in excess of legal interest, held usurious.

Conditional sales contract in lieu of original contract, which acknowledged receipt of payments made under original contract and required payment in monthly payments of the balance due in a total amount which included a sum greatly in excess of the legal rate of interest, was usurious, where the evidence established no services rendered for which such charges would have been proper.

2. Usury ☞117—Evidence held to establish usury in conditional sales contract, including amount exceeding balance due on original contract.

Evidence held to establish usury by inclusion in conditional sales contract of amount in excess of legal rate of interest beyond balance due on original contract.

3. Usury ☞55—Amount in excess of legal interest included in conditional automobile sales contract cannot be justified as brokerage charges, where no broker participated in transaction.

Where no broker participated in assignment of conditional sales contract for purchase of automobile, amount included in payment in excess of legal rate of interest cannot be justified as brokerage charges.

4. Usury ☞128—Purchaser of automobile under conditional contract held not estopped to set up usury as against assignee, notwithstanding provisions of contract which showed on its face charges beyond legal interest.

Purchaser of automobile under conditional contract, providing that on assignment of contract money payable shall be paid to assignee without recoupment, set-off, or counterclaim, held not estopped to set up the defense of usury as against an assignee of contract, where on its face the contract showed that it included an amount beyond the balance due in excess of the legal rate of interest.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Action by the San Joaquin Finance Corporation against T. E. Allen. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

William Logan, of Patterson, and G. A. Whitehurst, of Newman, for appellant.

Ray W. Hays and Fenston & Williams, all of Fresno, for respondent.

FINCH, C. J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover an automobile which the defendant held under a conditional sale contract. The answer alleges that the defendant has paid the full purchase price of the automobile; that the contract provides for the payment of $220 in addition to the purchase price "as interest thereon, and as a fee and bonus" for making a loan to the defendant; and that the "agreement to pay said sum of $220 * * * was and is illegal and void under the provisions of the usury law of the state of California." The plaintiff was given judgment for the recovery of the automobile and the defendant has appealed.

There is no substantial conflict in the evidence. It appears therefrom that the defendant purchased the automobile from Robertson & Robertson under a rough memorandum agreement for $1,900, payments to be made at the rate of "$50 a month for 11 months, payment to be extended for another year if wanted." A few days after this agreement was signed Kenneth Robertson, one of the sellers, told the defendant "he would like to assign this contract to the Weaver Company, but he said the Weaver Company would not accept the contract * * * and he would have to make a new one," and said: "If you will do this, I will stand back of you, so that it won't cost you anything to refinance it." A conditional sale contract, in the usual form, dated March 10, 1926, was thereupon executed by the parties, providing for the payment of monthly installments for 11 months and the balance of $979.09 on March 15, 1927. Robertson & Robertson immediately assigned all their right, title, and interest in the automobile and the contract to L. F. Weaver Company. The defendant paid that company all installments as they fell due, except the final one of $979.09. The defendant had possession of the automobile at all times after the first contract was executed.

March 22, 1927, without any change of possession, Kenneth Robertson and the defendant executed a conditional sale contract, by the terms of which the former purported to sell to the latter the same automobile. At that time the defendant made a payment of $49.09, thereby reducing the balance due to the sum of $930. In this contract the automobile is described as "new." The contract provided for payment of "the total purchase price of $1,840 as follows: $910 upon the signing of this contract, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and the balance of $930 plus interest and service charges, as follows." Then follows a list of 18 monthly payments to be made, beginning with May 1, 1927, aggregating $1,150. On the day the contract was executed, Robertson assigned it to the Merced Loan & Insurance Agency, and, on the following day, that company assigned it to the plaintiff.

The defendant testified that he did not at any time receive any "money or anything of value under this contract"; that after its execution he received from the L. F. Weaver Company the contract which had been assigned to it, marked "Paid," and "the certificate of ownership" of the automobile; that he "simply kept the car"; that he thereafter delivered the certificate to the plaintiff at its request; that at the time the last contract was executed there were present Robertson and W. Mill Brown, the latter apparently being the person who subscribed the name of the Merced Loan & Insurance Agency to the assignment of the contract to the plaintiff; that the defendant there stated that the amount due was $930, and that he "was taking care of the insurance on the car, * * * full coverage," and that in fact he had paid for such insurance; that Brown said that $1,150 would be "the face of the new contract." The defendant's testimony continues: "I was very much enraged at the idea of charging me * * * $220 for the use of $930. * * * We argued back and forth for probably a couple of hours. I told Mr. Robertson I had just as well leave the car there, as I couldn't meet the terms of the contract of that kind. * * * I told Mr. Robertson that my understanding was with him, the reason I bought the car from him, he was to finance me till I got it paid for at $50 a month, without further consideration. * * * That was why I went to Merced to buy the car from Mr. Robertson. * * * I had to agree to [the terms of the proposed contract] or leave my car." The defendant paid the plaintiff the full sum of $930 in monthly installments as provided for in the contract, informing the plaintiff, at the time of paying the first installment, that it was his intention "to claim the benefits of the usury law."

[1, 2] Neither Robertson nor Brown testified in the case, though it appears that the latter was present at the trial, and the defendant's testimony stands uncontradicted. No attempt was made by the plaintiff to show any justification for the addition of $220 to the balance due on the contract price. Neither of the contracts made any provision for interest, except on overdue installments, and it is fair to presume that, as is usual in such contracts, the interest on deferred payments was included in the contract price. If it be assumed that the additional sum of $220 was intended to cover interest charges on the contract of March 22, 1927, that sum is greatly in excess of interest at any lawful rate. If the defendant's testimony is true, then there were no services performed or to be performed for which any part of the $220 was intended to be compensation. Giving due consideration to the failure of the plaintiff to introduce any evidence in rebuttal of the defendant's testimony, there appears to be no escape from the conclusion that the defense of usury was thoroughly established. To frustrate evasions of the usury law "the courts have been compelled to look beyond the form of a transaction to its substance." 27 R. C. L. 211; Van Noy v. Goldberg (Cal. App.) 277 P. 538.

[3] Respondent says: "If $68.89, as computed by counsel, represents interest, then $151.11 was paid to the Merced Loan & Insurance Company as a service charge or commission." But the contract was made by defendant directly with Robertson, who then assigned to the Merced Loan & Insurance Agency, which, in turn, assigned to the plaintiff. No broker participated in the transactions, and the excess amount provided for by the contract cannot be justified on the ground that it was a brokerage charge. Blodgett v. Rheinschild, 56 Cal. App. 728, 206 P. 674. This excess was to be paid to Robertson or his assigns, and no one of them acted in the capacity of broker.

[4] Respondent contends that the appellant is estopped by the terms of the contract to set up the usurious nature thereof. The contract provides: "As a part of the conditional sales contract, it is agreed that in the event the seller shall assign this contract and the moneys payable thereunder to a third party, then all moneys payable under this contract by the buyer shall be paid to such assignee without recoupment, set-off or counterclaim of any sort whatsoever. * * * It is agreed by the buyer and seller or his assigns that this contract contains the entire agreement made between them."

Appellant cites American National Bank v. A. G. Sommerville, Inc., 191 Cal. 364, 216 P. 376, 378, as an authority in support of the contention that the defendant is estopped. The terms of the contract involved in that case were more sweeping in favor of the assignee of the seller than those here under consideration, but the court held that there was no estoppel shown. That case holds that "conditional contracts of sale are nonnegotiable instruments in this state," and that it is always open to a party to dispute a recital of consideration contained in such a contract. The provision in the contract in the instant case to the effect that the buyer was to pay the additional sum of $220 for "interest and service charges" relates to the consideration for the defendant's promise and, at most, is only prima facie evidence of a consideration.

It is true that the contract purports to be an original contract of sale of a "new" automobile, and, had it recited that the purchase price was $1,150, it might be argued with much force, on the authority of the case cited, that such recital constituted an estoppel in pais, available to a purchaser of the contract for value and without knowledge of the true purchase price, but the contract in this case recites that $1,840, is "the total purchase price," of which $910 was paid on the execution of the contract, leaving only $930 of such purchase price unpaid. It appears, therefore, that the respondent's claim of estoppel is without support in the record.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. MARSHALL (Cr. 7.)★

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California. Dec. 6, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 20, 1929. Hearing
Granted by Supreme Court Jan. 2, 1930.

1. Criminal law ⇨1180—Ruling of appellate court on point distinctly made on previous appeal is, in all subsequent proceedings in same case, "law of case."

Ruling of appellate court on a point distinctly made on previous appeal is, in all subsequent proceedings in the same case, law of the case, from consequences of which court cannot depart nor parties relieve themselves.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Law of the Case.]

2. Criminal law ⇨624—Waiver of right to trial within statutory period applies to hearing on insanity plea after conviction on plea of not guilty (Pen. Code, §§ 681a, 686, 1026, 1050, 1382).

In prosecution for grand theft, defendant filed pleas of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity, and when arraigned waived right to trial within statutory period. From conviction on first plea, defendant appealed, and, after remittitur for trial on second plea, contended that he was entitled to dismissal under authority of Pen. Code, §§ 681a, 686, 1050, and 1382, because trial on plea of insanity was not held within statutory period. Held, that waiver of right to trial within statutory period applied to hearings on separate pleas, since under section 1026 such separate hearings constitute but one trial.

3. Criminal law ⇨624—Another 60-day period, within which accused was required to be tried on insanity plea, was begun by order of appellate court remanding case (Pen. Code, § 1382).

In prosecution for grand theft, where defendant appealed after conviction on plea of not guilty, another period of 60 days, in which accused was required to be tried on insanity issue, under Pen. Code, § 1382, started in operation by order of appellate court remanding case for trial on such plea.

4. Criminal law ⇨624—Statute requiring trial within 60 days had no application to hearing on insanity plea following filing of remittitur on appeal from conviction (Pen. Code, § 1382).

Pen. Code, § 1382, requiring trial in 60 days after filing information, has no application to hearing on plea of not guilty by reason of insanity, provided for in section 1026, following the filing of remittitur, since such hearing was delayed by appeal from conviction on plea of not guilty.

5. Criminal law ⇨576(3)—Accused held not deprived of right to speedy trial by delay pending appeal from conviction, nor by failure to bring trial on insanity plea within 30 days after filing remittitur.

Where accused was convicted on January 14, 1929, on plea of not guilty to charge of grand theft, accused held not deprived of his constitutional and statutory right to speedy trial by delay pending appeal nor by failure to bring accused to trial on plea of not guilty by reason of insanity within 30 days after filing remittitur on July 1, 1929.

6. Judges ⇨47(2)—Judge sitting at hearing on plea of not guilty had authority, under assignment, to sit at insanity hearing after appeal from conviction (Pen. Code, § 1026).

Judge assigned to sit from January 2 to January 31, 1929, and thereafter to act until all matters heard by him should be disposed of, having heard trial on plea of not guilty to charge of grand theft, had authority to complete trial and hear trial on plea of not guilty by reason of insanity, since, under provisions of Pen. Code, § 1026, separate hearings on such issues constituted but one trial.

7. Criminal law ⇨1189—Reversing case for trial on special plea held to contemplate merely trial on insanity issue on which hearing had not been had.

Where, in prosecution for grand theft, defendant filed pleas of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity, and appealed from conviction on plea of not guilty, reversal for trial on special plea held to contemplate trial on plea of not guilty by reason of insanity and not retrial of all issues.

8. Criminal law ⇨1189—Reversal of conviction for trial on insanity issue held within power of appellate court (Pen. Code, § 1260).

Under Pen. Code, § 1260, which provides court may reverse, affirm, or modify judgment or order appealed from, appellate court, on appeal from conviction on plea of not guilty, could reverse case for trial on plea of not guilty by reason of insanity.

9. Criminal law ⇨1189—Reversing conviction for trial on insanity issue held not "reversal without ordering new trial," so as to discharge defendant (Pen. Code, § 1262).

Judgment reversing conviction on plea of not guilty to charge of grand theft, and remanding case for trial on issue of insanity, held not reversal without ordering new trial, within meaning of Pen. Code, § 1262, so as to discharge defendant.

10. Criminal law ⇨1186(4)—Sustaining objection to question on cross-examination of witness who testified as to defendant's sanity as to nature and manifestations of insanity held not prejudicial (Const. art. 6, § 4½; Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 10).

In prosecution for grand theft, where non-expert witness had qualified as required by Code

Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 10, so as to be able to testify as to defendant's sanity, sustaining objection to question on cross-examination as to whether witness knew how insane person would act, what insanity was, difference between idiocy and insanity, and different manifestations of insanity, held not prejudicial so as to require reversal under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

11. Criminal law ☞354—Where defense in prosecution for grand theft was insanity, defendant had right to prove insanity of his sister.

In prosecution for grand theft, where defense was not guilty by reason of insanity, defendant had right to prove insanity of his sister.

12. Criminal law ☞452(2)—Before witness may be interrogated as to mental condition of relatives of defendant relying on insanity, witness must be qualified to testify in that regard.

Before witness in criminal prosecution, where defense is not guilty by reason of insanity, may be interrogated as to mental condition of members of defendant's family, witness must be qualified to testify to such matters.

13. Criminal law ☞354—Exclusion of letters written by accused's sister for purpose of showing sister's insanity held not error, where witness, addressee of letters, had never met sister.

In prosecution for grand theft, where defense was not guilty by reason of insanity, exclusion of letters written by accused's sister, offered for purpose of showing sister's insanity, held not error, where witness to whom letters had been written had not seen sister, and there being nothing to show whether letters showed the real state of mind of their author.

14. Criminal law ☞1186(4)—On appeal, accused must show that error in exclusion of evidence was prejudicial to him to obtain reversal (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, which provides that no judgment should be set aside on ground of improper rejection of evidence, it is incumbent on accused to show on appeal that any error in exclusion of evidence was prejudicial to him.

15. Criminal law ☞829(1)—Refusing defendant's requested instructions in prosecution for grand theft held not error, where those given were full and complete.

Where instructions given in prosecution for grand theft were full and complete, refusing instructions asked for by defendant held not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Eugene Daney, Jr., Judge.

J. W. Marshall was convicted of grand theft, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Edward J. Kelly, of San Diego, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BARNARD, J. This is an appeal from a judgment and sentence upon conviction of the crime of grand theft, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The defendant entered a plea of not guilty and also one of not guilty by reason of insanity. The case went to trial on the plea of not guilty only, on January 11, 1929. After a verdict of guilty, the defendant was sentenced to the state prison at Folsom. Upon appeal, the judgment was reversed and the case remanded for trial upon the issue of insanity. People v. Marshall (Cal. App.) 278 P. 258. The remittitur was filed in the superior court on July 1, 1929. On August 1, 1929, the case went to trial on the issue raised by the plea of not guilty by reason of insanity. The jury having found that the defendant was sane at the time of the commission of the act charged in the information, judgment and sentence were pronounced, and the defendant appealed.

[1] The appellant first urges that we again review the assignments of error which were presented and argued on the former appeal. The claim is made that it was not necessary for the court to express an opinion on these points, other than the one upon which the reversal depended, and that all references to such other points in the opinion handed down are dicta only. The former appeal was based both upon errors of law alleged to have occurred at the trial on the plea of "not guilty," and on the contention that defendant had not been duly convicted, in that the trial court had no authority to pronounce sentence upon the defendant, without first having a jury pass upon the issue raised by his separate plea. Both of these contentions were urged by appellant, and both were passed upon by the appellate court. Without question, if errors of law had been found, the order of reversal would have directed a retrial on the plea of not guilty, as well as a trial upon the issue of insanity. The references in the opinion of the court to those matters, other than the failure of the trial court to submit the issue of the sanity of the defendant to a jury, were not dicta as claimed, but were necessary to the decision of questions properly before the court. It was held that there was no error prior to the time of judgment and sentence, but that the pronouncement of sentence was premature, the verdict not being complete until it should be determined whether or not the defendant was sane at the time the offense was committed.

In the case of People v. Hamilton, 103 Cal. at page 496, 37 P. 627, 630, the court said:

"It is not doubted but that a ruling by the appellate court upon a point distinctly made upon a previous appeal is, in all subsequent proceedings in the same case, a final adjudication, from the consequences of which the court cannot depart, nor the parties relieve themselves"—citing cases.

No further evidence was put in after the remittitur came down on any of the matters involved in the first hearing, and as to those matters the decision heretofore rendered by the District Court of Appeal, having become final, is the law of the case. Mitchell v. Davis, 23 Cal. 381; People v. Walker, 76 Cal. App. 192, 244 P. 94.

The next point raised is that the defendant was deprived of his right to a speedy trial. It is insisted that, having been convicted on his plea of not guilty on January 14, 1929, he was entitled to an immediate trial on his plea of not guilty by reason of insanity. Section 1026 of the Penal Code reads in part as follows:

"If the jury shall find the defendant guilty, or if the defendant pleads only not guilty by reason of insanity, then the question whether the defendant was sane or insane at the time the offense was committed shall be promptly tried, either before the same jury or before a new jury, in the discretion of the court."

[2-5] No mention of the plea of "not guilty by reason of insanity" was made at the time judgment was pronounced. When the defendant was asked if he had any cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced, he said that he had, but the record shows no objection made, other than his motion for a new trial. In due course, he himself instituted an appeal. The remittitur was filed July 1, 1929, thus restoring jurisdiction to the superior court. The trial on the issue of not guilty by reason of insanity began on August 1, 1929. It is urged that, by authority of sections 681a, 686, 1050, and 1382 of the Penal Code, the defendant was entitled to a dismissal of the case. The record shows, without contradiction, that, when the defendant was arraigned, he waived his right to trial within the statutory period provided by law. We are of the opinion that the entire proceeding provided for under section 1026 constitutes but one trial, and therefore this waiver applied to each of the respective hearings upon the separate pleas. Not only is this true, but, by the appeal following the first hearing, the superior court was divested of jurisdiction to proceed in the matter until that appeal was decided, and thereupon another period of 60 days was started in operation by the order of the appellate court. In re Scott, 81 Cal. App. 577, 254 P. 596. One reason why the provisions of section 1382 of the Penal Code do not apply is because the case was actually tried on the insanity issue within 60 days from the filing of the remittitur. Section 1050 of the Penal Code is directory only, and contains no provision for the dismissal of a case when its terms are not complied with. Ray v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 281 P. 391. Section 1382 of the Penal Code has no application to a new trial following the filing of a remittitur. In re Alpine, 203 Cal. 731, 265 P. 947, 58 A. L. R. 1500. We think the same thing is true of a hearing following the filing of a remittitur, in a case where the second hearing provided for in section 1026 of the Penal Code has been delayed, pending the determination of an appeal from the first hearing thereunder. The appellate court remanded this case to the trial court for the sole purpose of a trial upon the one remaining plea. Neither by the delay pending the appeal nor by the failure to bring him to trial on this plea within 30 days after the filing of the remittitur was the defendant deprived of his constitutional or statutory rights. People v. Walker, supra.

[6] It is next argued that the judge who presided at the hearing on the issue of insanity had no jurisdiction to act in the matter, because his assignment to the superior court had expired. The first hearing had been held before Eugene Daney, Jr., a duly elected, qualified, and acting justice of the peace, then sitting as a judge of the superior court of the county of San Diego under an assignment thereto by the judicial council of the state of California. His assignment was in the usual form, the pertinent part thereof reading as follows:

"* * * Good cause appearing therefor, you are hereby assigned to sit as Judge of the Superior Court in and for the County of San Diego, beginning January 2 to and including January 31, 1929, and thereafter to act as such until all matters heard or partially heard or submitted to you therein shall have been completed and disposed of by you, and also for the purpose of hearing and determining any motion after judgment in a case decided by you. * * *"

After the remittitur was filed, Judge Daney was called in by the presiding judge of said superior court to complete the hearing of this case. The hearing on the issue of insanity began on August 1, 1929, and no other assignment from the judicial council appears in the record. A trial on the issues presented by a plea of "not guilty" and a plea of "not guilty by reason of insanity," under the provisions of section 1026 of the Penal Code, constitutes but one trial. People v. Marshall (Cal. App.) 278 P. 258; People v. Leong Fook (Cal. Sup.) 273 P. 779. Having partially heard the matter in question, under the authority specifically given in the assignment as above set forth, the judge presiding had jurisdiction to complete the trial.

[7, 8] The next point urged is that the appellate court had no power to reverse this case without either ordering a retrial of all the issues or a dismissal of the case, and that there should have been a trial de novo. The order made on the previous appeal is as follows: "The judgment is reversed and the case remanded for trial upon the issue presented by the special plea." Appellant argues that, since no pleas are denominated special pleas by statute, all being equally general and equally special, the appellate court intended to order a trial de novo on all pleas.

We think it is clear that the order of that court was to have the case completed on the one issue only (the question of insanity), and not to have all of the issues retried. It is further argued that, if a new trial from the beginning was not ordered, the defendant must be discharged. Section 1260 of the Penal Code provides:

"The court may reverse, affirm, or modify the judgment or order appealed from, and may set aside, affirm or modify any or all of the proceedings subsequent to, or dependent upon, such judgment or order, and may, if proper, order a new trial."

[9] Under the power here given to modify a judgment or order, the court may reverse in part and affirm in part, and may send the case back for a new trial on certain counts and not on other counts. People v. Dillon, 68 Cal. App. 457, 229 P. 974. It has been held that the court may set aside a judgment and sentence where erroneously pronounced without upsetting the verdict. People v. Hill, 36 Cal. App. 574, 172 P. 1114; People v. Votaw, 38 Cal. App. 714, 177 P. 485; In re Lee, 177 Cal. 690, 171 P. 958. The court here did not disturb the verdict in the first of two necessary steps which constitutes but one trial. On the contrary, the court held there were no errors of law in the proceedings up to and including that verdict. It was held that, since the verdict was not yet complete, the trial court had no power to pronounce judgment and sentence and the case was sent back to be completed. It was then the duty of the trial court to proceed as should have been done in the first instance, to a hearing on the remaining issue. The appellate court had the power to remand the case to the trial court for proper action. In re Lee, supra. The judgment was not "reversed without ordering a new trial" within the meaning of section 1262 of the Penal Code.

[10] The next two points raised relate to the sustaining by the trial court of objections to certain questions asked on cross-examination of two witnesses, who had testified that the defendant had appeared to them to be sane. Neither of these were expert witnesses, but both had testified as intimate acquaintances of the defendant. Each witness had given his opinion on the subject, and the reasons upon which his opinion was based. Section 1870, Code Civ. Proc. subd. 10. The questions to which objections were sustained were as to whether the witnesses knew how an insane person would act; what insanity is; the difference between idiocy and insanity; the different manifestations of insanity; and whether or not the witness knew the various types of insanity. All of these were questions which would have been more properly addressed to an expert witness than to one testifying only from the standpoint of an acquaintance. In any event, the witnesses not only stated the reason for their opinions, but the record shows a full and complete cross-examination allowed as to the facts on which they based their opinions, and as to their previous experience with insane people, including any reading on the subject. We have read the entire transcript of the testimony of these two witnesses and the same shows that the exclusion of the evidence sought to be brought out by these questions was without prejudice to the rights of the defendant. Const., art. 6, § 4½.

[11, 12] It is next insisted that the court erred in excluding evidence of the insanity of the defendant's sister. It must be conceded that the defendant had the right to prove such insanity by competent evidence. People v. Harris, 169 Cal. 53, 145 P. 520, 523. The wife of defendant was asked whether there was insanity in defendant's family. The court sustained an objection to this question on the ground that it was not the best evidence. The defendant then attempted to prove such insanity of the sister by introducing letters said to have been written to the wife of defendant by the sister, and which letters are claimed to show unmistakable signs of insanity. The court sustained objections to the introduction of these letters, on the ground that they were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, hearsay, no proof of their genuineness, and no opportunity to cross-examine the writer as to whether they were written voluntarily or under instructions. Other than these letters, no evidence of the insanity of the sister was offered. The objection to the first question on the ground that it was not the best evidence was not good. However, before a witness may be interrogated as to the mental condition of other members of the family, he must first be qualified to testify in that regard. In People v. Harris, supra, the court said:

"* * * Undoubtedly, where insanity is a defense, the mental condition of any of the relatives of the defendant is material, and on that subject, as on all inquiries relating to insanity, a reasonable latitude should be allowed. But this does not mean that the rules as to the admissibility of evidence should be relaxed. The rule is that before the opinion of witnesses as to sanity of a person or a particular phase of it can be given—and the inquiries here were simply calling for the opinion of the witnesses on that subject—it must be preliminarily shown that the witness is qualified to express it, and clearly this was not shown here. * * *"

[13, 14] No foundation was here laid as to the qualification of the witness to express an opinion on the subject. The witness admitted she had never met the sister, and had never seen her write. She testified that she believed the letters were written and signed by the sister, as she had received a number of letters from her. Apparently all of these letters were written after the commission of the offense charged in the information. Aside from the objectionable features of such evidence standing alone, without further proof tending to show the insanity of the writer, and with nothing to show whether the letters showed the real state of mind of their author, or were purposely written to create an impression in that regard, the qualification of this particular witness to testify as to the genuineness of the letters was very weak to say the least. Under the circumstances, the ruling of the court on the admission of the letters was correct. In addition to this, it is incumbent upon the appellant to show upon appeal that any error, if such there was, was prejudicial to him. Article 6, section 4½, of the Constitution, provides that no judgment shall be set aside on the ground of improper rejection of evidence, unless after the examination of the evidence the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Our attention has not been called in any of the briefs to the letters claimed to have been written by the sister and offered in evidence, and, after searching through the more than six hundred pages of the transcript, we are unable to find them. We do not know whether there was anything in them tending to bear out appellant's contention or not.

[15] Complaint is also made of the refusal of the court to give a number of specific instructions asked for by defendant. While we do not consider it necessary to set these forth in detail, we have examined them all. Nearly all of them were instructions that the jury should take into consideration particular facts. The record shows that the court did instruct the jury that every fact showing the mental condition of the defendant at the time and all things bearing on the subject of his capacity to distinguish right from wrong, at that time, must be considered by them. The instructions given were full and complete, and in our opinion nothing would have been added to them by the inclusion of those asked for, and refused.

No error appearing in the record, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

EDGAR et ux. v. CITRARO et al. (Civ. 7069.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 16, 1929.

1. Appeal and error ⇐607(1)—Transcript having been certified more than year before hearing of motion to terminate proceeding to obtain transcript, termination order was ineffectual (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

Where transcript had been duly certified by trial judge more than year prior to hearing and granting of respondents' motion in superior court to terminate appellant's proceeding for written demand for transcript under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, on ground that appellant had been guilty of laches in his efforts to procure transcript, superior court's order terminating proceeding was ineffectual for purpose for which it was intended, irrespective of whereabouts of transcript during such period, since such a motion is maintainable only where transcript has not yet been certified by judge.

2. Appeal and error ⇐800—Motion to dismiss appeal for not timely filing transcript was denied, where transcript was on file when notice of motion was given (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, and Rules of Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, rule I, § 1, rule V, § 1, motion to dismiss appeal on ground of appellant's failure to file transcript within 40 days after transcript was certified by trial judge could not be granted, where transcript was on file when notice of motion to dismiss was given and delay in filing transcript did not operate to respondents' prejudice.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by John F. Edgar and wife against Frank Citraro and another. From the judgment, named defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Denied.

Cooley, Crowley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Vincent W. Hallinan, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. On August 9, 1929, a transcript on appeal in the above-entitled cause, bearing a certificate of approval and authentication by the trial judge, dated June 28, 1928, in conformity with the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, was filed with the clerk of this court; and on August 19, 1929, appellant filed his opening brief. Thereafter, and on August 24, 1929, respondents served and filed a notice of motion to strike said transcript and brief from the files and to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the transcript was transmitted to this court in violation of an order theretofore made by the superior court terminating the proceedings on appeal.

It appears that four actions for damages arose out of one automobile accident, and that judgments therein were rendered against the appellant Citraro and one C. D. Pratt, jointly, each of whom took separate appeals. Consequently, there are eight appeals. In this particular appeal the appellant Citraro, in January, 1928, filed a written demand for a transcript, in accordance with the requirements of said section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, and in July, 1929, respondents moved the superior court to terminate the proceedings taken in that behalf upon the ground that appellant had been guilty of laches in his efforts to procure the transcript. The action had been tried on the merits in department 5 of said court, but respondents' motion to terminate the proceedings on appeal came on for hearing in another department, and on July 31, 1929, was heard and determined by a judge other than the one who had presided at the trial; and, according to the statement of counsel for appellant, the accuracy of which was not seriously disputed, at the time the said motion was heard and determined every one connected with the proceeding, including the phonographic reporter who reported the several trials, believed that the transcript in this particular appeal had not yet been completed. Shortly after the order was made, however, terminating the proceedings, the reporter found the transcript, which apparently had been misplaced, and which had been duly certified by the trial judge as to truth and correctness on June 28, 1928, more than a year prior to the hearing of the motion to terminate the appeal proceedings; and thereupon the transcript was filed with the county clerk and a few days thereafter was transmitted to this court. The whereabouts of the transcript from the time it was certified by the trial judge, in June, 1928, until it was produced and filed, in August, 1929, has not been made clear. Presumably, however, it was in the possession of the reporter, and appellant attributed the confusion in the matter to the fact that the reporter was obliged to prepare a number of transcripts in furtherance of the several appeals.

[1] Irrespective of the question as to the whereabouts of the transcript, however, it is certain that it was duly certified by the trial judge more than a year prior to the hearing and determination of the motion to terminate the proceeding to obtain it, and, that being so, the order made by the superior court in that behalf was evidently ineffectual for the purpose for which it was sought and intended, because such a motion is maintainable only where the transcript has not yet been certified by the judge. Crocker v. Crocker, 76 Cal. App. 606, 245 P. 438; Mill Valley v. Massachusetts, etc., Co., 189 Cal. 52, 207 P. 253; Smith v. Jaccard, 20 Cal. App. 280, 128 P. 1023, 1026.

[2] The rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal provide that the transcript must be filed within 40 days after the appeal is perfected, but that the time prescribed for filing a transcript to be prepared pursuant to said code section 953a shall not begin to run until the transcript is approved and certified by the trial judge, or until the proceeding to obtain it has been terminated in the court below by dismissal or otherwise (Rule I, § 1); also, that if the transcript be not filed within the time prescribed, the appeal may be dismissed, upon notice given, etc. (Rule V, § 1). The latter rule further provides, however, that if "the transcript, or the points and authorities, though not filed within the time prescribed, be on file at the time such notice (to dismiss) is given, that fact shall be sufficient answer to the motion." Even assuming, therefore, that the present motion to dismiss be treated as one made upon the ground of failure to file the transcript within the 40-day period after being certified by the trial judge, it could not be granted, because, as will be observed, the transcript was on file at the time the notice of motion to dismiss was given. Furthermore, it would appear that the delay in filing the transcript has not operated to respondents' prejudice, because none of the other appeals, including the one taken from this particular judgment by appellant's co-defendant Pratt, has yet been determined.

For the reasons stated, respondents' motion to strike the transcript and the brief from the files and to dismiss the appeal is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Cooley, Crowley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Vincent W. Hallinan, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Respondents move this court to strike the transcript on appeal and appellant's opening brief from the files of this court and to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that said transcript was transmitted to this court in violation of an order theretofore made by the superior court terminating the proceedings to procure the transcript. The motion is based upon the identical facts and circumstances involved in a similar motion made by respondents in a companion case, and which motion has this day been denied. Edgar et al. v. Citraro et al. (No. 7069) 283 P. 123. Therefore, upon the grounds and for the reasons set forth in the decision in the companion proceeding, the motion herein is denied.

EDGAR et ux. v. CITRARO et al. (Civ. 7224.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 16, 1929.

Costs $260(4)—Abandoning appeal from order terminating proceeding to procure transcript after certified transcript was found and filed did not authorize penalty for frivolous appeal.

Where defendant's appeal from order terminating proceeding to procure a transcript on appeal was taken in good faith at a time when defendant could fairly assume that, if order appealed from was allowed to become final, appellant would be deprived of his right to appeal from judgment, but thereafter duly certified transcript was found and filed within a few days thereafter in appellate jurisdiction, and appellant abandoned appeal from order terminating proceedings because it would have served no useful purpose, motion to dismiss said appeal was granted without imposing penalty on ground that appeal was frivolous.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edward P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by John F. Edgar and wife against Frank Citraro and another. From an order terminating proceedings to procure a transcript on appeal from a judgment, named defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Granted.

Cooley, Crowley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Vincent W. Hallinan, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a proceeding based on respondents' motion to dismiss an appeal upon the ground that the transcript has not been filed within the 40-day period allowed therefor by the rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal (section 1, rule V), and furthermore, claiming that the appeal is frivolous, respondents ask that they be awarded damages. Appellant makes no opposition to the granting of the order of dismissal, but resists respondents' application for the imposition of a penalty.

The appeal was taken from an order made on July 31, 1929, terminating the proceedings to procure a transcript on the appeal which had been taken from the judgment in the action. The facts and circumstances attending the making of said order are set forth in an opinion this day filed in a proceeding wherein respondents sought to have dismissed the appeal from the judgment (Edgar et al. v. Citraro et al. [No. 7069] 283 P. 123); and as will appear from the facts stated in that opinion, the present appeal was doubtless taken in good faith at a time when it could be fairly assumed that if the order appealed from was allowed to become final appellant would be deprived of his right of appeal from the judgment. The situation was relieved, however, when the transcript on the appeal from the judgment, duly certified, was found; and which, within a few days thereafter, was filed in the appellate jurisdiction. Obviously, therefore, after the transcript was filed with this court, it would have served no useful purpose to prosecute the appeal from the order terminating the proceedings in the superior court, and therefore such appeal was abandoned. But under the circumstances existing at the time the appeal was taken it cannot be said that the appeal was frivolous.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is therefore granted without the imposition of a penalty.

John F. EDGAR and Rose Edgar (his Wife), Plaintiffs and Respondents, v. Frank CITRARO, Defendant and Appellant; C. D. Pratt, Defendant and Respondent. (Civ. 7225.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 16, 1929.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edward P. Shortall, Judge.

Cooley, Crowley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Vincent W. Hallinan, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This motion to dismiss an appeal taken from an order made by the superior court terminating certain proceedings to procure a transcript on an appeal from the judgment in the action upon the ground that the transcript was not filed within the period allowed by section 1, rule V, of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, and to award damages for a frivolous appeal, is a companion motion to one this day decided in Edgar et al. v. Citraro et al. (No. 7224) 283 P. 125, and is based upon the identical facts involved therein. As in that proceeding, appellant does not oppose the dismissal of the appeal, but resists respondents' application for damages.

For the reasons stated in that opinion, it must be held here that the appeal was not frivolous, and therefore the motion to dismiss is granted without awarding damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by J. Platt Brush and another against E. R. Bohan & Co. and others to quiet title. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Blue Diamond Company appeals. Affirmed.

Black, Hammack & Black and Carey McWilliams, all of Los Angeles, and R. S. Harrington, of Sawtelle, for appellant.

Owen C. Emery, of Glendale, and John F. Poole, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. This is an action to quiet title. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiffs, and defendant Blue Diamond Company has appealed. The following statement of facts is taken substantially from the appellant's opening brief:

Respondents were originally the equitable owners of the premises, "having purchased them on contract from G. Allen Hancock."

Thereafter the respondents "assigned said contract of sale to Seth Cheesman," to whom Hancock conveyed the premises. "Cheesman then put a first mortgage of $10,000 upon the premises * * * to aid the financing of a dwelling thereon." The consideration for the assignment by respondents to Cheesman was the sum of $3,250, to secure the payment of which Cheesman executed a deed of trust, conveying the premises to a trustee, which instrument contained the following: "This deed of trust is second and subject to a mortgage filed concurrently herewith, in amount of $10,000." Cheesman informed the respondents "that he was buying the lot to build a flat on, and that he was borrowing $10,000 for the purpose of building this flat." Cheesman did not let a contract for the erection of the building, but built it himself. The appellant furnished materials which were used in the construction of the building and duly filed a lien for the amount of its claim for such materials. Cheesman defaulted in payment to the plaintiffs, and the trustee sold the property to them to satisfy the indebtedness.

[1, 2] From the foregoing facts, appellant contends that an inference arises that Cheesman was merely the respondents' contractor, that they conveyed the property to him "for the purpose of financing the erection of a flat building thereon" and then causing the property to be sold under the deed of trust and buying it themselves, thereby destroying the rights of lien claimants. If the facts are as stated, it is to be regretted that the appellant did not produce some proof thereof at the trial, for there is no evidence in the record to warrant such an inference. Fraud and bad faith are not to be presumed in the absence of evidence thereof.

"If recorded before any work is done or materials are commenced to be furnished, a trust deed is in the ordinary course of things prior to mechanics' liens." 25 Cal. Jur. 52; Smith v. Anglo-California Trust Co. (Cal. Sup.) 271 P. 898; Fickling v. Jackman, 203 Cal. 657, 265 P. 810; San Francisco Lumber Co. v. Yates, 54 Cal. App. 109, 111, 204 P. 423.

[3] Appellant relies on a statement in 40 Corpus Juris, 295, that "it has been held that a second mortgage, although prior in point of time to mechanics' liens, is inferior thereto where it was taken subject to a first mortgage, the proceeds of which were to be applied in paying for labor and materials, and not all of the money was advanced and applied as agreed"—citing Andersonian Inv. Co. v. Jones, 104 Wash. 142, 176 P. 17. An examination of that case shows that the money which was not advanced and applied as agreed exceeded the amount of the liens. The effect of the decision, therefore, is merely that the second mortgage was inferior to the mechanics' liens only to the extent of the money not advanced and applied as agreed. As so understood, the decision is in harmony with that in W. P. Fuller & Co. v. McClure, 48 Cal. App. 185, 197, 191 P. 1027. No claim is made by the appellant that the whole of the $10,000 for which the mortgage was given by Cheesman was not advanced and applied in the construction of the building.

[4] It is urged that the appellant's lien for materials has "priority over that of the trust deed as to the building" at least, citing 40 Corpus Juris, 476. The rule there stated is that, "in a majority of jurisdictions, the building or improvement, as distinct from the land, may be subjected to the lien under certain circumstances," citing, among other cases, McGreary v. Osborne, 9 Cal. 119, and Linck v. Meikeljohn, 2 Cal. App. 506, 84 P. 309. No circumstance has been pointed out, however, which would warrant the application of the rule in this case. Respondents took the property under the trustee's deed, enhanced in value, it is true, by the improvement made by Cheesman, but also subject to the mortgage for $10,000. The building placed upon the land became a part thereof and belongs to the owner of the land. Civ. Code, § 1013; Watterson v. Cruse, 179 Cal. 379, 383, 176 P. 870; Pomeroy v. Bell, 118 Cal. 635, 638, 50 P. 683; Conde v. Sweeney, 16 Cal. App. 157, 160, 116 P. 319.

Other points made by the appellant are so manifestly untenable as not to merit a discussion thereof.

The judgment is affirmed.

BOGARDUS v. BOGARDUS. (Civ. 3961.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 11, 1929.

1. Divorce ⇨303(1)—Improper order relative to custody of children may be corrected by trial court (Civ. Code, § 138).

Where improper order relative to custody of children has been made in divorce case, trial court has power thereafter to modify and correct it, and enter such order as it should properly make, under Civ. Code, § 138.

2. Divorce ⇨312—Trial court's ruling as to whether parent should be denied permission to see minor child is conclusive, in absence of abuse of discretion.

Whether such conditions exist as to warrant trial court in divorce case in refusing to permit one of parents to see minor child is primarily question for trial court to determine, and, unless it abuses its discretion, appellate courts should not interfere.

3. Divorce ⇨303(3)—Modification of orders respecting custody of minor child to permit father to visit child held not error (Civ. Code, § 138).

In divorce case, trial court's modification of orders relative to custody of minor child, so as to permit father to visit child, who was seven years of age, held not erroneous, under Civ. Code, § 138.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William Hazlett, Judge.

Action by Geneva M. Bogardus against Russell B. Bogardus. From orders relative to the custody of a minor child, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

S. C. Schaefer and E. H. Woodard, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Mose Katzey and Paul Friedman, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This cause is before us upon an appeal by the plaintiff from certain orders of the court relative to the custody of Russell Bogardus, Jr., the issue of the marriage between plaintiff and defendant. The record shows that at the time of the beginning of the action above named, in 1924, Russell Bogardus, Jr., was of the age of 21 months. The action above named was for a decree of divorce, adjustment of community property rights, and the awarding of the custody of the minor child above named. In April, 1925, an interlocutory decree of divorce was entered in said cause, and the custody of said minor child awarded to the plaintiff. Thereafter, and on the 24th day of May, 1926, a final decree of divorce was entered in said cause. The final decree of divorce likewise awarded the custody of said minor child to the plaintiff, making no mention whatever as to the right or privilege of the defendant to see or visit said minor child.

In May, 1927, the defendant herein filed a notice of motion and affidavit in the said cause, praying that the decree of divorce heretofore referred to be amended, so as to permit the defendant to visit said minor at certain specified times. This motion was contested by the plaintiff, and after hearing the said motion, the court made an order specifying that the defendant might visit said child, and might take said child to his home, being the home of the grandparents of said child, from 5 o'clock in the evening preceding the day when the defendant would be off duty, to 7 o'clock of the following day; the affidavit of the defendant showing that he was employed as a deputy sheriff of the county of Los Angeles, and the time when he was off duty was subject to the orders he might receive from the undersheriff of said county. After the making of this order the plaintiff moved that the order be vacated and set aside, following which the court made an order to the effect that the defendant might see the child at the home of the plaintiff when the defendant was off duty, but only during the daylight hours, and not more than once each week, and that the defendant might take the minor child to the home of his parents during the daylight hours, not more than once each week, and further that said child should not be removed from the county of Los Angeles without the permission of the court. From these orders the plaintiff appeals.

The only ground for appeal is that the affidavit of the defendant shows no changed circumstances after the entry of the final decree of divorce, and that the court had no jurisdiction to make any order modifying the final decree of divorce relative to the custody of the child or the right of the defendant to see or visit said child, unless based upon changed circumstances and conditions which did not exist at the date of the entry of the final decree. Section 138 of the Civil Code contains no such requirement. The court is specifically authorized to make such change relative to the custody of minor children as may seem necessary or proper at any time, and may modify or vacate the same. There is no contention made that it was not proper for the court to make an order permitting the defendant to see the minor child, and take the said child, during the daylight hours, to the home of its grandparents. At the time of the beginning of the action Russell Bogardus, Jr., was only 21 months old, and during his period of infancy the exclusive care, custody, and control of the minor may be said to be very properly vested in the mother; but as the child grew older and time elapsed the circumstances of themselves would necessarily be so changed, by reason of the advancing age of the child, as to warrant the court in permitting the defendant to visit the child during daylight hours, and to take him to the home of his grandparents during such hours. There seems to be no contention between counsel for appellant and counsel for respondent that orders affecting the custody of minor children should not be changed by the court, unless based upon changed conditions and circumstances. While the section of the Code makes no such provision, the decisions of the courts having to do with such questions generally adopt the rule that such modifications or alterations of the orders relative to the custody of children should not be made, unless based upon testimony showing changed circumstances or conditions. These decisions, however, are not uniform in holding that the court has no jurisdiction to make such change, unless the affidavits show changed conditions. They do not deny the power of the court to make such modification of its orders relative to the custody of children as may seem proper.

[1-3] We do not think that, if an improper order relative to the custody of children has been made by a trial court, the court has no power thereafter to modify and correct the same and enter such order as it should properly make. There can be no question that under ordinary circumstances, where the court has failed to permit one of the parents the right to see a minor child, that it is proper to modify the order so as to permit such parent to see the child. Only very aggravating circumstances and conditions would warrant a court in denying such privilege, and whether such conditions exist is primarily a question for the trial court to determine, and, unless it is shown that the trial court has abused its discretion in this particular, appellate courts, we think, should not interfere. The affidavit of the defendant in this case does not show circumstances and conditions which did not exist at the time of the trial of the action, to wit, the increased age of the minor child, the effort, on the part of the plaintiff, to prevent affiant from visiting his child, the sending of the child away on days when the defendant was off duty, and the taking of the child from the county of Los Angeles.

In the case of Moore v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 255 P. 852, 853, we find this statement: "In divorce * * * the statute expressly provides that a decree for the custody and maintenance of minors may be modified or vacated at any time as may seem necessary or proper. * * * The propriety of modification in this particular, as well as the extent thereof, because of a change in the circumstances of the parties, rests largely in the discretion of the trial court. A decree need not reserve this right of modification." A hearing in this case was granted by the Supreme Court, and the opinion is reported in 203 Cal. 238, 263 P. 1009, but the same result was arrived at as was reached in the District Court of Appeal, and what we have quoted from the decision of the appellate court was not modified.

Being of the opinion that the trial court had jurisdiction of this cause by reason of section 138 of the Civil Code to modify its orders relative to the custody of the minor child, and nothing appearing to show any abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court, and the orders made permitting the father to visit the child, who is now seven years of age, being in accordance with natural justice, and eminently proper, the orders appealed from are affirmed.

1. Intoxicating liquors ☞213—Information for maintaining common nuisance, alleging maintenance thereof in certain building located in named city, sufficiently designated and described premises (Pen. Code, §§ 959, 960).

Information for maintaining a common nuisance under the state liquor law, charging a maintenance of nuisance in a building located in the city of Needles, sufficiently designated and described premises in accordance with requirement of Pen. Code, § 959, particularly in view of section 960, to effect that no indictment, or information, is insufficient by reason of any defect or imperfection in matter of form which does not tend to prejudice of a substantial right of defendant upon its merits.

2. Intoxicating liquors ☞236(9)—Evidence held to sustain conviction for maintaining common nuisance.

Evidence in prosecution on charge of maintaining a common nuisance under the state liquor law held sufficient to sustain conviction.

3. Criminal law ☞1159(4)—Verdicts are not to be discredited and set aside merely because based upon testimony of officers.

Verdicts are not to be discredited and set aside merely because based on testimony of officers of the law, though certain degree of bias may be presumed on the part of arresting and prosecuting officers growing out of their zeal to justify an arrest.

4. Criminal law ☞829(12)—Refusal of instruction that possession of liquor was insufficient for conviction of maintaining common nuisance held not erroneous in view of other instructions.

In prosecution on a charge of maintaining a common nuisance under the state liquor law the refusal of instruction that possession of liquor alone would not be sufficient to sustain conviction held not erroneous, in view of other instructions of court incorporating the same rule.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Charles L. Allison, Judge.

Joe Collins was convicted of maintaining a common nuisance, and he appeals. Affirmed.

R. E. Hodge and Frank T. Bates, both of San Bernardino, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George H. Johnson, Dist. Atty., of San Bernardino, for the People.

SLOANE, P. J. This is a criminal action brought in the county of San Bernardino against the defendant Joe Collins on the charge of maintaining a common nuisance under the Volstead Act.

The information charges that the said Joe

Collins, on or about the 26th day of May, 1929, and prior thereto, in the said county of San Bernardino, state of California, did willfully and unlawfully maintain a common nuisance, to wit, a certain building located in the city of Needles, in said county and state, where intoxicating liquors were unlawfully kept and unlawfully sold and kept for sale; said intoxicating liquor containing one-half of one per cent. or more of alcohol by volume and being fit for use for beverage purposes. Defendant was found guilty and convicted before a jury, and the appeal was taken from the judgment rendered on the verdict and from the order of the court denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

Appellant assigns as grounds for reversal of the judgment and order of the court:

(1) That the information fails to state the commission of a public offense because of uncertainty.

(2) That the evidence as a whole does not establish or support the verdict of guilty of the maintenance of a nuisance as defined by law and the act in question.

(3) The evidence does not establish sufficient connection between the offense charged and the property described and the defendant.

(4) Errors of law resulting from rulings of the court of such character as to deprive the defendant of a fair trial.

(5) Misconduct of the district attorney during the course of the trial affecting the substantial rights of the defendant.

(6) Refusal of the court to grant a certain instruction submitted by the defendant.

[1] The point made as to the insufficiency of the information is that it does not sufficiently designate and describe the premises where the nuisance in question is alleged to have been maintained. It is true that the particular location of the offense charged might have properly been more specifically set out. It is only designated in the information as "a certain building located in the City of Needles, said County and State." This seems to be sufficient under section 959 of the Penal Code. This section provides that: "The indictment, information, or complaint is sufficient if it can be understood therefrom: * * * (4) That the offense was committed at some place within the jurisdiction of the court, except where the act, though done without the local jurisdiction of the county, is triable therein."

Appellant points out no specific requirement for any different rule in the matter of prosecution for nuisance than would apply to any other offense. This is a personal action, and not one which affects the property where the nuisance is alleged to have been committed. All that would seem to be required is that the defendant should be informed of the venue of the offense sufficiently to enable him to prepare his defense, and to protect him from further prosecution for the particular offense charged.

Section 960 of the Penal Code declares that: "No indictment, or information is insufficient, nor can the trial, judgment, or other proceeding thereon be affected by reason of any defect or imperfection in matter of form which does not tend to the prejudice of a substantial right of the defendant upon its merits."

It is quite apparent that the defendant, in preparing his defense, had no difficulty in locating the precise building referred to in the information.

In People v. Mazzola, 80 Cal. App. 583, 251 P. 222, 223, this language is used: "It is also urged by appellant that the information is defective, in that it fails to state the particular place in the county of San Bernardino where the alleged offense was committed. But it appears that such a statement is unnecessary. People v. Geiger, 116 Cal. 441, 48 P. 389; People v. Sheldon, 68 Cal. 434, 9 P. 457; People v. Wooley, 44 Cal. 494; People v. Evert, 1 Cal. Unrep. 217; People v. Redman, 39 Cal. App. 566, 179 P. 725; People v. Burke, 18 Cal. App. 72, 122 P. 435."

In People v. Burke, 18 Cal. App. at page 81, 122 P. 435, 440, discussing the point raised here of indefiniteness as to the precise location of the crime, the court says: "Looking at the matter in its practical aspect, it is manifest that no substantial right of the defendant was invaded or imperiled. He knew whether the offense charged was committed by him in any part of Sonoma county. This knowledge would enable him to prepare and present his defense. And, as far as any future prosecution is concerned, the indictment would protect him in his answer to any charge of the same offense committed at the time set forth at any place within the jurisdiction of said superior court. If there should be any doubt as to this, his plea 'of once in jeopardy' could be supported by extraneous evidence to identify the particular offense for which he has been tried, and thus he would be amply protected."

[2] As to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict and judgment, we do not deem it necessary to review the testimony in detail. The entire transcript has been carefully read, and the impression left thereby is that there was ample evidence to justify the verdict of the jury, both as to the maintenance of the building in question as a place where intoxicating liquors were unlawfully kept and unlawfully sold, but also in support of the allegation that the defendant was at the time of his arrest on or about the 26th day of May and prior thereto, in charge thereof and maintaining the same. It is true, as defendant complains, that the witnesses for the prosecution were all officers of the law; M. J. Jenkins being a police officer of the city of Needles and a deputy sheriff of the county of San Bernardino; Jerry Davis an investigator for the sheriff of San Bernardino county; John Alles

a federal prohibition agent; C. F. Smithson a special officer for the Santa Fé Railroad, who lived in Needles; C. C. Poe a deputy sheriff of San Bernardino county, and J. A. Larson deputy sheriff of San Bernardino county; Emmons Arnold special agent for the Santa Fé Railroad and deputy sheriff of San Bernardino county, and J. H. Lucas a constable, and J. E. Farley a deputy sheriff. Two or three of these witnesses testified to being present on the night of May 26th when the house was raided and the defendant arrested, and stated that the defendant was present and came to the door, and on being notified that the visitors were officers of the law, immediately ran from the front door back into the kitchen, where he was detected in pouring liquor from a pitcher into the kitchen sink. Portions of this liquor salvaged by the officers proved to be alcoholic liquor, containing as high as 40 per cent. in volume of alcoholic content. There was other evidence of the presence of intoxicating liquor, in the way of jugs and demijohns, whisky glasses, and other paraphernalia, empty at the time, but bearing the odor of whisky. The witness Jenkins stated that he had been in the house in the month of December, 1928, and on several other occasions within a year prior to May 26th, and on each occasion he found bottles, jugs, funnels, etc., on the premises bearing the odor of liquor, and on the 16th of September, 1928, he saw a man coming from the house, who, on the approach of the officer, broke two pint bottles of whisky which he was carrying, on the water meter on the premises. He also testified that at other times he had arrested people immediately after they came out of the house, who either had liquor in their possession, or were in a drunken condition, and that between May 26, 1928, and 1929, he had been in the house at least five times when the defendant was there present and apparently in possession.

Jerry Davis testified that in January, 1929, he bought whisky from the defendant at this place; that there were three or four in the house besides himself, and that he bought a round of drinks for everybody, including himself, and that then one of the other parties bought a round from the defendant before he left, and that they were served by the defendant in person. John Alles testified that in the early part of 1929 he visited this house in company with another investigator and bought four drinks of whisky there and a pint of whisky. The defendant was not present on this occasion and the liquor was served by some other party. His only information at that time that this was defendant's house was from hearsay.

C. F. Smithson testified that he was on the premises in September, 1928, and saw there a man by the name of Barbour, who poured something down the sink which smelled like whisky. On another occasion in the same month he saw some liquor in a pitcher, He testified that he had seen several intoxicated persons around the place, and that he often saw the defendant in and about the house.

C. C. Poe testified that the defendant had lived in this particular house for 18 months or 2 years; he had seen drunken people come from the house. On the evening of May 26th he tasted some of the liquor taken from the sink and declared that it was whisky. Asked how he knew that the defendant Collins lived in this particular house, he stated that he knew it from seeing Collins there, and that he had Collins' word for it. The defendant had once told him it was his place.

It was testified to by several witnesses that this place was commonly reputed to be occupied by the defendant; that he was frequently there, and that it was a customary thing for persons associated with, or having business with the defendant when they wanted to see him to look for him at this place; that he kept an automobile in a garage adjoining the house in question; that he was frequently seen sitting on the porch there. While defendant himself denied that he was in possession of or maintaining this house, he admitted that he had a key to it, and was exercising a general oversight of it, in the absence of the owner; that he had a key to it in the absence of the owner on and some time prior to the date of the raid and the arrest. His own testimony that he dropped around there frequently to see that the premises were not being invaded by trespassers, or otherwise interfered with, indicates that he considered himself for the time being the custodian of this house. While a good deal of the evidence was circumstantial, it can scarcely be doubted, taken in its entirety, that whatever business was being maintained there, was carried on by the defendant.

Counsel for defendant does not dispute that there was evidence before the jury that this place was being maintained for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquor and that the defendant was in charge of the same. He admits that the evidence is more or less conflicting, but seeks to discredit the testimony in behalf of the prosecution on the ground that all of the witnesses for the state were officers of one kind or another, and that there is absolutely no evidence of any witness whatever, or of any person other than officers, whom the testimony must show were in Needles, and at these premises, for the purpose of obtaining liquor, and at least part of them, for the stated purpose of arresting this defendant.

[3] While it may be true that a certain degree of bias may be presumed on the part of arresting and prosecuting officers growing out of their zeal to justify an arrest, this is a matter which may be, and usually is, called to the attention of the jury, and in any event we have not yet reached a point where verdicts are to be discredited and set aside because based upon the testimony of officers of the law, and particularly in the matter of enforcement of the Volstead Act, there has not been noticed such a degree of zeal on the part of the state constabulary at large as to raise any presumption of perjury in sustaining public prosecutions. We are satisfied that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict.

As to the specifications of error of law occurring at the trial, we do not think anything is shown that was prejudicial to the defendant. There were some questions and comments by the district attorney which were perhaps improper, but any prejudice that might have resulted from this source was removed by the voluntary rebuke of the court at the time, and by ample instructions to the jury to disregard these matters of misconduct on the part of the prosecution, to which exception had been taken.

[4] Defendant's final specification of error is the refusal by the court to grant the following instruction: "You are hereby instructed that if you should believe from all the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that there was found in the home or dwelling house of this defendant liquor containing more than one-half of one per cent of alcohol by volume, and that the same was fit for beverage purposes, such possession alone would not be sufficient to convict this defendant of the crime charged, to-wit, that of maintaining a common nuisance."

This instruction might properly have been given, and its refusal might be charged as error had not other instructions of the court incorporated the same rule. We think that the jury was fully informed by the instructions given that the mere presence of prohibited liquor in the dwelling occupied by defendant would not be sufficient evidence to justify his conviction of maintaining the place as a common nuisance.

Instruction No. 9 given by the court informs the jury "that mere possession of intoxicating liquors in one's house or place of business does not raise the presumption that such intoxicating liquor is possessed for the purpose of unlawful sale or disposition, nor does it raise the presumption that the place or establishment in which the liquor is kept is conducted as a common nuisance, or is maintained as a place for the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor."

Instruction No. 7 as given contains the statement of the law as to what constitutes a common nuisance, and in this connection informs the jury that the word "kept," as used in this statute, means liquor "kept for sale or barter, or other commercial purpose." And that "while possession of intoxicating liquor in and of itself may be unlawful, unless the possession is coupled with the purpose of selling, bartering or other commercial uses, the offense of maintaining a common nuisance is not committed."

Instruction No. 10 also informs the jury that if they should believe from all the evidence "that there was one occasion when intoxicating liquors were either sold or given away by this defendant to be used as a beverage, such single act is not sufficient to constitute the crime of maintaining a common nuisance."

We deem the instructions taken as a whole quite favorable to the defendant and as covering all of the essential points necessary to fairly submit the case to the jury.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: BARNARD, J.; MARKS, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; R. Morgan Galbreth, Judge pro tem.

Action by Effie W. Smith against E. B. Brown. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sarau & Thompson, of Riverside, and B. P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bertrand J. Wellman, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BURNELL, Justice pro tem. This case arises out of the same accident as that involved in Davis v. Brown, reported in 92 Cal. App. 20, 267 P. 754. The plaintiff in that case was a passenger in the automobile driven by the defendant, while the plaintiff in the instant case was riding in her own car when it was struck by that of the defendant. The accident occurred January 19, 1925, at about 11:30 a. m., and the scene was the North Broadway tunnel which runs north and south between Temple street and Sunset boulevard, in the city of Los Angeles. The case was tried before a jury, which rendered a verdict of $10,250 in favor of the plaintiff. This verdict was reduced on motion for a new trial to $7,500.

[1] Appealing from the judgment based on the verdict as thus reduced in amount, the defendant first contends that the verdict was contrary to the evidence and the law, in that "the proof discloses no negligence on the part of the defendant." With this contention we cannot agree, feeling that the evidence disclosed a set of circumstances under which the question of defendant's negligence was properly submitted to the jury and determined by it on somewhat conflicting testimony. As to most of the facts there is a substantial agreement on the part of the witnesses for the respective parties. Thus all agree as to the time and place of the collision, that the grade of the roadway in the tunnel was down hill from south to north, that the tunnel was 765 feet in length, and that the width of the roadway therein, from curb to curb, was 30 feet 6 inches. There is no conflict as to the fact that it had been raining outside of the tunnel, and that the surface of the roadway therein was wet and slippery by reason of water from the street having been "tracked in." It was not disputed that the Chevrolet car in which the plaintiff was riding was proceeding from north to south, on the west or right-hand side of the tunnel, nor that it was struck and practically demolished by the Lincoln car owned by the defendant, operated as a taxicab and driven by his employee, and which was proceeding in the opposite direction. The defendant, however, urges that the evidence shows the accident to have been unavoidable, in that, to avoid collision with another automobile which skidded just ahead of his car, he was forced to suddenly apply his brakes, with the result that the Lincoln car itself skidded in such a manner as to strike plaintiff's car. There was testimony on behalf of the plaintiff that the defendant's car was traveling at a rate of between 20 and 25 miles per hour when it skidded into plaintiff's vehicle. Witness Balderston testified that he was driving an automobile through the tunnel in the same direction as that in which plaintiff's car was proceeding and about 40 to 50 feet behind the latter, and that, when he first observed the Lincoln taxicab, it appeared to be on the west or wrong side of the tunnel, about 150 to 160 feet from the plaintiff's car; that there were other cars proceeding in the line of traffic on the east side of the tunnel in a northerly direction, and "the taxicab was on my side of the street coming toward us. What I mean by that is meeting us, and he appeared to skid sideways like he was going to turn back into his line of traffic, and he skidded sideways I should judge about 100 feet, coming down against the Smith [plaintiff's] car, striking the Smith car and driving it against my car." Mrs. Curran, a passenger in the Lincoln car, said that before it started to skid it was "traveling toward the middle" of the tunnel, and that prior thereto it had been traveling on the right-hand side going north. Mrs. Smith, the plaintiff, testified: "It sort of looked to me as if it started to pass the car in front of it and came towards the center of the tunnel and at that time it seemed to me as though he turned and started to turn back into his line again, and at that time his car skidded and slid I should say about 100 feet and struck my car." Further analysis of the evidence would serve no useful purpose; suffice it to say that it did not differ in any material respect from that reviewed in Davis v. Brown, supra. The case is clearly one of conflicting evidence, with sufficient testimony before the jury to support its verdict in favor of the plaintiff; and on this phase of the case no points of law are presented which were not disposed of in the former case growing out of the same accident.

[2] Appellant next contends that the trial court erred in instructing the jury upon the question of contributory negligence. There is no merit in this contention. It is true that, although contributory negligence was pleaded as a defense, no evidence was introduced with regard thereto, and it was stipulated before the close of the trial that it should be deemed not an issue in the case. The instruction complained of was therefore rendered unnecessary and should not have been given, but it is difficult to imagine in what manner appellant could have been prejudiced by the giving of it; it was an instruction favorable to appellant rather than to respondent. Section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution completely disposes of this point.

The further point is made that the court erred in denying defendant's motion for a new trial for the following reasons: First, misconduct on the part of members of the jury; second, "accident which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against, emanating from the fainting of a witness while on the witness stand, and the violent remarks of the husband of said witness made in the presence of the jury, tending and calculating to bias and prejudice the jury against the defendant"; and, third, various alleged acts of misconduct upon the part of counsel for the plaintiff.

Upon the first of these points appellant relies upon two affidavits, one of which was sworn to by one of his attorneys while the other was by an "adjuster and investigator" working under the direction and supervision of the attorney. The first of these affidavits recites that, during the forenoon of the second day of the trial Mr. Wellman, the attorney representing the plaintiff-respondent, requested the affiant to approach the bench with him, and told the trial judge that two of the jurors "had been conversing together and commenting upon the testimony that was being introduced," and that affiant then advised the court "that he had also observed the two mentioned jurors conversing but was not close enough to them to be able to tell as to what they were talking about." The affidavit then goes on to recite the conclusion of the affiant that Mr. Wellman "was in a position to be able to tell whether these jurors were commenting on the testimony that was being introduced." The other affidavit states that the affiant was seated "approximately ten feet from where the jury was sitting," and that he observed the two jurors in question "conversing during the taking of the testimony and specially observed them make unfavorable comments and suggestions to each other regarding testimony that was being offered by defendant, or comments being made by defendant's counsel, to objections being raised by them to introduction of certain testimony or certain questions that were being asked on cross-examination by plaintiff's counsel." After reciting that, following the conference between court and counsel referred to in the first affidavit, the court "again admonished the jury that they must not talk to any person or any member of the jury or form or express any opinion concerning the case until the case had been finally submitted to them," the affidavit goes on to state that "on our return to the courtroom at 2:00 p. m., I again occupied a position to the right of the jury box and approximately 10 feet from the jury; that during the afternoon session, I paid particular attention to the actions of the two jurors herein mentioned; that I did, on several occasions, observe these two jurors conversing with each other during taking of testimony and during the time that any objection was made by either counsel for the defendant or counsel for plaintiff and I could plainly see from their actions and manner of conversing that they were very unfavorable to the defense in this action; that whenever any objection was overruled by the court that had been introduced by the defense they appeared to be satisfied, smiled and said something to each other; that I could plainly tell from their manner that they were talking together about this case and that their actions indicated clearly that they were unfavorable to the defense; that I was present in the courtroom when there was considerable argument pro and con by the counsel for defendant and counsel for the plaintiff concerning the testimony of Mrs. Curran, who was then on the witness stand; that I personally observed the actions of Mrs. Curran when she was recalled to the witness stand and in attempting to go back to the witness stand fell in a faint in front of the jury; that her husband who was present in the courtroom rushed to her assistance and I heard him make a remark in the presence of the jury and in a loud voice, as he assisted in picking up his wife and placing her on a table in front of the jury he remarked: 'I hope now you are satisfied, she was in no condition to return to the courtroom, she has never been the same since that accident. I wish they had put me on the stand, I will tell them something.' That Judge Galbreth stated from the bench, 'That will be enough from you.' That I could plainly tell by the actions of the two jurors mentioned that they appeared to be more opposed to the defense of this action, indicating to me that they had formed an opinion before the case was submitted to them."

[3, 4] It is to be observed that in neither of these affidavits is there any statement of the language used by the jurors or of the nature of the actions on their part which the affiant concluded constituted the "unfavorable comments and suggestions." The first affidavit may be eliminated from consideration as merely a recital of a conversation between court and counsel containing no direct statement of what any juror had either said or done; the second must also be disregarded as merely a recital of the conclusions arising in the mind of the affiant. It is significant that no improper conduct on the part of any of the jurors appears to have been noted by the judge, had it been he would undoubtedly have sternly reprimanded the offenders, and, if the gravity of the offense warranted such action, would have declared a mistrial upon his own motion or that of one or both of the parties. No such motion was made by the defendant-appellant, nor does the record disclose any objection on his part to the submission of the case to the jury, although the incident referred to in the affidavits was known to him prior to the completion of the taking of testimony. It is of course improper for jurors to discuss a case prior to its submission to them, but, even assuming that the conclusions expressed in the affidavit of the "investigator" were warranted by the facts which it fails to disclose, "this circumstance was known to appellant at the time of its occurrence, and no objection was made; and he could not thus remain quiet and take the chance of a favorable verdict, and keep this point in reserve." Monaghan v. Pacific Rolling-Mill Co., 81 Cal. 190, 22 P. 590. A somewhat similar situation arose in the case of People v. Lawler, 79 Cal. App. 207, 249 P. 18, except that there the affidavits on motion for a new trial set forth the language used by the juror whose conduct was attacked. In that case a page from a hotel register and an exemplar of the defendant's handwriting, both introduced as his exhibits, was being shown to the jury, when one of the jurors remarked, "That isn't the same writing, you can't make me believe these are the same signatures," and "taking a small book and pencil from his pocket, did write therein and attempt to draw (another juror) into conversation, saying 'just look at this.'" Disposing of the contention that a new trial should have been granted because of this misconduct, and noting that "no objection was interposed and no application was made to the trial court asking any relief of any kind," the court used the identical language above quoted from the Monaghan Case. See, also, Sherwin v. South- ern Pacific Co., 168 Cal. 722, 145 P. 92, and Lafargue v. United Railroads, 183 Cal. 720, 192 P. 538, 540.

[5] Appellant's contention as to "accident which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against" is based upon the incident of the fainting witness referred to in the latter portion of the affidavit of the "investigator." Here again the appellant remained quiet, took the chance of a favorable verdict, and attempted to hold the point in reserve. A somewhat similar incident occurred during the trial in Swendsen v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 175 Cal. 502, 166 P. 21, 22, although there the defendant acted promptly and asked that the jury be discharged and a mistrial declared, and renewed his objection by way of a motion for a new trial. The court there said, as we do here: "The motion for new trial was addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and it cannot be said that there was any abuse of discretion in refusing to disturb the verdict on the ground of this trivial occurrence."

[6] We are not impressed by appellant's point that a new trial should have been granted because of the misconduct of counsel. Counsel on both sides of the case indulged at one point in the trial in what the record shows to have been an unseemly wrangle over a question of evidence in which each was guilty of interrupting the other, the witness under examination, and the court, but there is nothing to indicate that this ungentlemanly conduct was calculated to prejudice the jury against the appellant. In Lafargue v. United Railroads, supra, much the same sort of controversy was relied on as ground for a new trial which the court denied. Upholding this action of the trial court, the Supreme Court said: "In doing this the court must be deemed to have concluded that no prejudice was suffered by defendant by reason of any of the matters to which we have referred. Conceding some of the statements made by counsel, whatever the provocation thought by him to exist therefor, were improper, we are satisfied that this conclusion of the trial judge should not be disturbed by an appellate court. The trial judge is in a much better position than an appellate court to determine whether the verdict in a case is probably due wholly or in part to such alleged misconduct as we have here, and his conclusion in the matter should not be disturbed unless, under all the circumstances appearing, it is plainly wrong. This, we think, may not fairly be said here. We certainly cannot say that there was any intent on the part of counsel to get before the jury matters which he knew were inadmissible. It seems to us from the record that he was acting in perfect good faith. * * *" Here the controversy arose over the effort of counsel for the plaintiff to question a witness as to statements made by him at another trial in which the same accident was involved, without exhibiting to the witness the transcript of his testimony at such former trial, a transcript of which plaintiff's counsel had no copy. It is unfortunate that the court did not, as it should have done, firmly and decisively call both counsel to order at the very inception of a course of conduct in which each was guilty of a breach of that decorum and courtesy to be expected and demanded of those who appear in the temple of justice and particularly of those whose position at the bar makes them officers of the court, but we cannot say that there was any abuse of discretion on the part of the court below in determining, as it did in denying the motion for a new trial, that the conduct of counsel was not calculated to prejudice the jury against the defendant.

[7, 8] Finally, appellant urges that the damages awarded are so excessive as to appear to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice. As has been noted, the jury brought in a verdict in the sum of $10,250, which was reduced by the court on the hearing of the motion for a new trial to $7,500. The plaintiff testified that, as a result of the impact, her right hand was injured, and "I was pretty near black and blue all over, and my ankle was cut and bruised and swollen, and the top of my foot had a hole pretty nearly through the top of my foot. My nose was all swollen and bleeding terribly. I was blood all over and the car, I expect, had a cup of blood in the bottom of the car. * * * The back of my neck hurt very badly, and such terrible pain in it, and in the middle of my back was a place that was hurt that was black and blue, too, and this one bone here (indicating the breast bone) was all black and blue." She further testified that prior to the accident she was in very good health and working as an interior decorator, an occupation which necessitated climbing around on ladders, and that ever since the accident she had been unable to do any of that sort of work, and that the injury to her right hand prevented her from holding a pen or a brush in it. The accident was in January, 1925, the trial was in October, 1926, and there was testimony that during all of the intervening period the plaintiff had suffered pain as the result of her injuries. As one witness put it: "She has never been the same since the accident and she has had to be under the care of a doctor at least once or twice a week and she has been nervous and complained of her back and of her ankle hurting her and terrible headaches at night." X-ray photographs taken eleven months after the accident disclosed "a condition * * * of the lower three vertebrae of mild osteo arthritis or inflammation of the joints between the vertebrae"; also "inflammation or osteo arthritis between the fifth, sixth and seventh cervicals (vertebrae of the neck), and a fallen arch," a condition which might be caused either by trauma or by disease. Dr. Alden

Jones was positive that plaintiff's condition was due to trauma, and that her injuries were of a permanent nature, and that her condition would gradually become worse. There was other testimony corroborative of the above which it would serve no useful purpose to review. The remission under order of the court, of a portion of the sum specified in the verdict, placed the case, so far as the propriety of the jury's action was concerned, in the same condition as if a verdict had been returned in the first instance for the reduced amount. Lynch v. Southern Pacific Co., 24 Cal. App. 108, 140 P. 298. It was said in Kelley v. Hodge Transportation System, 197 Cal. 598, 242 P. 76, 81: "Unless we are able to say that the award of damages made by the jury and sustained by the trial court were grossly disproportionate to any compensation reasonably warranted by the facts as presented to us on appeal as to shock the sense of justice and raise at once a presumption that it was the result of passion, prejudice, or corruption, rather than an honest and sober judgment, this court may not exercise the power of revision. 8 Cal. Jur. 834; Holmes v. California Crushed Fruit Co., 69 Cal. App. 779, 232 P. 178; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513."

Under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence in this case, we are unable to say that the verdict, as reduced by the court, was unwarranted by the evidence as to the nature, extent, and probable permanence of the injuries suffered by the plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: CRAIG, Acting P. J.; IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

Houser, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William T. Aggeler, Judge.

Prosecution by the People against James Sanders and another for the crimes of attempting to rob and of burglary. From an order granting a motion of defendant Sanders in arrest of judgment, the People appeal. Reversed and remanded.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Buron Fitts, Dist. Atty., and Wm. R. McKay, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for the People.

Joseph W. Ryan and Frank J. Ryan, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. The people of the state of California prosecute this appeal from an order of the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles granting defendant's motion in arrest of judgment. It appears from the record that the defendant and respondent was bound over to the superior court by commitment issued by the committing magistrate for the crime of "attempt to commit robbery" from the person and presence of one Lawrence Knezhovich. The district attorney in due course filed an information in the superior court, charging the defendant and respondent in count I with the crime of "attempting to rob" one Lawrence Knezvich, in count II with the crime of "attempting to rob" one Jack Summers, and in count III with the crime of "burglary."

The defendant filed a demurrer to the information, particularly attacking counts II and III, on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to try the defendant for the offenses therein set forth, for the reason that the commitment designated only the crime set forth in count I. The record does not indicate what ruling, if any, was made by the court on this demurrer. It appears, however, that the defendant pleaded "not guilty" to each of the counts and went to trial upon the information, as drawn, before the court without a jury, a jury trial having been waived. During the trial count I was dismissed. Upon completion of the trial the defendant was found guilty of the crimes charged in counts II and III. Subsequent to the conviction, and prior to passing of sentence, the defendant again filed a demurrer to the information, attacking counts II and III on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction of the offense therein charged, for the reason that the defendant had not been accorded a preliminary examination upon these charges, and that the commitment, upon which he was bound over for trial, did not designate the crimes set forth in counts II and III. This demurrer was overruled by the court, whereupon the defendant made a motion in arrest of judgment, basing his motion upon the same grounds as set forth in his demurrer, and particularly alleging that the latter portion of section 809 of the Penal Code, which it was contended by the district attorney authorized the inclusion of counts II and III in the information, was unconstitutional. The court agreed with the view of defendant and respondent, and granted his motion in arrest of judgment.

It is agreed by counsel on both sides that the determination of this appeal is dependent upon the question of the constitutionality of the latter portion of section 809 of the Penal Code, which was added as an amendment to section 809 by the Legislature in 1927. St. 1927, p. 1045. For the sake of brevity, we will refer to the disputed portion of the section as the amendment.

Section 809 of the Penal Code reads as follows (the amendment being set out in heavy type):

"Filing Information After Examination and Commitment. When a defendant has been examined and committed, as provided in section 872 of this code, it shall be the duty of the district attorney, within fifteen days thereafter, to file in the superior court of the county in which the offense is triable an information charging the defendant with such offense. The information shall be in the name of the people of the State of California, and subscribed by the district attorney, and shall be in form like an indictment for the same offense. It may charge the offense, or offenses, named in the order of commitment, or any offense, or offenses, shown by the evidence taken before the magistrate to have been committed."

It is respondent's contention, first, that the amendment is in contravention of section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution of California, in that by said section the committing magistrate is alone vested with the power of designating the particular crime with which a defendant may be charged in an information, and upon which he may be put to trial before a jury; and, second, that the amendment attempts to clothe the district attorney, an executive officer, with judicial functions, and this is in contravention of section 1 of article 3, of the state Constitution.

Section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution of California reads as follows:

"Sec. 8. Offenses heretofore required to be prosecuted by indictment shall be prosecuted by information, after examination and commitment by a magistrate, or by indictment, with or without such examination and commitment, as may be prescribed by law. A grand jury shall be drawn and summoned at least once a year in each county."

The question as to the power of the district attorney in drawing an information to change, amend or add to the offense designated in a commitment issued by the committing magistrate, has long been a matter for discussion by courts of appellate jurisdiction in California. The early decisions, prior to the case of People v. Nogiri, 142 Cal. 596, 76 P. 490, handed down in March, 1904, uniformly sustained the right of the district attorney in drawing an information to charge any offense that appeared from the depositions taken in the preliminary examination to have been committed, whether the offense was designated in the commitment or not. In the Nogiri Case the Supreme Court definitely held that the district attorney did not have such power, thus reversing the previous holding of the court on that point. Inasmuch as respondent in his brief dwells at length upon the Nogiri Case in support of his contentions, it will be helpful to review the case in detail.

The defendant Nogiri was committed by the magistrate to the superior court for trial for the crime of "assault with a deadly weapon." The information filed by the district attorney charged defendant "with an assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder." After referring to the previous decisions upholding the right of the district attorney to include in the information offenses not designated in the commitment, the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Henshaw, says:

"The result of these decisions is to vest in a ministerial and executive officer, the dis-strict attorney, supervisorial, appellate, and judicial powers controlling the judgment of a judicial magistrate who alone, under the Constitution, is empowered to hold the examination, and who alone is empowered to declare by his commitment the offense for which the accused person shall be put upon trial. This, we think, the law neither contemplates nor permits. The Constitution of this state (article 1, § 8) provides that 'offenses heretofore required to be prosecuted by indictment shall be prosecuted by information after examination and commitment by a magistrate.' Section 872 of the Penal Code declares, in effect, that if the magistrate after examination shall determine that the offense charged, or some other offense, shall have been committed, he is to make an order declaring that the offender shall be held to answer 'to the same' and stand committed to the sheriff. Section 809 of the Penal Code, defining and prescribing the duties of the district attorney under the circumstances, declares that 'When a defendant has been examined and committed, as provided in section 872 of this Code, it shall be the duty of the district attorney, within thirty days thereafter, to file in the superior court of the county in which the offense is triable, an information charging the defendant with such offense.' There is thus neither in the Constitution nor in the laws enacted in furtherance of it the slightest vestige of judicial, discretionary, or appellate power given to the district attorney in controlling the action of the committing magistrate. His functions are ministerial purely. He is told to file an information charging the defendant with the offense for which, after judicial inquiry, he has been held to answer." (Italics ours.)

Mr. Justice Henshaw, with the purpose of enforcing the conclusion arrived at, quotes a portion of the dissenting opinion written by Mr. Justice Harlan of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 4 S. Ct. 111, 292, 28 L. Ed. 232, wherein was considered and determined the question as to whether or not the amendment to the Constitution of California of 1879, which provided for prosecution of public offenses by information as well as by indictment, was in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. The language quoted is as follows: "Under the local statutes in question even the district attorney of the county is deprived of any discretion in the premises, for if, in the judgment of the magistrate before whom the accused is brought—and generally he is only a justice of the peace—a public offense has been committed, it becomes the duty of the district attorney to proceed against him by information for the offense indicated by the committing magistrate."

It will be noted that the conclusion of the court in the Nogiri Case was based primarily upon the view that "neither in the constitution nor in the laws enacted in furtherance of it the slightest vestige of judicial, discretionary, or appellate power given to the district attorney in controlling the action of the committing magistrate." Undoubtedly, the Legislature, moved by the holding in the Nogiri Case, and subsequent cases where the Nogiri Case was cited as authority for the same ruling, that there was no provision in the statutes authorizing the district attorney to include in an information any crime or crimes not designated in the commitment, and being convinced that the investing of such power under limited conditions in the district attorney would tend to make more efficient, prompt, and less expensive the trials of those charged with crime, determined to enact legislation that would clearly give to the district attorney this power; hence the amendment in question to section 809 of the Penal Code.

It is respondent's contention, first, that, under section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution, the committing magistrate is clothed with the exclusive power to designate the offense that the defendant should be charged with in the superior court, and the Legislature is therefore without power to delegate to the district attorney the discretion provided in the amendment; and, second, that the amendment is an attempt to clothe an administrative officer with judicial powers, which, it is urged, is in contravention of section 1, article 3, of the Constitution, which divides the powers of government into three separate departments and prohibits the exercise by one department of powers properly belonging to another.

[1, 2] It has been firmly established that there is no vested right in a remedy and that the Legislature has the power to regulate procedure in criminal cases. People v. Campbell, 59 Cal. 243, 43 Am. Rep. 257. Indeed, counsel for respondent in his brief concedes this proposition. The question in the Campbell Case under consideration was whether or not, subsequent to the adoption of the Constitution of 1879, wherein it was provided that those charged with public offenses might be proceeded against by information as well as indictment, the district attorney could by information charge an offense that had been committed prior to the adoption of the Constitution. The opinion quotes from Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, wherein it is held that "remedies must always be under the control of the Legislature." Also, the conclusions of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in Conn. ex rel. Springfield v. Hampden Commissioners of Highways, 6 Pick. 508, where the court said: "But there is no such thing as a vested right to a particular remedy. The Legislature may always alter the form of administering right and justice, and may transfer jurisdiction from one tribunal to another." This doctrine is supported by Mr. Bishop in his work on Stat-tory Crimes, § 178. Indeed, article 1, § 8, of the Constitution by its very language authorizes the Legislature to provide the detailed procedure to be followed in bringing to trial those charged with public offenses, for it says: "Offenses * * * shall be prosecuted by information, * * * or by indictment, * * * as may be prescribed by law." (Italics ours.)

Pursuant to the authority thus prescribed by the Constitution the Legislature has provided for the various steps in bringing one charged with a public offense before a magistrate for examination, and also the powers and duties of the magistrate in conducting the examination and binding the defendant over to the superior court for trial. The legislative grant of these powers has been uniformly sustained and particularly those provided in section 872 of the Penal Code. People v. Staples, 91 Cal. 23, 27 P. 523; People v. Lee Look, 143 Cal. 216, 76 P. 1028; People v. Hinshaw, 194 Cal. 1, 227 P. 156; People v. Foster, 198 Cal. 112, 243 P. 667, 671.

So, too, the Legislature has prescribed the duties and powers of the district attorney in the necessary steps after the preliminary examination up to the trial before a jury in the superior court, and also the powers of the district attorney and the court during the trial. These powers have generally been sustained as within the scope of legislative enactment. People v. Foster, supra.

Since the Nogiri Case, the amendment of an information has repeatedly been before our courts, but in every instance where this question has been discussed and the limitation of the power of the district attorney in filing an amended information upheld, the ruling has been predicated upon the lack of authority prescribed by the Legislature and not because of the inhibitions of the Constitution. In People v. Hinshaw, 194 Cal. 1, 227 P. 156, 161, the court, in discussing the validity of an amended indictment filed by the district attorney under the direction of the court said: "Appellant has cited a number of authorities to the effect that the district attorney has no authority to file an information for a different offense than the one shown by the commitment [citing cases]. These authorities involve section 809 of the Penal Code; but the distinction must be observed between charging a different offense and charging the same offense differently."

In People v. Foster, supra, the action of the trial court in permitting the district attorney to amend an information changing the name of the person alleged in the commitment and in the information to have been robbed was under attack. The court said: "Conceding that the district attorney, by virtue of section 809 of the Penal Code, is confined to the same crime in framing the information as the one designated by the magistrate in the commitment, such an exaction would not strip the Legislature of the power to authorize the correction of an error by an amendment of the information so as to correctly identify the person who was actually injured by the robbery, if the evidence taken at the preliminary examination justifies the amendment. The whole system of procedure by information is subject to control and regulation by the Legislature."

Language of similar import from other California cases might be quoted, but to do so would extend this opinion to an unwarranted length. It will suffice to observe that we have been cited to no case decided since the Nogiri decision where our Supreme Court has held, or even indicated, that the limitation of the power of the district attorney in filing an amended information, including offenses not designated in the commitment, was due to any constitutional inhibitions. The case of People v. Foster, supra, involves facts similar to those in the instant case, and presents an interesting discussion of the constitutional rights of one charged with a crime, in so far as the procedure in bringing him to trial is concerned. The original information charged the defendant with robbery, specifying that the sum of $46 was feloniously and forcibly taken from the person, possession, and immediate presence of one Mrs. Agnes Funke. During the trial it appeared from the evidence that the money was not taken from the possession and immediate presence of Agnes Funke, but was taken from the possession and immediate presence of one Freda Kneubel, another person. The defendant, upon appeal, urged that his constitutional rights were violated in the filing of the amended information without a preliminary examination upon the charge of robbing Freda Kneubel. In discussing this question, the court construed section 1008 of the Penal Code and comments thus:

"The procedure by indictment and information are so vastly different as to justify the distinction observed by section 1008 of the Penal Code, which prohibits the amendment of an indictment in such form as to change the offense charged therein and permits the amendment of an information so long as the crime stated by the amendment is supported by the evidence which was taken at the preliminary examination. By pursuing this course, the due process clauses of the federal and state Constitutions are not violated by such an amendment, for the reason that the defendant was present and was given an opportunity to defend himself throughout the entire proceedings. Hurtado v. California, 4 S. Ct. 111, 110 U. S. 516, 28 L. Ed. 232. Under our system of criminal procedure the committing magistrate is not limited in making his order of commitment to the allegations of the complaint or the crime named therein. It is his duty to commit the accused for trial for the offense disclosed by the evidence, even though it be a different offense than the one laid in the complaint [citing authorities]. In this case the accused was held to answer to the charge of robbery committed in the county of Los Angeles on a stated day. The kind of property taken is described as money and the amount thereof was $23. The crime charged in the complaint and found by the magistrate to have been committed by the defendant was robbery, with the time, place, and amount of money taken specifically stated. * * * If no constitutional right of personal liberty is violated by amended section 1008, Penal Code—and we are not aware of such violation, nor have we been cited to any authority in this state which challenges the authority of the Legislature to so regulate criminal procedure—all of the objections made by appellant as to the identity of the crime are swept aside by the amendment.”

In the case of People v. Shope, 77 Cal. App. 427, 245 P. 998, section 1008 of the Penal Code was declared the authority for amending an information under direction of the court, citing the case of People v. Foster, supra, as authority for the ruling.

In the case of People v. Milligan, 77 Cal. App. 745, 247 P. 580, 581, this court had under review the action of the trial court in permitting the district attorney to amend an information during the trial of the case. This court, after quoting section 1008 of the Penal Code, says: “The language of the statute, while stated negatively, would seem to warrant an amendment such as is here involved, provided that the substantial rights of the defendant were not prejudiced thereby and that the charge preferred by the information as amended constitutes an offense shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination, People v. Foster, 198 Cal. 112, 243 P. 667.”

[3] If, then, the power granted under section 1008 of the Penal Code to amend an information is not in conflict with constitutional provisions, and the authorities from which we have quoted as well as others which we might cite abundantly sustain the validity of this section, we are unable to conclude that the grant of power to the district attorney by the amendment to section 809 of the Penal Code is in conflict with any provision of the Constitution. All that has been and can be said from the standpoint of constitutional interpretation, reason, and logic to support the validity of section 1008 of the Penal Code may be urged with like force to sustain the amendment under consideration.

The opinion in Ex parte Nicholas, 91 Cal. 640, 28 P. 47, although written prior to the Nogiri Case, presents a well-reasoned and forceful argument in support of the conclusion we have arrived at in the instant case. Indeed, the language so succinctly and clearly stated the reasons for granting the district attorney the powers provided in the amendment that when the same question was before the court in the case of In re Severin, 183

Cal. 348, 205 P. 101, Chief Justice Shaw in writing the opinion of the court, which supports the views we here express, quoted freely from the opinion in the Nicholas Case.

In the case of People v. Barnett (Cal. App.) 278 P. 885, which, so far as we are informed is the only case decided since the adoption of the amendment in which the question of the validity of an information containing a charge not included in the commitment has been considered, the court upheld as valid the power of the district attorney to include such an offense in the information. While it is true the constitutionality of the amendment was not directly attacked, it does appear that the principal contention urged by appellant for a reversal of the judgment of conviction was that his constitutional rights were invaded by reason of the fact that a charge was included in the information that was not included in the original complaint. The court, in overruling appellant's contention, referred to the amendment to section 809 of the Penal Code as fully justifying the court's conclusion.

[4, 5] Respondent also urges that the amendment in question is void in that it attempts to clothe the district attorney, a ministerial officer with judicial power and that this is in contravention of section 1, article 3, of the Constitution, which reads as follows: “The powers of the government of the state of California shall be divided into three separate departments—the legislative, executive, and judicial; and no person charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any functions appertaining to either of the others, except as in this Constitution expressly directed or permitted.”

There is abundant authority in California giving support to legislation that vests in a legislative body, or administrative officer, judicial functions, when such acts are merely incidental to the performance of a legislative or executive function. The cases are not uniform in fixing the line of demarcation between the valid grant of such authority, and legislation which improperly intrudes upon judicial functions which are by the Constitution reserved to the judicial branch of the government. There is authority, however, for the general rule that, where the judicial act authorized is merely incidental to the main function of the legislative body, or administrative office, the grant is not void because of constitutional limitations. In fact, the exercise of this incidental judicial power by administrative officers and municipal bodies has become so common that citation of authority seems hardly necessary.

It may suffice to suggest that, in the matter of public improvements, various boards and officials clearly classified as legislative bodies and administrative officers are constantly performing judicial functions in fixing the boundaries of assessment districts; in determining whether property affected is either damaged or benefited thereby, and in fixing the amounts of such damage or benefit; in equalizing special assessments and taxes. Then, too, there are various boards and commissions which function as a part of the executive branch of the government that are frequently required to make decisions, which call for the exercise of judicial functions. Legislative enactments, authorizing the exercise of judicial functions in the various lines of activities indicated, have been in the main sustained as not invading the judicial branch of the government.

In the case of People v. Sacramento Drainage District, 155 Cal. 373, 103 P. 207, the court, answering the criticism that the act of the Legislature in creating the Sacramento drainage district was unconstitutional, for the reason, among others, that it conferred judicial powers on the board of drainage commissioners in contravention of the provisions of the Constitution delegating to the courts the exercise of judicial functions, says:

"It is insisted that this [act] either creates a court or confers judicial powers upon executive and administrative officers, in violation of the constitutional provision of sections 1 and 5 of article VI of the Constitution. That the board sitting to equalize the assessments acts judicially, must be conceded. The very purpose for which it sits is to act judicially for the correction of errors and abuses in the original assessment. But to say that for this reason the Legislature has attempted to create a court in violation of the Constitution is a proposition to which assent must be denied. Many acts, judicial in their nature, must of necessity be performed by the executive and administrative officers of the government. The decisions of such officers upon any controverted question, upon any question even in which there is play for discretion, are in their nature judicial. But because this is so, and necessarily so, it does not follow that they are usurping the exclusive functions of the courts of the land, and if they are not doing so, the power which they exercise may not be questioned. City councils and boards of supervisors annually fix the rates which water consumers within their territories shall pay to quasi public corporations furnishing such water. Here, these boards are called upon to consider and decide controverted questions of fact of great moment and of much nicety. Their decrees fixing rates contain many of the elements of a judgment. They are binding determinations upon the water company upon the one hand, and upon the consumer upon the other; yet, the power of these boards to exercise such quasi judicial functions has been upheld."

In the case of Robinson v. Kerrigan, 151 Cal. 40, 90 P. 129, 132, 121 Am. St. Rep. 90, 12 Ann. Cas. 829, the court had under consideration the constitutionality of the "Torrens Title Act." Answering an assertion that the act was unconstitutional in that it conferred upon the county recorder, an administrative officer, judicial powers, the court said:

"The claim is made, although not argued that by sections 48, 49, 55, 58, 59, 60, 61, 64, 67, and 68 of the act the registrar is given judicial powers. These sections require the registrar to note upon the duplicate certificate of title in his office the existence and general character of instruments creating liens, incumbrances, trusts, powers, or leases affecting the land described in the certificate. The point is that the registrar is required to determine the legal effect of these instruments, and that this is a judicial function which can be given only to a judicial officer. There is no force to the objection. Every administrative officer is frequently called upon in the discharge of his duties, to decide questions of law relating thereto. The recorder is required to determine whether an instrument presented for record is a deed, a mortgage, a lease, a notice of action, or what not, so as to record it in its proper book. The sheriff must often determine, for his own guidance in making a levy, the ownership of property. The clerk must determine the nature and legal effect of papers filed with him, and perform the appropriate duty respecting them. The duties required of the registrar by these sections are of the same nature. His decision in the matter is not conclusive. If he decides wrongfully and refuses to perform the appropriate duty in the premises, he may be compelled to act properly by means of a writ of mandamus, the same as any other ministerial officer who mistakes his duty under the law and refuses to perform it. The exercise of such powers by ministerial officers is a necessary function of the executive department, and, although it may require similar deliberation to that involved in the exercise of judicial power, the bestowal of such powers upon the executive department does not violate the provisions of the Constitution forbidding that department to exercise the functions of any other department." People v. Simon, 176 Ill. 165, 52 N. E. 910, 44 L. R. A. 801, 68 Am. St. Rep. 175; Land Owners v. People, 113 Ill. 296; 1 Story on Constitution (5th Ed.) § 525; Chinn v. Superior Court, 156 Cal. 478, 105 P. 580.

Many other authorities and judicial opinions holding to the same effect might be cited but we deem it unnecessary. Our conclusion, therefore, is that the amendment to section 809 of the Penal Code, passed by the Legislature in 1927, is not unconstitutional, but that the powers therein granted to the district attorney are within the power of the Legislature to authorize.

The fact that we have not discussed in detail all of the cases cited in the briefs filed herein does not indicate we have failed to give them consideration. The length of this opinion would seem to preclude further discussion of the authorities cited.

The judgment of the trial court in granting defendants' motion in arrest of judgment is reversed, and the case remanded to the trial court for pronouncement of judgment or such other proceedings as the court may be advised.

I concur: YORK, J.

HOUSER, Acting P. J. (dissenting). I dissent from the judgment. Particularly am I unable to agree that the questioned provisions of section 809 of the Penal Code are not in violation of section 8, article 1, of the Constitution of this state. By the terms of the statute, in the matter of preparing an information presumably based upon a commitment, the district attorney is authorized to exercise appellate jurisdiction over the judgment rendered by a committing magistrate. In the information the district attorney may charge not merely a lesser offense included within that for which the defendant was held to answer to the superior court, but may charge even a greater offense; or going still farther, as illustrated in the instant case, the district attorney may accuse the defendant with the commission of an offense entirely unrelated to that of which he was originally accused, or for which he was committed by the magistrate.

As a further illustration, suppose that in a given case a defendant were charged with the crime of burglary and the evidence adduced on the preliminary examination showed that after the defendant had broken into the house which was burglarized, he had suddenly been confronted by a young woman, whom he overpowered, and then, without stealing anything or further molesting the young woman, because of his fear of detection and arrest, he had made his escape from the house; and suppose that on the preliminary examination of the defendant, the committing magistrate had held the defendant to answer to the superior court for the crime of burglary: Under the provisions of section 809 of the Penal Code, the district attorney might wholly disregard the judgment of the magistrate, as evidenced by the terms of the commitment, substitute his own judgment for that of the magistrate, and file an information by which the defendant would be charged with the crime of attempted rape. Although, as remarked in some authorities, it may be that because of the fact that, with certain exceptions, owing to the fact that a justice of the peace, in order to hold his office, is not required to be licensed to practice law in all the courts of this state, and hence from a lawyer's standpoint ordinarily would not be as well qualified as a district attorney would be to correctly pass judgment upon the nature of the offense committed by the defendant, it should not be overlooked that within certain defined areas, the committing magistrate must be a qualified lawyer, and consequently in such case possibly may be a better lawyer than the district attorney. Further than that, by the provisions of section 808 of the Penal Code, besides justices of the peace, the judges of the municipal court, the judges of the superior court, and the justices of the Supreme Court are magistrates; and if, perchance, a justice of the Supreme Court should sit as a committing magistrate, perhaps it might appear incongruous that a district attorney of average ability and learning in the law should have the power to overrule the judgment of such a magistrate in the matter of the determination of the particular crime for which a defendant should be prosecuted. So much in answer to the assigned reason for the enactment of the statute in question.

In the case of People v. Anthony, 20 Cal. App. 586, 129 P. 968, 969, the provisions of section 1008 of the Penal Code were given consideration. By the terms of that statute, in force at that time, the district attorney was authorized to amend an indictment or an information "where it can be done without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant." In commenting upon the constitutionality of the statute, in part, the court said: "* * * If the Code section under discussion purported to permit an amendment to anything but the mere formal allegations of an indictment, we would have no hesitation in holding such a procedure unconstitutional. The Constitution contemplates that an indictment shall be found and presented by a grand jury (Const. art. 1, § 8); and to permit the district attorney to amend an indictment in matters of substance would in effect render the indictment no longer the finding of the grand jury. * * *

The leading case in this state, which really considers the constitutionality of the statute by which a district attorney is authorized to substitute his judgment for that of the committing magistrate regarding the offense for which the defendant is to be placed on trial, is that of People v. Nogri, 142 Cal. 596, 76 P. 490. Therein the following pertinent language appears: "* * * The result of these decisions [former adjudications by the Supreme Court of this state] is to vest in a ministerial and executive officer—the district attorney—supervisory, appellate, and judicial powers controlling the judgment of a judicial magistrate, who alone, under the Constitution, is empowered to hold the examination, and who alone is empowered to declare by his commitment the offense for which the accused person shall be put upon trial. This, we think, the law neither contemplates nor permits. The Constitution of this state (article 1, § 8) provides that 'offenses heretofore required to be prosecuted by indictment shall be prosecuted by information after examination and commitment by a magistrate.' * * * The opinion then proceeds to show that, even aside from the constitutionality of such a provision of such a statute, the statute there in question, then in force, and which before its recent amendment was the same statute here under consideration, was not broad enough in its terms to confer power on the district attorney to substantially alter a charge against a defendant as shown by the commitment of the magistrate.

The language used by the court, that " * * * there is thus neither in the Constitution nor in the laws enacted in furtherance of it the slightest vestige of judicial, discretionary, or appellate power given to the district attorney in controlling the action of the committing magistrate," certainly cannot be taken to mean that notwithstanding the constitutional inhibition, the Legislature might enact a legal statute that would permit the performance of an act in violation of the constitutional provision. It is most apparent that, if as clearly appears by the decision, a judicial magistrate "alone, under the Constitution, is empowered to hold the examination, and who alone is empowered to declare by his commitment the offense for which the accused person shall be put upon trial," any number of legislative enactments to the contrary could not legalize any act performed in pursuance of any such legislation. As supplementing the authority of People v. Nogiri, 142 Cal. 596, 76 P. 490, see Ex parte Fowler, 5 Cal. App. 549, 90 P. 958; People v. Hudson, 35 Cal. App. 234 169 P. 719; People v. Bomar, 73 Cal. App. 372, 238 P. 758.

In the case of People v. Foster, 198 Cal. 112, 243 P. 667, upon which principal reliance is placed for the conclusion reached in the majority opinion herein, the constitutionality of the statute was only incidentally mentioned and even then from a viewpoint entirely different from that here involved or under consideration. Although the effect of the decision is that by permitting the district attorney to amend the information so as to charge the defendant with robbing a person other than the one whom he was originally accused of robbing "violates no constitutional inhibition," from a reading of the entire opinion in the case, it is most apparent that the only constitutional provision which was being considered by the Supreme Court was that which relates to and which affects the "due process" rights of the defendant (section 13, art. 1) and had no relation whatsoever to section 8 of article 1, which, as pointed out by Mr. Justice Henshaw in the Nogiri Case, 142 Cal. 596, 76 P. 490, empowers the committing magistrate *"alone * *  to hold the examination, and who alone is empowered to declare by his commitment the offense for which the accused person shall be put upon trial." It is manifest that in the instant case the "due process" provision of the Constitution (section 13, art. 1) might not only not be violated, but at the same time the rights accorded to the defendant in the case by virtue of the terms of section 8, article 1 of the Constitution might be seriously infringed.

Moreover, in the Foster Case, neither in the brief presented by the appellant nor by the respondent was the issue of the constitutionality of the statutory provisions discussed or even suggested, and such consideration of the constitutionality of the statute as was given it by the Supreme Court arose from its own initiative. The force of the Foster Case as an authority upon the constitutionality of the statute here in question, as applied to section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution, is much weakened. In none of the other cases, which are dependent upon the Foster Case and to which reference is had in the majority opinion herein, is the instant constitutional question given original consideration.

WOOD v. WATERMAN et al. (Civ. 30.)

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California. Dec. 11, 1929.

1. Partnership ⇨263—Partner's withdrawal and transfer of interest to copartner dissolved partnership (Civ. Code, § 2450).

Under Civ. Code, § 2450, partnership was dissolved when one partner withdrew and transferred his interest to other partner.

2. Partnership ⇨238—One associating himself with member of former partnership to continue business thereof is not liable for its obligations, unless definitely assumed.

Agreement between partner, to whom copartner transferred his interest, and third person to associate themselves together to continue business under same firm name created a new legal entity, and incoming partner is not liable for obligations of old partnership, unless he definitely assumes them in way to create a legal liability.

3. Partnership ⇨238—One holding himself out as member of partnership for performance of former partnership's contracts is not bound, in absence of new consideration or prejudice induced thereby.

That one agreeing to associate himself with partner, to whom copartner had transferred his interests, to continue business under same firm name, held himself out as partner with transferee for performance of old partnership's contractual obligations to purchasers of realty from it, orally assured them of new concern's intent to carry out agreements, or actually contributed time and means to that end, will not bind him, in absence of new consideration or some prejudice induced by his representations.

4. Partnership ⇨238—Incoming partner's obligation for old partnership's debts must be evidenced in writing, unless arising from and part of consideration of new partnership agreement (Civ. Code, § 2794, subd. 3).

Obligation of incoming partner to be responsible for debts of old partnership must be evidenced in writing under statute of frauds, unless assumption of liability grows out of and is part of consideration of new partnership agreement within exception stated in Civ. Code, § 2794, subd. 3.

5. Appeal and error Ⓒ927(3)—Every possible inference and presumption from plaintiff's evidence must be drawn in his favor on appeal from judgment of nonsuit.

On appeal from judgment of nonsuit, given at close of plaintiff's case with no rebutting evidence of defendants, every inference and presumption that can be drawn from plaintiff's evidence must be drawn in his favor.

6. Partnership Ⓒ242(7)—Whether defendant became codefendant's partner for performance of former partnership's contracts as part of consideration of new partnership agreement held for jury.

In action to recover partial payments made under contracts to purchase realty as damages for breach thereof, evidence held sufficient to take to jury question whether one defendant entered into partnership with codefendant after execution of contracts by former partnership, of which codefendant was member, for express purpose of taking over and carrying out such agreements, and assumed such obligation of new firm as part of consideration for partnership agreement.

7. Vendor and purchaser Ⓒ339—Partners discontinuing land improvements under former partnership's sale contracts which they assumed, and releasing vendees from future payments, waived tender thereof as condition precedent to recovery of installments paid (Civ. Code, § 1511, subds. 1, 3).

Partners discontinuing and abandoning work of planting and improving land after assuming sale contracts imposing such obligation on former partnership, notifying vendees that they could not perform, and expressly releasing vendees from default in future payments, waived further performance or tender thereof by vendees as condition precedent to recovery of installments paid under Civ. Code, § 1511, subds. 1, 3.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; William F. Ellis, Judge.

Action by Carrie D. Wood against G. A. Waterman and others, copartners doing business as California Fruit Land Association. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

C. Ibeson Sweet, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Chambers & Lyman, of Los Angeles, for respondent Hill.

SLOANE, P. J. This appeal was originally taken to the Supreme Court of the state of California from a judgment of nonsuit against plaintiff in an action brought by plaintiff to recover damages in the amount of the partial payments made by plaintiff and her assignors on several contracts for the purchase of real estate.

Each and all of these contracts were entered into in the early part of 1923, and were the individual contracts of the plaintiff and her assignors, with and subscribed by "California Fruit Land Association, by John H. Wood, President, G. A. Waterman, Secretary." Each of the contracts is substantially the same as to its terms and conditions, in which the seller agrees to sell and convey certain specific tracts of land in the county of Riverside, and the vendee agrees to purchase the same at a stipulated price, payable in installments. Time is made of the essence of the contract, and the seller agrees to plant, at proper or customary planting season next following the execution of the agreement, 480 grapevines, intersert with 28 fig trees, to each acre; to cultivate and care for the same for three years, and replant dead vines or trees, and to furnish water for domestic and irrigation purposes.

It is not claimed or contended that the defendant Charles F. Hill was, at the time of the execution of these contracts, a party thereto, or in any way connected or associated with the copartnership known as California Fruit Land Association.

It is alleged in the complaint, however, and the testimony in the record tends to substantiate such allegation, that on or about June 12, 1923, the defendant John H. Wood abandoned and withdrew from said copartnership, and transferred his interest therein to the defendant G. A. Waterman, and that on or about the same date the defendant Charles F. Hill and G. A. Waterman entered into some sort of a contract of copartnership, the terms of which are not in writing, and do not definitely appear, whereby they were to assume and carry out the contracts of the vendors sued on in this action. Mr. Waterman, on the trial, testified substantially as follows: "Mr. Wood left and abandoned the business, I think, on the 11th of June, 1923, and I took over his share. At that time when Mr. Wood went out, I made an oral agreement with Mr. Hill in regard to this business and as to these contracts. This was approximately the middle of June, 1923. I told him for a certain stipulated amount—I don't remember the exact amount—which would cover Mr. Wood's side of it, I would give him a half interest in the business on just the same basis as Wood and I had been working on previously. I told him I would like to have him take Mr. Wood's place by paying in a certain amount and becoming a half interest partner with me. I don't know just what Mr. Hill did say in reply, except that he agreed to come in with me, and went with me to see all these purchasers and talked matters over and found out just what the status of the business was, and expressed himself to the purchasers that he was in with me as a partner on this project. He told them that he was my partner.

Mr. Hill told Miss Wood (the plaintiff here), that we were going to take care of that situation, and told about his experience on work of this kind, and assured her that everything would be all right. I mean in regard to these contracts. I think we had the contracts with us. I can't say they were produced at the time; as I stated, Mr. Hill told Miss Wood that he had come into partnership with me, and that together we would carry out the contract and the plans for the work. With regard to carrying out these contracts, Mr. Hill went with me a great many times to Arlington, paid for wire and expenses and different things, and furnished the money, and we went on and also collected up—these were on a monthly payment basis—and the contract holders paid regularly and we carried on until—it was a very unfavorable season—until conditions got so that without irrigation we saw there was no use going on and spending the money, and we finally had to give up the work, and in the meantime Mr. Hill was going back and forth with me and advancing money for the project. We gave up that work about the first of September, 1923. The payments under the contract were made to me. Mr. Hill did not receive any of the money."

The witness Waterman also testified that about the first part of 1924 the contract holders were notified that this sale of these particular pieces of land described in the various contracts could not be carried out by the sellers, and that the conditions could not be met with that were incorporated in those contracts, and that he gave the contract holders a little agreement to the effect that the non-payment of their installments would not jeopardize any interest they had there, and that since 1923 the sellers had done nothing to fulfill the contracts in regard to the cultivation of these lands, and the planting and keeping up of the same, and it appears that by reason of lack of irrigation and cultivation all improvements on the land were abandoned, and that the lands in question reverted to their barren and uncultivated state, and have ever since so remained. The facts, as set out in the foregoing synopsis of Mr. Waterman's testimony, afford the only evidence of any obligation on the part of Hill to carry out the terms of the written contracts or to respond to plaintiff or the other contracting parties in damages.

The total amount paid in by plaintiff and her assignors under these contracts toward the agreed purchase price is the sum of $6,937.70. The amount of the unpaid installments under the contracts in question is not set forth, but it is conceded that no payments thereon were made after January, 1924, and that no tender or offer to pay thereon was made thereafter and before the commencement of this action. The vendees continued installment payments after Hill came into the business, but in what amounts does not appear.

At the close of plaintiff's case a motion for nonsuit was made in behalf of defendant Hill on the grounds (1) that the complaint does not state a cause of action against Hill; (2) that the evidence is insufficient to show liability of defendant Hill on the contracts for purchase and sale, and that no agreement in writing assuming such liability, is alleged or shown in the evidence. The motion for nonsuit was granted, and the court made its judgment that said action "be and is hereby dismissed with prejudice as to the defendant Hill."

It is undisputed that Hill was not a party to the execution of the contracts in question, and that, if he can be held for any liability for the subsequent failure of performance on the part of the vendors, such liability must arise upon an enforceable assumption of such liability in the subsequent partnership arrangement with defendant Waterman.

[1] The original partnership doing business as the California Fruit Land Association consisted of J. A. Waterman and John H. Wood. When Wood withdrew and transferred his interest to Waterman in January, 1923, this partnership was dissolved. 20 Cal. Jur. 794; Shuken v. Cohen, 179 Cal. 279, 176 P. 447; Civ. Code, § 2450.

[2, 3] If Waterman and the defendant Hill entered into an agreement to associate themselves together to continue the business under the same name, it nevertheless created a new legal entity. (Painter's Executors v. Painter, 6 Cal. Unrep. 677, 65 P. 135), in which the incoming partner would not be liable for the obligations of the old partnership, unless he definitely assumed such obligations in a way to create a legal liability. The fact that he may have held himself out as a partner with Waterman for carrying on this contractual business, and even orally assured the vendees that it was the intention of the new concern to carry out the terms of the agreements, or that he actually contributed of his time and means to that end, will not bind him in the absence of a new consideration, or some prejudice suffered by the contract holders induced by his representations.

In the suit of First National Bank v. Simmons, 98 Cal. 287, 33 P. 197, 198, an action on a promissory note executed by the copartnership, where it was attempted to hold a third party, who had subsequently come into the partnership, for liability on a note, the court says: "Assuming, for the purpose of this appeal, that the evidence tends to prove a transfer of the interest of Charles F. to E. M. Hall between August 1, and October 1, 1890, and also that Simmons accepted E. M. Hall as a partner at the time of the transfer, yet these facts alone did not make E. M. Hall responsible on the note upon which this action is brought, which had been made by the firm.

composed of Simmons and Charles F. Hall a year before E. M. Hall came into the firm. In order to make E. M. Hall liable on that note it must have been proved that in some way he assumed the obligation created by it. Smith v. Millard, 77 Cal. 440, 19 P. 824; Lindl. Partn. (2d Amer. Ed.) marg. p. 205 et seq. Of this, however, there is no evidence whatever."

[4] It is the recognized rule that, where an obligation of an incoming partner to be responsible for the debts of the old partnership is alleged, such obligation must be evidence in writing under the statute of frauds, unless the assumption of liability grows out of and is part of the consideration of the new partnership agreement.

Exceptions to this rule that a promise to answer for an obligation of another must be in writing is contained in section 2794 of the Civil Code. Subdivision 3 of this section provides, among other exceptions, that such promise need not be in writing when it is made "upon a consideration beneficial to the promisor, whether moving from either party to the antecedent obligation, or from another person."

[5, 6] In the instant case the evidence introduced on the trial tends to show that a partnership agreement was entered into between Waterman and Hill whereby, as part of the consideration, the new partnership was to take over and carry out the terms of these sales contracts.

The case of Stover v. Stevens, 21 Cal. App., 261, 131 P. 332, 333, presents a somewhat similar state of facts to that involved in this appeal. The plaintiff brought his action to recover for merchandise sold and delivered, and work and labor performed, against L. C. Stevens and S. F. Brown, copartners as Stevens & Brown, and on assigned contracts and liabilities of Stevens. The indebtedness was originally created as an obligation of Stevens, who had been carrying on the business prior to the alleged copartnership with Brown. The action was sought to be maintained against Brown on the ground that the new copartnership had assumed the Stevens indebtedness.

The court in the opinion says:

"Appellant addresses himself first to the personal claim of plaintiff, claiming that there is no evidence of any indebtedness of the firm of Stevens & Brown to plaintiff, and that the finding can only be sustained on the theory that Brown assumed the personal indebtedness of Stevens; that there is neither pleading, evidence, nor finding that defendant Brown agreed to pay or assumed the indebtedness of Stevens existing prior to the partnership. Cases are cited as holding that an incoming partner is not liable for the debts of the old firm, unless he agrees to become so. It is also contended 'that, in order to recover the debts of the old firm from an incoming partner, there must be some allegation in the complaint connecting him with the liability.' And that the court erred in overruling defendant's objection to evidence tending to prove an indebtedness existing prior to the formation of the partnership. In nearly all the claims the evidence related to the prior indebtedness of Stevens, as well as to the firm indebtedness.

* * *

"The point raised as to the statute of frauds must be decided in view of the circumstances attending the transaction or formation of the partnership. There was evidence that some time prior to the formation of the partnership Stevens had been carrying on the butcher's business, selling meats and some other articles at the towns of Prattville and Greenville. A few days prior to June 27, 1910, he took defendant Brown over his delivery route and explained the business to him. He explained in a general way how the business stood, what his liabilities were, and what the book accounts receivable and other assets amounted to. Upon this showing Brown agreed to enter into partnership, which began June 27, 1910. Upon the terms of the agreement there is some conflict between the testimony of Stevens and Brown. Stevens testified:

"Q. What, if any understanding was had between you and the defendant Brown as to the assumption by you and the defendant Brown or the partnership of the indebtedness existing at that time? A. Well, the only thing that was said about that, I figured up my indebtedness and my resources, and Mr. Brown agreed to put in as much money in the business as I had invested, over and above my liabilities, assuming a portion of the debt and also assuming the resources, his portion of the resources, and I took credit for the amount of the resources over and above my liabilities. * * *

"Q. What was Brown to get for his in consideration of that agreement? What—Just state the whole agreement again. A. He was to get—he was to have one-half interest in my butcher business, personal property, and my book accounts, and he was to assume his one-half interest of the liabilities.

"Q. What liabilities? A. That I owed at the time of the commencement of the partnership; debts that I owed to my creditors.

"Q. What was he to get out of the produce of the business from that time on? A. He was to have half of the profits—I supposed he was a full partner—a half interest. * * *

"Q. What was the consideration he was to pay you for that arrangement? A. I was to have credit for the difference between the resources and liabilities of the business and what I put into it.

"Q. Was that arrangement made on a trip down to the river? A. I couldn't state what day that arrangement was made; it was made prior to the 26th day of June.

"Q. * * * What did he say about the agreement? A. He was satisfied with it; he didn't make any objection to me; went into the business and put his money into it.

"Q. Was anything said about these old debts of yours should be paid? A. I told him at the time that I wouldn't take him in unless he would assume part of the debts and take his chances on the book accounts the same as I had to; I couldn't close the business out and start in new, carrying on the business as it was if he would." * * *

"It appeared that the list of accounts was made up shortly after June 27, 1910, showing the liabilities and assets, which was shown to Brown. At the beginning of the copartnership the firm commenced to deal with its said creditors, paying off their indebtedness in money or supplying them with meat, and in some instances making purchases from them. The evidence tends to show that Brown entered upon and continued the relation upon the terms testified to by Stevens." * * *

"Appellant contends that Brown's assumption of Stevens' debts was after the formation of the partnership, and that this subsequent agreement would be an agreement to pay the debts of another, and must be established in compliance with the statute of frauds, citing Freeman v. Badgley, 105 Cal. 373, 38 P. 955. The evidence is that the assumption of Stevens' debts was part of the agreement and consideration in forming the partnership. It is true that the assets and liabilities or the names and amount due each creditor were not then definitely known, but the facts were to be made known by a statement being prepared, and was soon after made out and shown to Brown and acted upon by the firm as correct." * * *

"The facts here do not bring the case within the provisions of section 1624 of the Civil Code (the statute of frauds), but within the exception mentioned in subdivision 2 of that section, to wit, the provisions of section 2794 of the same Code."

12 California Jurisprudence, at page 869, under the title of "Statute of Frauds," states the rule thus: "Whenever a promise to answer to antecedent obligation of another, is made upon a fresh consideration beneficial to the promisor, no matter from what source it may move, the promise is an original one, and valid, though oral"—citing Civ. Code, § 2794, subd. 3; Garraway v. Jennings, 189 Cal. 97, 207 P. 554; Fuller v. Towne, 184 Cal. 89, 193 P. 88.

Promises following within this rule are based upon a multitude of highly varied circumstances, as shown by this and following sections, and include a promise to pay the debt of another, made as a part of the settlement of an indebtedness existing between the promisor and the creditor.

At page 871, supra, it is said: "The assumption of his proportionate share of the existing liabilities of a business by one entering into a partnership, as a part of the partnership agreement, is an original undertaking. It falls within the exceptions of section 2794 of the Civil Code, and may be sustained, though verbal, either as a promise made by one who has received property of another upon undertaking to apply it pursuant to the promise, or as a promise to pay the antecedent obligation of another, made upon a consideration beneficial to the promisor. But such a promise is within the statute, if it is made subsequently to the partnership agreement."

The case of Freeman v. Badgley, 105 Cal. 372, 38 P. 955, lays down this latter rule that an agreement made after the partnership is formed, whereby the new partner agrees to assume the debts of the old firm, is an agreement to pay the debt of another, and must be established in compliance with the provisions of the statute of frauds. But this same decision holds that, if the assumption of liability for the obligations of the old firm is part of the consideration given for an interest in the business, it is supported by the consideration of the original contracts.

The evidence relating to the partnership agreement between Waterman and Hill, and the assumption of the obligations of the old firm, is somewhat meager and indefinite, but it must be borne in mind that the judgment here is one of nonsuit, given at the close of plaintiff's case, and with no rebutting evidence on the part of defendant.

Under such condition, every inference and presumption that can be drawn from the evidence of plaintiff must be drawn in his favor. And it cannot be said in this case that the evidence of the defendant Waterman does not tend to support the contention that defendant Hill, subsequent to the execution of the sales contracts, entered into a partnership with Waterman for the express purpose of taking over and carrying out these sales agreements, and that as part of the consideration for the partnership agreement he assumed obligation on the part of the new firm to carry out the terms of these sales contracts. 9 Cal. Jur., p. 551, sec. 35, and citations.

[7] This liability being assumed, we think it is clear that it was unnecessary, under the circumstances of this case, for the plaintiff to allege or prove a tender of the unpaid installments on the purchase price of the lands before bringing suit to recover installments paid.

It appears from the undisputed evidence that, after Waterman and Hill had assumed and taken over these contracts and entered upon the work of planting and improving the lands, they discontinued and abandoned the same, notified the vendees that they could not carry out their agreement of sale, permitted the property to revert to its barren and uncultivated condition, and expressly released them from any default in future payments.

This constituted a waiver of further performance or tender of performance on the part of plaintiff. Civ. Code, § 1511, subds. 1 and 3; Merrill v. Merrill, 95 Cal. 334, 30 P. 542; Seals v. Davis, 25 Cal. App. 68, 142 P. 905; Duncanson v. Walton, 111 Cal. 516, 44 P. 174.

As the question of defendant Hill's personal liability to plaintiff in this action remains to be determined on a new trial, it is unnecessary to determine whether he holds the 40 acres of land, a part of the tract contracted to be conveyed to plaintiff and her assignors, in trust for the contract holders, or as an asset of the partnership.

The judgment of nonsuit is reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

We concur; BARNARD, J.; MARKS, J.

2. Trial ⇨133(6)—It cannot be said that trial court erred, or attorney was guilty of prejudicial misconduct, where objection was sustained to question involving hearsay, and jury admonished to disregard incident.

Where witness was asked question involving hearsay in action for injuries in automobile accident, and objection was sustained, and court admonished jury to disregard incident, it cannot be said that trial court erred, or that attorney was guilty of prejudicial misconduct, even admitting that question was erroneous.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1069(1)—That juror drew diagram of scene of accident and showed it to fellow juror held not prejudicial to defendant, in view of unanimous verdict.

That juror in personal injury action stopped at scene of accident and drew diagram of street, and later showed diagram to fellow juror, who could not see, because he did not have glasses on, held not prejudicial to defendant, in view of unanimous verdict for plaintiff.

4. Automobiles ⇨246(56)—Instruction respecting speed limit in intersection held not erroneous where it was controverted issue whether accident occurred in intersection.

In action for injuries sustained from being knocked down by defendant's automobile, instruction which was copy of statute respecting speed limit in intersection held not erroneous, as against contention that accident occurred 3 feet distant from intersection, where that was one of controverted issues.

5. Automobiles ⇨246(4)—In automobile case, instruction held not erroneous for using word "negligence," without such words as "if any."

In action for injuries from being knocked down by defendant's automobile, instructions held not erroneous for use of word "negligence," without following it by such words as "if any," where neither instruction, when read with others, may be said to instruct on question of fact.

6. Trial ⇨194(16)—Instruction that plaintiff, crossing street, must look in direction from which traffic might legally be approaching, did not trespass on jury's functions.

In action for injuries from being knocked down by defendant's automobile, instruction that plaintiff, starting to cross street, was bound to look in direction in which traffic might legally be approaching, held not to trespass on functions of jury.

7. Appeal and error ⇨1064(4)—Use in instruction of expression "injuries alleged," instead of "injuries proved," if erroneous, held not prejudicial under evidence.

In action for injuries received in automobile accident, instruction, if erroneous, held not prejudicial, for use of expression "injuries alleged," instead of "injuries proved," where plaintiff introduced some evidence to prove each alleged injury, and proved injuries not alleged, and proved certain injuries permanent, which were not alleged to be permanent.

8. Trial ⇨296(11)—In action for injuries in automobile accident, instruction on damages, though erroneous, held not prejudicial, in view of evidence and other instructions (Civ. Code, § 3283).

In action for injuries received in automobile accident, instruction on damages, though erroneous, under Civ. Code, § 3283, in not stating plaintiff entitled to recover amount certain to result in future, held not prejudicial, in view of other instructions and evidence.

9. Trial ⇨253(4)—Instruction on burden of proof held not erroneous for not including statement as to contributory negligence.

In action for injuries received in automobile accident, instruction on burden of proof held not erroneous for not including statement of how contributory negligence might be proved or inferred.

10. Damages ⇨132(14)—$10,700 held not excessive for fractured collar bone, leg, and ribs, lacerations, bruises, and injury to hearing.

$10,700 held not excessive for lacerations on scalp, elbow, and leg, fracture of collar bone and leg, three broken ribs, bruises, and injury to hearing, resulting in some permanent injury.

11. Appeal and error ⇨1002—Where evidence is conflicting, reviewing court cannot declare plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, and cannot disturb verdict.

Where there was conflict in evidence as to contributory negligence in action for injuries in automobile accident, reviewing court cannot say that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, and is not at liberty to disturb verdict of jury, based on such conflicting evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edmund P. Morgan, Judge.

Action by Mary A. Hasty against Lois Trevillian and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Charles W. Haswell, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Vincent W. Hallinan and Edwin M. Otis, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to recover a judgment for damages for injuries sustained from being knocked down by an automobile driven by one of the defendants. The defendants answered, and a trial was had before the trial court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict for $15,000 against the defendants. The defendants made a motion for a new trial. The court ordered the motion granted, unless the plaintiff consented to reduce the verdict to $10,700. The consent was given, and the motion was denied. From the judgment entered on the verdict as reduced, the defendants have appealed, and have brought up a typewritten record.

[1] The accident occurred about 8 p. m. on the 6th day of August, 1927, at the intersection of Nineteenth avenue and Noriega street in San Francisco. There was evidence that the night was clear and that it was not dark. When the jury was being selected, the plaintiff asked several of them whether they owned stock or bonds in any insurance company engaged in writing indemnity insurance. Objections were interposed by the defendants, but the objections were overruled. The rulings were not erroneous. Dougherty v. Ellingson (Cal. App.) 275 P. 456. Each of two other jurors was asked if he was similarly interested in the Independent Indemnity Company. Objections were made and overruled. It has also been held that the latter question, standing alone, is not error. Williamson v. Hardy, 47 Cal. App. 377, 190 P. 646.

The defendants argue that, if the verdict is excessive or the case made by the plaintiff is weak, such questions constitute prejudicial error. An examination of the record will disclose that the instant case cannot be said to fall within the rule last stated. As we have shown below, the verdict was not excessive; and the plaintiff introduced evidence tending to show that at the time of the impact the defendant driver was driving on her left-hand side of the street at a speed of 45 miles per hour. If the jury believed that evidence, then it cannot be said the case of the plaintiff was weak.

While considering the alleged misconduct of the plaintiff's attorney it may be noted that certain statements, made by him while arguing the case, are also assigned as errors. We have examined them. The statements complained of were not errors, but were legitimate argument.

[2] When Mrs. Leonhardt, the mother of one of the defendants, was on the stand, plaintiff's attorney asked her a question involving hearsay. An objection was made and sustained, and the court admonished the jury to disregard the incident. Freely admitting that the question was erroneous under the circumstances delineated, we are unable to say that the trial court erred, or that the attorney for the plaintiff was guilty of prejudicial misconduct.

[3] After the jury was impaneled, and during a recess, one of the jurors, Mr. Rodini, on his way home, stopped at the scene of the accident and drew a diagram of the intersecting streets. He put the diagram in his pocket and later showed it to a fellow juror. However, that juror could not see, because he did not have his glasses on. The defendants assert that the juror was guilty of misconduct in drawing the diagram and of exhibiting it to a fellow juror. When the incident was called to the attention of the trial court, the trial court inquired into the whole matter with much care. It offered to send the entire jury to see the spot, but defendants objected. Assuming, for the purpose of this decision, that Mr. Rodini formed certain conclusions from what he saw at the scene of the accident, it is clear that such conclusions were not communicated to other jurors. The verdict of the jury was unanimous. Without the vote of Mr. Rodini there were eleven jurors who voted for the verdict. It is plain that the defendants were not prejudiced by the incident.

[4-9] The defendants attack many of the instructions given by the trial court. Instruction No. 37 was a copy of the statute regarding the speed limit in traversing intersections. The defendants claim that the accident did not occur in an intersection, but 3 feet distant therefrom. But that was one of the controverted issues involved in the case. The defendants objected to instructions 41 and 42, because those instructions used the word "negligence," without following the same by such words as "if any." It is sufficient to state that neither instruction, when read together with all of the other instructions, may be said to instruct on a question of fact. Smith v. Hollander, 85 Cal. App. 535, 259 P. 958.

In instruction No. 40 the trial court instructed the jury that, as the plaintiff started to cross Nineteenth avenue, she was bound to look in the direction in which traffic might legally be approaching, and that when she passed the median line that it was her duty to look in the opposite direction. Of that instruction the defendants may not complain. It did not trespass on the functions of the jury.

Instructions 12 and 27 used the expressions "injuries alleged," instead of "injuries proved." The plaintiff introduced some evidence to prove each alleged injury. Furthermore, she proved injuries not alleged, and she proved certain injuries to be permanent, which were not alleged to be permanent. It cannot be seen that the error, if any, was in the least degree prejudicial to the defendants.

Instruction 28 was as follows: "The fact that she was not in the receipt of any salary or wages, but was attending to her own business, does not deprive her of the right to compensation for the loss of her earning capacity, since it was what she was capable of earning, rather than what she was actually earning, that is to be considered by the jury. If by reason of the injury she has become unable to perform the labor or transact the business which she was accustomed to transact or perform prior thereto, she is entitled to recover damages therefor, and, from the nature of the investigation, the amount of such recovery must be left to the wise discretion of the jury." The defendants claim, in effect, that the last clause should read, "* * * She is entitled to recover, as damages therefor, the amount that is certain to result in the future." Civ. Code, § 3283.

The contention is sound. Nevertheless, conceding that the instruction was erroneously worded, we think the defendants suffered no prejudice, for two distinct reasons. Elsewhere the trial court had given other instructions on cognate subjects, which fully advised the jury that it was not to indulge in conjecture or speculation, but should base its verdict solely on the law and the evidence. In the second place, when the trial court commenced to instruct the jury, it recited the allegations contained in plaintiff's complaint and the denials by the defendants. It recited the allegations that the plaintiff was 79 years of age; that she had been, down to the date of the accident, engaged as a housewife, receiving what amounted to $25 per month; that in the accident she suffered such injuries that, at the time of the trial, which was held about one year thereafter, the plaintiff was wholly disabled from earning anything, and that she "* * * will be damaged for the balance of her natural life in the sum of $25 per month." Mortality tables were introduced, showing that her expectancy was 5 years. The plaintiff introduced evidence to prove her allegations. The defendants did not attempt to rebut that proof. On this element of damage the plaintiff was, therefore, entitled to recover $1,500. The record wholly fails to show that the jury allowed more.

The defendants complain because instruction number 4 did not inform the jury that contributory negligence may be inferred from the testimony given on behalf of the plaintiff. The instruction dealt solely with a statement as to where the burden of proof rested. As to how contributory negligence may be proved or inferred was the subject-matter of other instructions. The trial court did not err in failing to combine all of its instructions into just one instruction.

[10] The defendants complain that the damages were excessive. An examination of the record discloses that the plaintiff suffered lacerations on the scalp, left elbow, and on one leg. The last was very slow in healing. She sustained a fracture of the left collar bone, which, in due time, properly knitted. She sustained a comminuted fracture of the upper end of the tibia and the lower end of the femur in the right leg. A poor setting was obtained, and the knitting has resulted in a deformed leg, on which the plaintiff will never be able to walk, but will be compelled to use crutches the rest of her life. The plaintiff also suffered three broken ribs and was also greatly bruised on her side. She was compelled to remain in hospitals over two months. Before the accident the plaintiff was hard of hearing. While at the hospital her hearing became much worse. At the time of the trial she testified that it was much worse than before the accident. Considering the injuries and the permanency of some of them, a judgment in the sum of $10,700 cannot be said, as a matter of law, to be excessive. Bisinger v. Sacramento Lodge No. 6, 187 Cal. 578, 203 P. 768.

[11] Finally, in two different forms, the defendants assert that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The defendants quote some of the evidence. They particularly stress the story as told by the plaintiff. As she was knocked unconscious, it is but reasonable to suppose that she may not be altogether clear regarding her statements of the facts. A disinterested eyewitness stood at his window, looking directly at her. The most that can be said is that there was a conflict in the evidence. Under those circumstances, we may not say that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, nor are we at liberty to disturb the verdict of the jury based on conflicting evidence.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

SEABOARD SURETY CORPORATION OF AMERICA v. MUNICIPAL COURT OF CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (L. A.
11648.) ★

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 23, 1929.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 20, 1930.

Ball ~~6~~79(1)—Motion to set aside bail forfeiture held properly denied, where defendant's failure to appear was inexcusable though not with connivance of bail (Pen. Code, § 1305, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1386; Pen. Code, § 1306, as amended by St. 1929, p. 1872).

Where failure of defendant charged with petit theft to appear on day fixed for probation and sentence was inexcusable but not with connivance of bail, motion to set aside order forfeiting bail held properly denied under Pen. Code, § 1305, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1386, requiring not only that defendant be free from fault but that bail be likewise free from intentional interference on its part, especially in view of Pen. Code, § 1306, as amended by St. 1929, p. 1872, providing for return of bail money within year after entry of judgment of forfeiture under certain circumstances.

Shenk, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Application by the Seaboard Surety Corporation of America for writ of mandamus prayed to be directed to the Municipal Court of the City of Los Angeles, County of Los Angeles, and Georgia P. Bullock, Judge of Division 6 thereof, to compel respondents to set aside order forfeiting bail. Writ denied.

Rehearing denied; SHENK, J., dissenting.

Arthur T. Stollmack, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Lloyd S. Nix, City Prosecutor, and Joe W. Matherly and F. W. Fellows, Deputy City Prosecutors, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. The petition for writ of mandate herein is denied. The application involves solely a construction of section 1305 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1386, c. 735). The Legislature at that time extended the period from 20 to 90 days within which the court may direct the forfeiture of the undertaking to be discharged, but at the same time added a provision respecting the surety upon the bail bond. After amendment, the language of the section in this connection was as follows: "But if at any time within ninety days after such entry in the minutes, the defendant and his bail appear and satisfactorily excuse his neglect, and show to the satisfaction of the court that the absence of the defendant was not with the connivance of the bail, the court may direct the forfeiture of the undertaking or the deposit to be discharged upon such terms as may be just."

Petitioner asserts that we should ascribe to the word "and," as it appears before the word "show" in the above quotation, the meaning of "or." The effect of this construction, if allowed, would be, not to provide that both defendant and bail be without default, but to permit relief where defendant's absence was willful so long as the bail was acting in good faith. In other words, petitioner's contention is that a surety, if acting in good faith, has 90 days after the failure of a defendant, whether excusable or not, to appear, within which to produce him and be relieved from a forfeiture of the undertaking. We are pointed to such cases as Washburn v. Lyons, 97 Cal. 314, 32 P. 310, People v. Pool, 27 Cal. 573, 581, and Abbey v. Board of Directors, 58 Cal. App. 757, 760, 209 P. 709, as illustrating the fact that in construing some statutes the word "and" has been substituted for the word "or" and vice versa. But a consideration of the terms of this statute does not warrant such a construction of said word.

It is our view that the Legislature intended, not only that a defendant be free from fault, but that the bail be likewise free from intentional interference on his part. It is suggested that if a defendant be free from fault, the surety must of necessity be free also. But this does not necessarily follow, for it may be easily supposed that a defendant was acting in ignorance of his duty to appear and the surety on his bond was at the same time acting with design to prevent his appearance. The construction which we place on this section is illuminated by the more recent amendment to section 1306 of the Penal Code, enacted in 1929 (St. 1929, p. 1872, c. 849). This section provides that under certain specified conditions, a surety may, if acting in good faith, secure a return of the bail money if he produces the defendant within one year after the entry of the judgment of forfeiture, and this is followed by a conviction of the defendant of the highest charge embraced in the complaint or information or indictment. This would seem to be the full measure of relief that a surety in any case may have. It is true that the above provision was added since 1927, but nevertheless we see no reason to omit a consideration of its provisions in our effort to ascertain the true legislative intent at the time of the amendment here in question.

The facts of this case as shown by the record are as follows: Mamie Jacobs and John Morelli were complained against in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles, presided over by Hon. Georgia P. Bullock, for the offense of petit theft. On February 14, 1929, after entering pleas of guilty, they applied for probation. The cause was continued to February 20, 1929, for hearing on the application for probation and sentence; bail in the sum of $500 was fixed to insure their appearance on said day. Defendants, however, failed and neglected to appear and, no cause being shown for said neglect, the bail was ordered forfeited. On March 13, 1929, defendants were surrendered into court by said Seaboard Surety Company, were sentenced by the court, and duly committed to the Los Angeles city jail. On April 12, 1929, said Seaboard Surety Company moved the court that said forfeiture be set aside and vacated and that the bail be exonerated. The motion was ordered submitted on briefs. The court thereafter, on June 5, 1929, found that the neglect of said defendants to appear was inexcusable, but that it was not with the connivance of the bail, and therefore, solely upon the ground that defendants could not excuse their said neglect to appear in court as ordered, and for no other reason, said court ordered that said motion to set aside the bail forfeiture be denied. Thereafter said surety filed its petition for writ of mandate herein, which we have been led to deny.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; CURTIS, J.; RICHARDS, J.; SEAWELL, J.; LANGDON, J.

SHENK, J. (dissenting). I take it to be self-evident that the purpose of bail is to insure the appearance of the defendant when required, and that the public interest is better subserved by having a fugitive or absconding defendant returned to the court to meet the requirements of justice than by swelling the public coffers with forfeited bail money. This was undoubtedly the underlying purpose and intent of the Legislature by the amendment in 1927 of section 1305 of the Penal Code. Prior to the amendment the surety on the bail bond was without the remedy of having the order forfeiting bail discharged even though he surrendered the defendant to the court within the 20-day period, where the neglect of the defendant was not satisfactorily excused. This was true with or without the connivance of the bail in the wrongdoing of the defendant. It is inconceivable that the Legislature intended, by the amendment of 1927, to do no more than enlarge the time when the defendant might return or be surrendered by the surety to the court from 20 to 90 days. But this is the effect of the main opinion and the amendment of 1927 is otherwise rendered meaningless and nugatory. The obvious purpose of the amendment was to offer an incentive or inducement to the surety to locate and apprehend the defaulting defendant and the time was enlarged to 90 days for that purpose. Under the main opinion the surety, without fault, is in no better position than he was under the old statute. He may exert much effort and go to much expense in locating the defendant and surrendering him to the court and, however blameless and free from connivance in the wrongdoing of the defendant he may be, he is entirely helpless unless the defendant satisfactorily excuse his failure to appear at the time appointed.

I cannot subscribe to the argument of the majority that a defendant may be found to be entirely blameless and still the bail be guilty of connivance with him. The word "connivance," as applied to one party (in this instance the surety), presupposes some unlawful or wrongful act or omission on the part of another (here the defaulting defendant); that is, some feigned ignorance or acquiescence or encouragement of the surety in the wrongdoing. All of the definitions of the term "connivance" are to this effect. Oakland Bank of Savings v. Wilcox, 60 Cal. 126, at page 137, approved an instruction that "connivance is an agreement or consent, directly or indirectly given, that something unlawful shall be done by another." One may not connive with himself any more than he may conspire with himself. It requires at least two persons to connive. Excusable neglect is incompatible with the existence of connivance and when a defendant has "connived" there can be no excusable neglect. The Legislature could have had no reason to extend the time for the appearance of the defendant from 20 to 90 days except to give the surety the opportunity and incentive to apprehend the defendant, return him to the court and, by showing that the default of the defendant, without excuse, was not with the connivance of the surety, enable the latter to save himself from the forfeiture. In no way may this manifestly intended and beneficial result be accomplished except by reading the word "and" as "or" in the amended section.

The amendment in 1929 of section 1306 of the Penal Code, in my opinion, throws no light at all favorable to the construction placed on section 1305 by the majority. Quite to the contrary, section 1306 is in complete harmony with the construction of section 1305 as contended for by the petitioner. The relief from the forfeiture provided for in section 1305 relates to a time within the 90-day period and before any judgment on the bail bond has or could be entered. The relief provided for in section 1306 relates to the time between the entry of the judgment on the bail bond and one year thereafter. Under the latter section the absence of connivance on the part of the surety may be shown by affidavit only, and the relief may be granted to the surety, however culpable the defendant may have been in his default. To say that a non-conniving surety may be relieved under section 1306 as against a grossly offending defendant provided such defendant be returned to court within one year after the entry of the judgment on the bond, and may not be relieved under section 1305 when such a defendant is returned to court within 90 days after the order of forfeiture, is to do violence to the plain meaning and intent of the Legislature in the amendment of section 1305 and reduce the law to an absurdity.

MACARIO v. MACARIO. (S. F. 13600.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 24, 1929.

Appeal and error $\S$ 458(2)—Supersedeas will issue, where plaintiff's insolvency reasonably necessitates stay of execution sale to protect defendant from serious injury if judgment is reversed.

Where it appears that plaintiff is insolvent and will not be able to respond should defendant's realty be sold under execution and judgment reversed on appeal, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 963, subd. 2, from order denying motion to quash writ of execution, that appeal was taken in good faith, not merely for delay, and that a stay is reasonably necessary to protect defendant from serious injury in case of reversal, while it does not appear that plaintiff will sustain disproportionate injury in case of affirmance, writ of supersedeas to stay sale will issue on defendant's giving sufficient bond.

In Bank.

Suit by Margaret Macario against Giuseppe Macario. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant applied for a writ of supersedeas to stay proceedings pending appeal from an order denying his motion to recall and quash a writ of execution. Writ granted.

D. C. Barrett and Barrett & Barrett, all of San Francisco, for plaintiff.

Edward J. Jose, of San Francisco, for defendant.

SHENK, J. The defendant and appellant filed his application for a writ of supersedeas to stay proceedings to enforce a judgment of the trial court, and particularly to stay the sale under a writ of execution levied on said judgment, pending the determination of his appeal from an order of the trial court denying his motion to recall and quash said writ of execution.

On July 31, 1919, the superior court, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, granted to Margaret Macario, the plaintiff and respondent above named, an interlocutory decree of divorce from Giuseppe Macario, the defendant and appellant, and, among other matters, granted to said Margaret Macario the custody of the minor child of said parties, who was then residing in the kingdom of Italy, and the sum of $10 per month for the support of said minor. A final decree of divorce including similar provisions was entered on August 3, 1920. On July 13, 1928, said Margaret Macario caused a writ of execution of said judgment to be issued out of said superior court. On motion of the petitioner herein, the superior court, on June 21, 1929, made an order recalling said writ of execution, but without prejudice to the issuance of a new writ. Thereafter and on the same day, on the ex parte application of Margaret Macario, a new writ of execution was issued out of said superior court, which was levied on real property of the petitioner located in the city and county of San Francisco. The petitioner moved to recall said writ of execution and for a perpetual stay of execution, on the ground that said superior court had no jurisdiction to order execution of the judgment in the divorce action which pertained to the custody of said minor or its support. The motion was denied, and said Giuseppe Macario has appealed from the order denying said motion, which appeal is now pending and undetermined.

It is not questioned that the order denying the motion to recall and quash the execution is an appealable order (Code Civ. Proc., § 963, subd. 2; see Parker v. Parker, 203 Cal. 787, 266 P. 283; Montgomery v. Meyerstein, 195 Cal. 37, 231 P. 730), nor that, where the appeal is not from the judgment, execution of which is sought to be stayed, but rather is from an order made after judgment denying a motion to recall and quash execution, an appeal from the latter and the giving of a bond thereon is not effective to stay execution of the judgment itself (Weldon v. Rogers, 154 Cal. 632, 98 P. 1070), and that this court may, if the circumstances justify the order, and in the exercise of its inherent jurisdiction, provide for a stay by the issuance of a writ of supersedeas (Halsted v. First Savings Bank, 173 Cal. 605, 160 P. 1075).

In the present proceeding it appears that the plaintiff has levied said writ of execution upon real property belonging to the defendant which is situate in the city and county of San Francisco; that the plaintiff is insolvent and will not be able to respond should the property be sold under execution and the judgment be reversed on the appeal; that therefore the present appeal, without a stay of execution of said judgment, would be wholly useless and ineffective as a remedy. It also appears that the appeal has been taken in good faith and not merely for purposes of delay, and that a stay is reasonably necessary to protect the defendant from serious injury in case of a reversal, and it does not appear that the plaintiff will sustain disproportionate injury in case of affirmance. See 3 Cor. Jur. p. 1290; Halsted v. First Savings Bank, supra, page 610 of 173 Cal., 160 P. 1075.

It is therefore ordered that a writ of supersedeas issue as prayed for herein, upon the defendant's giving, within ten days from the date hereof, a good and sufficient bond in double the amount of the sum for which execution is sought; said bond to be approved by a judge of the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

H. J. Leutholtz was convicted of manslaughter, driving while intoxicated, and failing to stop and render aid, and he appeals. Affirmed.

B. O. Tinglof and T. P. Hogan, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, Acting P. J. The appellant was charged by information filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles county, consisting of three counts, with (1) having unlawfully killed one W. J. Drake without malice; (2) driving an automobile upon a public highway while under the influence of intoxicating liquor; and (3) failing and neglecting to stop and render aid after striking W. J. Drake, as required by section 141 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 562). A jury having found him guilty, the defendant appealed from each of the judgments entered accordingly, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The first ground advanced by appellant for reversal is an asserted deficiency of the evidence to support the judgments. It is undisputed that on October 24, 1923, at about 7 o'clock p. m., Drake was walking across Huntington drive, at or near the intersection of Ferntop drive, when he was struck by an automobile proceeding at a rapid rate of speed in a northeasterly direction upon Huntington drive; that he was hurled against the curbing, receiving injuries from which he died; and that the driver increased the speed of the machine soon afterward. The defendant, testifying in his own behalf, admitted that at about the same time he was driving a gray Cadillac automobile in a northeasterly direction along Huntington drive, that he passed Ferntop drive, and that, when he arrived at the intersection of Eastern avenue, his machine collided with another car, and was overturned. He testified that his gray Cadillac had black fenders, two spare tires on the rear, each bearing a cover with a white strip in the center, tonneau shields, windshields on each side, and that he was driving at a speed between 30 and 35 miles per hour. Six witnesses identified an automobile of similar description as having passed the intersection of Ferntop drive in a northeasterly direction along Huntington drive at about the time mentioned.

Briefly stated, it was testified by T. H. Hunter that a gray or tan Cadillac passed him, that he heard a noise or impact near the pedestrian zone at Ferntop and Huntington drives, and that the Cadillac continued on. James A. Gilmer testified that a large gray car with black fenders passed him at about said point, at about 40 to 45 miles per hour; that it bore two spare tires, covered with white tops; that he saw something dark go out from the car toward the sidewalk. This witness drove to Eastern avenue, where he saw a Cadillac automobile which had been wrecked, as to which he swore: "I recognized it from the rear as being the car that passed me down on Huntington drive;"

"those spare tires on there, white strip around the tread of the cover." A Mrs. May Lynch, an attendant at a service station at the corner of Ferntop and Huntington drives, testified that Drake spoke to her at the station, started to cross the thoroughfare last mentioned, and was struck by a light or cream colored car, and thrown against the curbing; that the machine did not stop, but increased its speed. Frank Sharp, another attendant at said station, saw Drake struck down by a gray car as he entered the pedestrian zone; he swore that it had two spare tires on the rear, covered as the other witnesses described them, and was going at the rate of 35 to 40 miles per hour. He testified that he saw the same car at Eastern avenue that evening, and that it had been wrecked. Appellant testified that he was alone, and each of the witnesses testifying in this respect stated that there was but one person in the gray Cadillac car that fatally injured Drake and was soon afterward found at Eastern avenue in a damaged condition, when the defendant was injured in the collision which he admitted having encountered. Blood stains were found on the windshield, front bumper and front of the top, of the defendant's machine.

Seven witnesses, including a physician, two police officers, and the driver of the car with which appellant collided after the fatal accident to Drake, testified positively that in their opinions he was under the influence of intoxicating liquor at the time of the accidents in question. The doctor applied various technical tests, and one of the officers asked him if he had been drinking, but received no reply. Several of the witnesses smelled liquor upon the defendant's breath. It was contended during the trial that he had been dazed by the collision, yet the physician detected alcohol on his breath, noted that the pupils of his eyes were dilated, and that there were other evidences of his unfitness to drive an automobile; his walk and balance were both unsteady. The only physical injuries found were a one-half inch laceration and a one-half inch abrasion on the back of one hand.

[1-3] We think the evidence abundantly tends to warrant the finding of the jury that Leutholtz drove the gray car which caused the death of W. J. Drake, that he was intoxicated at the time, and that he did not stop. It is insisted that the evidence is consistent with the theory of unavoidable accident, since appellant swore that he saw no person on the street as he drove past the corner of Ferntop drive and Huntington drive. However, a witness who saw the accident testified that the car "slightly lowered the speed a little bit; you could just see it slacken, just perceptibly, and then go on faster." Whether, from all of the evidence before them, the jury might have concluded that a failure to observe pedestrians upon a public street was a mere oversight, or was due to the defendant's condition, and whether the slackening and immediate increase of speed was caused by the sudden impact with Drake's body, followed by a desire to escape, is not a question of law for this court to decide. They were instructed in effect that they should determine beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty that the defendant knowingly struck W. J. Drake, and that he willfully, knowingly, and feloniously failed, neglected, and refused to stop, give his name and address, and to render necessary assistance, in order to find him guilty. Upon the record before us we are not convinced that there was a miscarriage of justice in this respect, requiring a reversal of either judgment. People v. Watts, 198 Cal. 776, 247 P. 884. Appellant's criticism of the apparent inconsistency and improbable character of portions of the evidence is not of sufficiently serious import to require further discussion.

[4] A witness residing near the intersection at which Drake was struck found in the gutter a disc-shaped emblem from a Cadillac automobile, which fitted into the radiator which had been photographed after the accident in controversy. It is argued that the trial court erred in receiving the emblem in evidence, for the reason that it may have been "planted" for the purposes of the case, and was produced under suspicious circumstances. A photographer identified the pictures as having been made by himself, and other witnesses testified positively that the automobile shown in the photographs was the same Cadillac car which was in the collision. The witness who found the emblem delivered it to an officer at the coroner's inquest, who also identified it while on the stand, and swore that he had fitted it into the radiator of appellant's car, from which its emblem was missing. This evidence was submitted to the jury with other circumstances, and under the instructions of the court it lay within their province to afford it such weight, if any, as it should merit. We do not think error was committed in receiving the object in evidence.

[5] It is next asserted that the judgments should be reversed because the court refused to give to the jury a requested instruction. The defendant offered, an instruction to the effect that, before a verdict of guilty would be justified, it would be necessary that the jury be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that he knew that he had struck some person. An instruction having been given that, if the jury should find beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty that the defendant drove an automobile which struck and injured a human being, "all of which the said defendant H. J. Leutholtz then and there well knew," etc., they should find him guilty, the offered instruction was refused. We do not think that stating the same rule in the negative would have rendered it more intelligible, and it is not error to refuse a proposed instruction which has been substantially covered. People v. Garcia, 83 Cal. App. 463, 256 P. 876.

[6, 7] Appellant complains of an instruction reciting that the law requires drivers in all cases to stop and render aid, whether the accident result from carelessness of the driver, the pedestrian, or both, or was unavoidable. The Supreme Court has held that the statute does not contemplate the duty of rendering aid, unless it be shown that the defendant had knowledge of the accident. People v. Scofield, 203 Cal. 703, 265 P. 914. That an accident is indispensable to the application of the statutory mandate is axiomatic, and if a driver be not informed of its occurrence it seems clear that the Legislature did not intend that he should be classed among "all cases" wherein drivers knowingly injure persons with their automobiles. However, from the evidence adduced it became a question for the jury to determine as to whether or not this requisite to a conviction did in fact exist. A like instruction has under similar conditions been upheld as not injurious to the rights of the defendant. People v. Scofield, supra; People v. Graves, 74 Cal. App. 415, 240 P. 1019.

[8] Complaint is also made of an instruction that "contributory negligence, that is, negligence on the part of the deceased which contributed to the injury causing his death, is no defense." This instruction is clearly justified under the authority of People v. McKee, 80 Cal. App. 200, 251 P. 675.

The judgments and order denying a new trial are affirmed.
